PEOPLE v. BOLLINGER. (Cr. 2727.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⊜517(4) — Corpus delicti held under evidence sufficiently proved before evidence of confession admitted.

In murder prosecution, corpus delicti held under evidence to have been sufficiently proved before evidence of defendant's confession was admitted.

2. Criminal law ⊜531(3)—Evidence of voluntariness of confession held ample.

In murder prosecution, evidence of voluntariness of defendant's confession held ample.

3. Homicide ⊜253(1)—Evidence held to support conviction of first degree murder.

Evidence held to support conviction of murder of first degree with sentence of death.

4. Homicide ⊜314—Verdict of guilty of murder in first degree as charged in indictment held equivalent of finding that defendant suffer death penalty.

In view of Pen. Code, § 190, where, in murder prosecution, jury were instructed that, if in exercise of discretion they thought defendant should suffer death, merely to find him guilty of murder in the first degree, verdict finding defendant guilty of murder of first degree as charged in indictment held equivalent of finding that he should suffer death penalty.

5. Homicide ⊜311—Instruction as to how punishment should be expressed by jury held witnout error.

In murder prosecution, instruction, hypothetical in form, which instructed jury as to form of verdict if death penalty was determined on, and form of verdict if it was resolved to prescribe life imprisonment, held to be instruction on how punishment determined by jury should be expressed, not what punishment should be.

6. Homicide ⊜311—Instruction that jury in discretion could relieve defendant from death penalty held without error.

Instruction if jury found defendant guilty of first degree murder, and there were extenuating facts in case, it was within discretion to relieve defendant from extreme penalty, jury being vested with discretion limited to determining which of two punishments should be inflicted, and it was to be employed only when they were satisfied lighter penalty should be imposed, while opposed to Pen. Code, § 190, held not erroneous, although practice of giving such charge should be abandoned.

7. Criminal law ⊜761(11)—Instruction held not erroneous as assuming that homicide was proved.

In murder prosecution, reading jury Pen. Code, § 1105, providing on trial for murder, commission of homicide by defendant being proved, burden of proving circumstances of mitigation devolved on him, unless proof on part of prosecution showed that crime committed was manslaughter only, or that defendant was justifiable or excusable, held not to assume that commission of crime was proved.

8. Criminal law ⊜829(18)—Requested instruction that corpus delicti must be established to moral certainty and beyond reasonable doubt held sufficiently covered by others given.

Refusal of instruction in prosecution for murder that corpus delicti must be proved beyond reasonable doubt held not error, in view of other instructions on reasonable doubt which sufficiently informed jury that all essentials of offense must be established to moral certainty and beyond reasonable doubt.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Alfred Bollinger was convicted of first degree murder with sentence of death, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank A. Duryea and Alvin Weis, both of Marysville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Ray Manwell, Dist. Atty., of Marysville, for the People.

LAWLOR, J. The defendant was charged by indictment with the crime of murder. He pleaded not guilty to the indictment, was tried on the charge, and found guilty of murder in the first degree, the verdict carrying the death penalty. In due course a motion for a new trial was interposed by defendant and denied, whereupon judgment of death was pronounced upon him. The appeal is from said judgment sentencing him to death, and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The evidence introduced at the trial tends to show that on May 27, 1924, C. J. McCoy, sheriff of Yuba county, was informed by an itinerant laborer named Dan McVey that a dead man was lying in a body of water called Nigger Jack or Simmerley slough situated near the cemetery north of Marysville; that said sheriff notified the county coroner; that the coroner repaired to said slough and found the dead body lying face downward, partly submerged; that a superficial examination at the time showed the deceased had been subjected to great violence—the skull was crushed in and several ribs broken; that decomposition had set in; that in the month of April, 1924, appellant and his wife were camping or stopping at an auto camp in Yolo county, across the river from Sacramento; that a man well along in years and known thereabouts only as "Alex" was also stopping at said auto camp at the same time; that appellant and his wife struck up an acquaintance with "Alex"; that when "Alex" first came to the auto camp he had with him a horse and rig, together with a supply of camping utensils; that while there he purchased or acquired another horse and rig; that subsequently, and about April 15, 1924, appellant, his wife, and "Alex" left the auto camp together—appellant, accompanied by his wife, driving one horse and rig and "Alex" the other; that upon their departure from said auto camp they proceeded along the road leading from Sacramento to Marysville; that 25 or 30 days later appellant and his wife were seen by C. Z. Berry driving along the Twelfth-street road toward Sacramento; that on this occasion appellant and his wife were each driving a horse and rig; that about June 15, 1924, appellant and his wife were at the city of Napa; that during their stay there appellant sold to Joseph A. Marshall a sorrel horse, a spring wagon and harness, to C. D. Butler, a brown mare, harness, and wagon—the latter containing wearing apparel, a yellow cat, and three pigeons; and to Louis Pasquini, the camping utensils, tents, tables, and everything of that sort. These purchasers testified at the trial, and described the property as above set forth.

Subsequent to the coroner's discovery of the body in the slough, appellant was arrested and made a confession, in which he told of the killing of "Alex" with an ax, stating therein that deceased had previously threatened his life. The confession assumed to set forth the movements of the trio following their departure from the camp grounds.

2 and 3. We will consider first appellant's second and third claims of reversible error, for, if those contentions have merit, it would not be necessary to consider the other points made on appeal. The second and third claims of reversible error are thus stated:

"(2) The ruling of the trial court holding that the prosecution had sufficiently proven the corpus delicti to admit proof of the so-called confession, statement, or admission of the defendant is reversible error.

"(3) The denial of defendant's motion for an instructed verdict is reversible error; * * * what we have said under previous headings of this brief and the cases cited under citation of error No. 2 apply here. * * *"

We will now set forth the substance of the evidence which had been received before the asserted confession was admitted.

Frank Bevan, coroner of Yuba county, testified that, on the evening of May 27, 1924, he found the body of a dead man in the waters of Nigger Jack or Simmerley slough; that the face was in the water as was the front part of the body; that the body was in a nude condition, with the exception that it had on a part of an undershirt and a torn and tattered blue denim working shirt; that he removed the body from the water, made a casual examination, and placed it in the receiving vault; that such casual examination as was made at that time revealed that the body had been immersed in water, "that the skull evidently was entirely caved in on the top"; that on the morning of June 4th a more thorough examination was made and an autopsy performed by Dr. Allen Gray—the witness and his assistant, Mr. Buchanan, being present; that this examination showed the body to be in the condition revealed by the prior examination except that it was in an advanced stage of decomposition, and the odor had become more pronounced; that it also showed the left eye and nose to be broken and decomposed, as were the lips; that the height of the deceased was estimated at about 5 feet, 6 inches, and his age between 50 and 60 years; that the bones of the upper and lower jaw revealed no signs of teeth; that the sheriff, the district attorney, and himself visited the slough in the morning of the 26th of June, 1924, and the sheriff then recovered from the bushes or trees certain bedding and a pillow which the witness identified on the stand as the bedding then found by the sheriff.

Doctor Allen E. Gray testified that, on the morning of June 4, 1924, he was called to the Marysville cemetery to, and that he did, perform an autopsy; that there were present at that time the coroner and his assistant; that the autopsy disclosed the body of a man about 5 feet, 6 inches in height, and apparently past 50 years of age; that the body was badly decomposed, and parts of the skin and flesh were missing; that the top of the scalp, a part of the skull itself, and the brain were missing; that the top of the skull was badly fractured, and the fracture ran down toward the left orbit and the nose; that the eyes were missing and the flesh decomposed; the same being true of the skin and flesh of the nose; that there were no teeth and no signs of their recent removal; that there was a fracture of the third, fourth, and fifth rib on the left side, and that there was a bandage on one of his fingers; that there were no other bones broken or other marks of violence; that, in his opinion, "death came from a blow on the man's head"; that the man evidently had been dead three or four weeks or longer. On cross-examination he stated he could not say positively that these injuries were received before death; on redirect examination he declared that deceased did not have the appearance of a man that had been drowned.

C. C. Berry testified that during the month of April, 1924, he was running the camp ground in Sacramento, and had seen appellant and his wife there as campers; that they left the grounds about the 15th of April of that same year in company with an old man, who also had been staying there, and was known to him only as "Alex"; that "Alex" was about 5 feet, 6½ or 7 inches tall, and probably aged 65 years; that he thought "Alex" had no teeth; that "Alex" had stopped at the camp ground about a month and a half; that when he came he had a brown mare and a light buckboard rig; that during his ("Alex's") stay there he purchased another light, one-horse rig and a sorrel mare; that appellant, his wife, and "Alex" came to the camp grounds about the same time, and before leaving together they told him they were going to Knights Landing to go to work; that as they left appellant was driving one rig, and "Alex" the other; that each had a camping outfit—two separate tents—while there, which they took along when they left; that he recognized a "grub box" shown him as being one that belonged to "Alex"; that after they left he never again saw any of them.

C. Z. Berry testified that in the month of April, 1924, he worked in the grocery store in the camp grounds conducted by his brother, the preceding witness, at Sacramento; that he was acquainted with appellant, his wife, and "Alex"; that "Alex" was about 60 years of age, weighing 140 or 145 pounds, and probably 5 feet, 6 inches in height; that he never saw any teeth in his mouth; that "Alex" had with him while at said camp grounds a brown mare and a sorrel or chestnut; that the last time he ever saw "Alex" was about the 20th of April, 1924; that he also saw appellant at about the same time at the camp grounds; that he saw appellant and his wife about 25 or 30 days later on the Twelfth-street road going toward Sacramento; that each was driving a horse and wagon, the appellant being in the lead; that the horses "resembled the horses the old gentleman had"; that they appeared to have a camping outfit with them. On cross-examination he declared "Alex" had no teeth in front, as he saw none while talking with him in the store; that it was impossible to positively recognize the horses appellant and wife had with them on the last occasion on which he saw them as the horses that belonged to "Alex," but that they "looked the same color of horses."

Louis Pasquini testified that June 15, 1924, he saw appellant and his wife for the first time across the road from his blacksmith shop, one block north of the city limits of Napa; that they had with them at the time "two horses and two rigs, two complete single rigs, spring wagons, and camping utensils"; that on the following day appellant came to him and wanted to sell out everything he had, including two horses which he described as, "One was a bay and the other a sorrel"; that appellant told him his wife was sick, and he therefore desired to sell out everything he had so that he might take his wife to Oakland and to a hospital; that at that time he purchased from him "the cooking utensils and the camping utensils, tents, tables, everything of that sort; cooking utensils, camping outfit, tents, tables, and so forth"; that he (the witness) had no use for the horses and rigs, and therefore declined to purchase them; that he recognized two axes, a table, tent, box, bucket, and mattress shown him as being part of the outfit he bought from appellant.

Joseph A. Marshall testified that he saw appellant on the 16th of June, 1924, across the street from Pasquini's blacksmith shop; that at this time he bought a sorrel horse, spring wagon and harness from him.

C. D. Butler testified that he saw appellant in the city of Napa June 16, 1924, and that upon this occasion he purchased from him (appellant) a brown mare, harness, and wagon.

The coroner, being recalled, testified that the body he recovered from the slough did not have the appearance of one that had been drowned; that he was at the slough again on June 26, 1924, when C. J. McCoy, sheriff of Yuba county, recovered a bed; that the bed shown him was the bed found by the sheriff upon that occasion; that said bed was in the sheriff's office later when the appellant, the district attorney, the sheriff, and himself were present; that upon said occasion, so far as he was aware, no threats or inducements were made to appellant; that the sheriff asked appellant, "Is that the old man's bed or bedding?" that he hesitated a few seconds, and finally answered, "Yes."

Sheriff McCoy, of Yuba county, testified that he saw appellant for the first time in Sacramento on June 25, 1924, and that since that time he had been in the custody of his office; that the first talk he had with appellant was in an automobile coming from his residence to the county jail in Sacramento, and then at the county jail in said city in the presence of Deputy Sheriff Robbins and the district attorney; that the next conversation with him was in the home of Joseph E. Pipher in Sacramento on the evening of the same day; that the next in chronological order was on the 26th of June, and the next on the 8th of July; that, so far as he was aware, no other officers had any conversations with appellant in his absence; that he, nor any one to his knowledge, did not, upon any of these occasions, hold out any threats, promises, rewards, or inducements to the appellant; that upon the occasion of the conversation in the home of Joseph E. Pipher no threats or promises were made to the appellant, and that the statements there made by appellant were freely and voluntarily made by him; that said conversation took place about 8 p. m. on the evening of June 25, 1924, and there were present Deputy Sheriffs Robbins and Wilcoxson, appellant, Joseph E. Pipher, district attorney, and himself; that, upon this occasion, the district attorney asked appellant "if he would be willing to have his statement taken down in shorthand by a reporter"; that he said, "Yes"; that he was then taken to Joseph E. Pipher's house, and the district attorney questioned him.

Joseph E. Pipher testified that he was a shorthand reporter of the Sacramento superior court; that on the 25th day of June, 1924, he saw appellant at his (Pipher's) house; that there were present at this time the district attorney, the sheriff, Deputies Wilcoxson and Robbins, the appellant, and himself; that they gathered about 7:10 o'clock in the evening; that no threats were made or promises held out to appellant, and that his statement was freely and voluntarily made.

[1] The rule requiring proof of the corpus delicti before the admission of extrajudicial confessions is thus stated in 8 Cal. Jur. p. 234, § 303:

"Proof of Corpus Delicti and of Admissions and Confessions.—Logically, the first point to which the evidence of the people should be directed is the corpus delicti. This should be established before the introduction of evidence tending to connect the defendant with the offense. The rule, however, does not go so far as to exclude, in showing the corpus delicti, proof of the defendant's connection with the crime, where the circumstances of the case are such that proof of the crime involves proof of defendant's guilt.

"Admissions or Confessions.—Proof of the corpus delicti should be made before the introduction of evidence of extrajudicial statements or admissions, and confessions. But in the absence of any showing of prejudice, irregularity in the order of proof is of no consequence, if the commission of the crime is ultimately established independently of the alleged admissions of the defendant.

"To authorize the reception and consideration by the jury of evidence of an extrajudicial confession or admission of a defendant, the people need not establish the corpus delicti by proof of the clear and convincing character required to support a conviction. It is sufficient if there is some proof, or prima facie proof, or even slight proof of the corpus delicti. The uncorroborated testimony of a witness is sufficient to establish the corpus delicti for this purpose, even when the statute requires corroboration before a conviction can be had. Indeed, the confession of the defendant will furnish sufficient corroboration. But proof by hearsay testimony is insufficient. Since the criminal agency of the defendant is not an element of the corpus delicti, it is not necessary that the evidence of the corpus delicti should itself connect or tend to connect the defendant with its perpetration in order to make evidence of the confession admissible."

Applying this rule, we think that the trial court, in denying the motion to advise the jury to acquit on this ground, correctly summarized the evidence and disposed of the legal question involved. We quote:

"The motion is denied, the corpus delicti was sufficiently proven before any testimony of any statement of the defendant was introduced. The law as to that is very clear; the body was found, the man was dead; the body exhibited external marks of violence, skull crushed in, the brains gone, evidently the body of a man who had been dead some time, decomposition had set in. The doctor expressed the opinion that the cause of death was the injury to the skull and head which was necessarily fatal. There was no evidence of any drowning or poison or any other mode of death; it was very apparent from the description of the wounds that they could not have been self-inflicted; the man was evidently killed by somebody. Here is a man with marks of fatal wounds on his body, he is dead, his body is found; there you have evidence of the corpus delicti unless it is apparent the wound may have been self-inflicted, and this was impossible from the description of the wounds, so he was killed by some agency. The evidence does not show there was any agency that could have done that except some blow from some external force, and the nature of the wound and evidence of the physical surroundings would indicate a crime had been committed and not suicide. Then there was independent evidence showing that a man answering very accurately the description of the body found by the coroner was seen in company with the defendant and his wife in Sacramento, that they left there together; that the dead man had been the owner of two traveling rigs, horses and wagons, and that they left at the same time, the deceased in one rig, and the defendant and his wife in another. They stated they were going to Knights Landing on one road between Marysville and Sacramento; that afterwards the defendant and his wife were seen at Sacramento in these rigs, and that the defendant sold a lot of camping utensils in Napa, and the horses and wagons,

I think there was sufficient proof of the corpus delicti the moment Dr. Gray testified. There is most abundant proof of the agency; then all this proof of the people being seen to leave Sacramento together, the disappearance of the third party, and the disposition of the property by the defendant, and on top of that we have the clear-cut confession of the defendant as to the manner in which he dealt the death blow to the deceased. It would be the height of absurdity to give the jury any such direction. The motion is denied."

[2] It is apparent from the foregoing that the evidence of the voluntariness of the confession was ample. The evidence having been held to be sufficient to justify the admission of the extrajudicial confession, we will now set forth the substance thereof: That he had been married a little over a year; that on April 24, 1924, or the latter part of April, he and his wife were camped in the Berry camp grounds outside of Sacramento; that at that time "Alex" was also camped there; that they had been camped there "about two weeks, I think it was—not over three, at the most"; that they just had a tent and camp outfit; that they bought a horse and buggy from "Alex"; that "Alex" then bought another horse and rig; that he became acquainted with "Alex" through bandaging his sore arm on several occasions; that he thought "Alex" was between 55 and 60 years of age; that after "Alex" bought that second rig, the trio started towards Marysville; that he and his wife rode in the rig said to have been purchased from "Alex"; that "Alex" kept right behind them in the other rig; that they were on the road three nights before reaching Marysville; that they reached Marysville and camped near the cemetery; that he had worked in the district 10 country before—that is, about three years previously; that they pulled off of the road that goes down to the left near "Nigger slough"; that he and his wife "went to bed powerful early;" that "Alex" went to bed about 75 feet from where they were; that he woke up about daylight; that he hit "Alex" on the top of the head with an ax lying near the latter's bed; that "Alex" was attired only in his union suit and work shirt; that he then took him down to the slough and "drug him out in the water there a little ways"; that it could not have been over 75 yards distant from the public road where he left "Alex" in the slough; that he then returned and removed from "Alex's" clothes a $100 bill and two $5 bills; that he and his wife came back to Sacramento; "Did you say anything to your wife, or tell her to get up, or pack up, or anything? A. Why, she wanted to pack up and come on back. * * * Q. And did she ask you any questions about what became of the old man? A. Well, she asked me what I had done. Q. She didn't see you do this, did she? A. No"; that he sold "Alex's" outfit at Napa for $15; that at his wife's suggestion he threw "Alex's" personal belongings in the Sacramento river off the Natomas boulevard; that when they got to Sacramento with the money he had gotten, he purchased a suit of clothes; that "Alex's" hair was getting tolerable gray, but he could not say whether or not he was baldheaded or had any teeth, but thought he was smooth shaved; that he would judge "Alex" was about five-ten in height, and weighed about 140 pounds; that "Alex" on three different occasions made threats against him—"My wife told me of one occasion, and then I heard two other—two other occasions;" that the reason he did not sever his connections with him was because he "owed him a little bit on the outfit; besides he wanted to stay right with us all the time"; and that certain inconsistent statements as to where they separated from "Alex" and the road taken were made because "my conscience brought the words out; that was all."

Appellant did not appear as a witness on the trial. His wife, Eva Bollinger, testified, however, that the man who was with them ("Alex") on the trip from Sacramento in April, 1924, told her that he would "get" her husband yet; that she told her husband of his threat out by the cemetery near Marysville. On cross-examination she admitted that he made these threats because "he thought my husband neglected me and had me working, that is, the words he spoke about my husband"; and, that, in a conversation with the sheriff, she stated there was "no truth" in her husband's statement that the old man had made threats against him at two named places, adding "* * * but my husband was very jealous of the old man, but I told my husband if I was going to have anything to do with a man I wouldn't have anything to do with an old man, but I would pick a young man." It is proper to state in this connection that the jury was, at the request of appellant, elaborately charged on the subject of self-defense or justifiable homicide within the meaning of sections 197 and 198 of the Penal Code and the decisions thereunder, although the only evidence bearing on said question was that given by Eva Bollinger, as above stated, and the extrajudicial declarations of appellant.

[3] As we read appellant's brief it is not claimed that the evidence presented on the trial is insufficient to sustain the verdict. But in the statement of the grounds on appeal (section 1247, Pen. Code) it is declared: "(3) That the verdict is against law. (4) That the verdict is contrary to the evidence." Touching these contentions, and assuming they are before us, it is sufficient to point out that the evidence we have summarized abundantly supports the verdict rendered, and we fail to find in the record that such evidence was in any real sense controverted.

[4] 1. In the first assignment of error it is contended that the judgment is void, for the reason that the jury in its verdict failed to fix the penalty as provided in section 190 of the Penal Code. The verdict rendered reads as follows:

"We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant, Alfred Bollinger, guilty of murder of the first degree as charged in the indictment."

Section 190 of the Penal Code reads:

"Every person guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death, or confinement in the state prison for life, at the discretion of the jury trying the same. * * *"

It is true the jury alone shall determine in a case of murder in the first degree whether the punishment shall be death or confinement in the state prison for life, and that the jury after exercising such discretion shall by its verdict, either by its terms or when read in the light of the instructions, plainly indicate the punishment fixed. It is clear that the verdict in this case, considered in the light of the following instruction, calls for the death penalty, and that the judgment is not void because of the failure of the verdict to specify therein, in terms, the punishment to be inflicted. The instruction reads:

"If you find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree it is at your discretion to fix his punishment; that is to say, whether the defendant shall suffer death or confinement in the state prison for life. If, in the exercise of such discretion, you think the defendant should suffer death, you will merely find him guilty of murder in the first degree; but, if on the other hand you fix his punishment at confinement in the state prison for life, you will specify the same in your verdict." (Italics added.)

In conformity with the said instruction, the jury, having determined on the extreme penalty, simply brought in a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree without specifying in terms the punishment to be inflicted. This follows the instruction, for it indicated that, if the death penalty was determined upon, the punishment should not be specified in the verdict; the only reference to be made to the punishment in the verdict was in the event the jury resolved on life imprisonment:

"But if, on the other hand, you fix his punishment in the state prison for life, you will specify the same in your verdict."

The silence of the verdict as to the punishment must, therefore, in the light of the instruction, be taken as the equivalent of a finding that appellant shall suffer the death penalty. People v. Perry et al. (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 890.

[5] 4. Having shown that the verdict is sufficient, we will next consider appellant's fourth assignment of error that the quoted instruction itself was erroneous, in that it constituted an interference by the court with the discretion exclusively reposed in the jury to fix the punishment to be inflicted in murder of the first degree. We do not perceive in said instruction any attempt to interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the jury in fixing the punishment in the event they should find appellant guilty of murder in the first degree. The instruction is hypothetical in form, "If you find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree," and it then proceeds to instruct the jury as to the form of verdict to be rendered if the death penalty is determined upon, and the form of verdict if it is resolved to prescribe life imprisonment. It is clearly an instruction as to how the punishment determined by the jury shall be expressed, not what the punishment shall be. It is not necessary, therefore, to pursue the contention further or to consider the authorities cited by appellant, for, in addition to this instruction being free from criticism, the instructions reviewed in those authorities assumed to direct the jury as to how the discretion in the matter of punishment should be exercised.

[6] 5. Appellant's next contention is thus stated:

"The giving of the following instruction was reversible error, to wit, 'If the jury in this case should find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, and they also shall find the further fact that there is some extenuating fact or circumstance in the case, it is within their discretion to pronounce such a sentence as will relieve the defendant from the extreme penalty of the law. The jury in a criminal case for murder is vested with a discretion, but the discretion is not an arbitrary one, and is limited to determining which of two punishments shall be inflicted, and is to be employed only when the jury is satisfied that the lighter penalty should be imposed. If the evidence shows the defendant to be guilty of murder in the first degree, but does not show some extenuating fact or circumstance, it is the duty of the jury to find a simple verdict of murder in the first degree, and leave with the law the responsibility of affixing the punishment.' "

It is contended that the instruction is erroneous "for the reasons and under the authorities cited and discussed under the heading 'Error 1' in this brief, and we think it is unnecessary to further discuss that phase of the case." The authorities referred to are Winston v. United States, Strather v. United States, and Smith v. United States, 172 U. S. 303, 19 S. Ct. 212, 43 L. Ed. 456. These cases involved the act of Congress of January 15, 1897, chapter 29, 29 Stat. 487 (U. S. Comp. St. § 10504) which reads in part:

"In all cases where the accused is found guilty of the crime of murder * * * the jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto 'without capital punishment'; and whenever the jury shall return a verdict qualified as aforesaid the person convicted shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life."

The juries in those cases were instructed in effect that their discretion was not an arbitrary one, and that the qualification should be added to the verdict only in those cases showing palliating or mitigating circumstances. In condemning the instructions and reversing the judgments, the court said:

"The right to qualify a verdict of guilty, by adding the words 'without capital punishment,' is thus conferred upon the jury in all cases of murder. The act does not itself prescribe, nor authorize the court to prescribe, any rule defining or circumscribing the exercise of this right; but commits the whole matter of its exercise to the judgment and the consciences of the jury. The authority of the jury to decide that the accused shall not be punished capitally is not limited to cases in which the court, or the jury, is of opinion that there are palliating or mitigating circumstances. But it extends to every case in which, upon a view of the whole evidence, the jury is of opinion that it would not be just or wise to impose capital punishment. * * *

"The instructions of the judge to the jury, in each of the three cases now before this court, clearly gave the jury to understand that the act of Congress did not intend or authorize the jury to qualify their verdict by the addition of the words 'without capital punishment,' unless mitigating or palliating circumstances were proved.

"This court is of opinion that these instructions were erroneous in matter of law, as undertaking to control the discretionary power vested by Congress in the jury, and as attributing to Congress an intention unwarranted either by the express words or by the apparent purpose of the statute. * * *"

We have already quoted the pertinent part of section 190 of the Penal Code. Before the amendment of that section in 1873–74 (Stats. 1873–74, p. 457), it read as follows: "Every person guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death. * * *" It is clear beyond question that, by the language of the amended section "Every person guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death, or confinement in the state prison for life, at the discretion of the jury trying the same; * * *" two changes were made in the law as to the punishment for murder in the first degree—first, that the punishment may be either death or life imprisonment; and, second, that the discretion of determining which punishment shall be imposed was vested in the jury alone. For, as declared in the above federal cases, the law places no restriction upon the jury's exercise of such discretion, nor does it attempt to confine its exercise to cases presenting palliating or mitigating circumstances. In our opinion, the trial court should never instruct the jury as to how the discretion should be exercised. The Legislature has "confided the power to affix the punishment within those two alternatives to the absolute discretion of the jury. * * *" People v. Leary, 105 Cal. 486, 496, 39 P. 24. The question is not a new one in this state, and, while in no instance has it been held that the giving of such an instruction is erroneous under the decisions, yet no case has declared that such an instruction comes within the meaning of section 190 of the Penal Code.

In People v. Bawden, 90 Cal. 195, 27 P. 204, which involved three instructions whose import is almost identical with the one now under discussion, this court said:

"If the question here presented were a new one, there would be strong reasons for holding that by section 190 of the Penal Code the Legislature intended to give to the jury the entire power of fixing the punishment in such a case, uninfluenced by the court; and that there is no warrant in the code for any distinction, in this regard, between one kind of murder in the first degree and another. But these instructions are literal copies of instructions given and approved by this court in People v. Brick, 68 Cal. 190. The same rule was also substantially stated in People v. Jones, 63 Cal. 168; and in People v. Murback, 64 Cal. 369, the language of the instructions approved was almost identical with that used by the court in the case at bar, although it may be said that in the Murback Case the opinion of the court was hardly in consonance with the instructions approved. The same rule seems to have been approved in People v. Olsen, 80 Cal. 128.

"Similar instructions have no doubt been given in other cases now on their way here by appeal; for it is to be observed that whenever a doubtful instruction has been approved by this court, it has generally been seized upon and injected into future cases. Great confusion would therefore occur if we should enter into a new examination of this question, and should come to a conclusion opposite to that heretofore reached. Moreover, as was said by the court, on another subject, in People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 520, 'we do not think this question has practically so much importance as is sometimes attributed to it'; for a juror, exercising the responsibility of choosing between the imprisonment of a defendant and his death, will act upon his own discretion, and not upon that of another. Therefore we decline to reopen the question, and hold that the instructions, under the authorities, were not erroneous. It is to be hoped, however, that trial courts will not make further excursions into this doubtful domain."

Notwithstanding this concluding suggestion, the court has been called upon to consider the question in the following cases: People v. Leary, supra; People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 483, 126 P. 143; People v. Wolfgang, 192 Cal. 754, 761, 221 P. 907; People v. Casade (Cal. Sup.) 230 P. 9; People v. Craig (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 721; People v. Perry et al. (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 890.

While we are satisfied that the giving of such instructions is opposed to the provisions of section 190 of the Penal Code, we are not prepared to depart from the decisions on this point. In other words, we consider as settled that the giving of such instructions is not error. We have, however, gone into the subject in the hope, if not the expectation, that the practice of giving such instructions may be abated, thus giving assurance that the penalty reflects the decision of the jury alone, and at the same time sparing this court the necessity of repeatedly passing on such assignments of error. And considering the numerous occasions this court has held that section 190 of the Penal Code confers on the jury alone the discretion of determining the punishment in cases of guilt of murder in the first degree, trial courts, especially where a human life is at stake, should not interfere with the discharge of that solemn duty by the jury.

[7] 6. The next contention is that the court committed error in reading to the jury section 1105 of the Penal Code, which provides:

"Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable."

It is contended that:

"This instruction assumes that the commission of the homicide by the defendant has been proved. It is equivalent to instructing the jury that such proof has been made. It is an instruction upon a question of fact. The jury, under such instruction, were told by the court that the question of fact, to wit, whether or not the homicide had been committed by the defendant, had been proved, and that they were no longer to consider that question as in doubt. * * * This same instruction was given in the case of People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 647, 63 P. 1001, supra, and was there held by this court to be prejudicial error."

The giving of the instruction was doubtless prompted by appellant's claim that the deceased told Mrs. Bollinger he would "get" her husband, and that she repeated the threat to appellant at the cemetery near Marysville. Appellant's objection is similar to that made in People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 592, 595, 91 P. 515, 516, and what was said in that case completely disposes of the contention. We quote:

"The court in its instructions read to the jury section 1105 of the Penal Code. * * * The phrase objected to was not inserted in the instruction as a statement by the court that the commission of the homicide by the defendant had been proved. It was meant as an expression of a condition or event, upon which the succeeding part of the instruction would become applicable, and that is its true rhetorical meaning when considered in connection with the text. Its signification is the same as if the sentence began thus, 'When, upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant has been proved,' etc. Thus understood, it does not constitute a statement of the fact by the court. In People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 647, * * * this instruction was given with some additions declaring the extent of the burden of proof cast upon the defendant. It was criticized in that case upon the ground that the jury might have understood the above-quoted phrase as a declaration that the fact referred to had been proved. The defendant in that case did not attempt to mitigate, justify, or excuse the homicide, but denied that he had committed the act. Consequently, it was said, 'the instruction should not have been given, for it was entirely inapplicable.' * * *

"In the present case the instruction could not have been so understood by the jury. Other instructions repeated frequently the proposition that the jury were the exclusive judges of the facts. * * * In view of these instructions it would be impossible for any jury of ordinary intelligence to have supposed that the instruction complained of was intended to state to them that the fact that the defendant had committed the homicide had been proven."

[8] 7. Under this assignment of error it is asserted that the court erred in refusing an instruction "that in a murder case the burden is on the prosecution to establish the corpus delicti to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt." It appears that the court gave several instructions upon the necessity of the prosecution proving the corpus delicti, and, though none of them expressly stated the measure of proof required of the prosecution to prove that element of the crime, the court, after defining the term "corpus delicti," its essential ingredients, and declaring that the burden was on the prosecution to establish it, gave the following instruction:

"The corpus delicti may be established by direct or circumstantial evidence. But it cannot be established by the extrajudicial admissions or confessions of the defendant, or, as the rule is frequently expressed, a conviction cannot be had on the extrajudicial admissions or confessions of the defendant unless corroborated by proof, outside of such admissions or confessions, of the corpus delicti. It is a rule of evidence that admissions or confessions of a party are never sufficient to convict unless and until the corpus delicti is proved. After proof of the corpus delicti, then, and then only, admissions or confessions, if any have been established by the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, may be used by the jury in determining whether or not the defendant is guilty as charged in the indictment."

From this and the instructions given to the jury on "reasonable doubt" and kindred subjects, we think the jury was instructed that the corpus delicti as well as every other essential of the offense must be established to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt.

8. Appellant's final specification of error is thus stated: "For the reasons given under the previous assignments and the cases there cited, we think it was error for the court to refuse defendant a new trial." In view of the disposition we have made of the preceding points, it must be held that this contention is without merit.

The judgment and order denying appellant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

GENERAL ACCIDENT, FIRE & LIFE ASSUR. CORPORATION, LIMITED, OF PERTH, SCOTLAND, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 11239.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 21, 1925.)

1. Insurance ⊜136(2)—Finding that delivery of policy by compensation insurer to its agent was a delivery thereof to employer seeking insurance held not sustained by evidence.

Insurance brokers held agents for employer, for the limited purpose of ascertaining cost of workmen's compensation insurance only, and agents of insurer, for collection of premium and delivery of policy to employer, so that finding of Industrial Accident Commission that forwarding of policy to broker was a delivery to such employer was not supported by the evidence, where employer had not bound himself to accept the policy.

2. Insurance ⊜670—Compensation insurer held entitled to finding by commission on question whether employer obtained policy by fraudulent concealment of fact that accident to employee had happened prior to issuance of policy.

Under the evidence, and in view of Civ. Code, §§ 2527, 2531, 2561, 2562, 2563, 2565, 2569, 2577, held, that compensation insurer was entitled to finding by the Industrial Accident Commission on the question whether, at time employer paid premium and gained possession of compensation insurance policy, he fraudulently concealed from insurer fact that accident had already happened under circumstances imposing duty of disclosure.

3. Insurance ⊜152(3)—Statute held part of every insurance contract.

Civ. Code, §§ 2527, 2531, 2561, 2562, 2563, 2565, 2569, 2577, form a part of every contract of insurance to become effective by virtue of the laws of California.

4. Insurance ⊜253—Representations presumed to refer to time that insurance completed.

The time that a contract of insurance is completed is fixed by Civ. Code, § 2577, as the time to which a representation is presumed to refer.

5. Insurance ⊜256(1), 261, 310(1)—Intentional concealment of material fact or false representations held fraud, avoiding policy at option of insurer; forfeiture may be set up in action.

Material facts intentionally concealed, or false representations, made with intent to mislead insurer, is fraud, which, at his option, avoids policy, and rescission is not an exclusive remedy, but insurer may set up concealment in action on policy.

6. Insurance ⊜310(1)—Notice of repudiation and seasonable return of premium sufficient to inform insured that insurer does not recognize validity of contract.

Notice of repudiation of insurance contract, obtained by concealment of material fact, and seasonable return of premium to insured was sufficient to inform him that insurer did not recognize contract as valid or binding, where policy, being in insured's possession, could not be canceled by insurer.

7. Fraud ⊜16—Concealment of material fact "fraud."

Concealment of a material fact like a misrepresentation as to such fact, amounts to "fraud."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fraud.]

8. Insurance ⊜311(1)—Employee's dependents without right of action against compensation insurer on policy void as to employer.

The dependents of an employee can have no cause of action against compensation insurer on an insurance contract, which is void or voidable as to the employer.

9. Master and servant ⊜397—Commission has power to determine question of validity of insurance policy.

Under Const. art. 20, § 21, Workmen's Compensation Ins. and Safety Law, §§ 1, 55, 63, Industrial Accident Commission has power to hear and determine issues as to validity of compensation insurance policy and question of alleged fraud on part of employer in its procurement.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Certiorari by the General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, of Perth, Scotland, against the Industrial Accident Commission and Frank Vessels, employer, to review award made by the Commission in favor of Alice Lilenquist and another, dependents of Harold A. Lilenquist, deceased, employee. Award set aside, and proceeding remanded.

Alfred C. Skaife, of San Francisco, and Joe Crider, Jr., of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. This is a petition for a writ of certiorari to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of the dependents of a deceased employee. Harold Lilenquist, an oil worker, died on August 12, 1922, from injuries received on that day while engaged in an attempt to install a heavy stationary steam boiler by means of a jack or screw. The injuries were received and death occurred near Santa Fé Springs, county of Los Angeles. One Frank Vessels was the employer of the decedent. At the time of his death Lilenquist was of the age of 23 years, and the husband of Alice Lilenquist and the father of Harold A. Lilenquist, a minor, both of whom are joined as respondents herein. It is stipulated that said injuries were the proximate cause of the death of said Harold Lilenquist, and that they arose out of and were received while he was performing services in the due course of his employment, and therefore compensable under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (Laws 1913, p. 279) of this state. The only question that was presented to the Commission, or raised here, is whether or not the petitioner, General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, of Perth, Scotland, was, on the day of the fatal accident, the insurance carrier of said Vessels.

Vessels, the employer, was a contractor. His residence was at Huntington Beach, and the scene of his employment at the time of the accident was Santa Fé Springs, distant about 23 miles from Huntington Beach, where he had workmen employed in installing machinery to be used in the production of oil. He made daily trips by automobile from his residence to the place where the accident occurred. He was impressed with the importance of industrial accident coverage, but, being hard-pressed for finances, he was considering whether he would be able to pay the premium on a policy of insurance. He was also apprehensive that a declining oil market might at any moment cause a suspension of the industry upon which he depended for employment, thereby rendering an outlay of money for an insurance policy an unnecessary expenditure. However, on or about the 26th day of July, 1922, he visited the office of Huston, Suter & Huston, insurance agents, brokers, and solicitors, doing business at Huntington Beach, with the apparent purpose of making inquiry as to the cost of a policy of insurance. This entire business transaction was conducted with E. A. Suter, a member of said firm. The general agent of the petitioner was Geo. T. Mahana & Co., whose offices were at Los Angeles. A business connection existed at that time, and for some time prior thereto had existed, between Geo. T. Mahana & Co. and the firm of Huston, Suter & Huston. While the latter did not write policies covering industrial hazards, it accepted and forwarded applications for this line of insurance to Geo. T. Mahana & Co., and received a commission on all policies issued through its procurement. On Vessel's first visit to the offices of Huston, Suter & Huston, July 26, 1922, the subject of taking out a policy was discussed by him and Suter. The latter did not then know the amount of the premium that would be required to carry the policy Vessels had in mind. Suter, with the assistance of Vessels, filled out a form of declaration, unsigned, which corresponds with the applications used in ordinary insurance business. The letter which accompanied the declaration was written by Suter, and was as follows:

"George T. Mahana Co., Pacific Finance Bldg., Los Angeles, Cal.—Gentlemen: As per the inclosed declaration which we have made out roughly, we desire to have a compensation policy, or rather the party desires to know what the rate as well as the minimum premium deposits will be.

"Kindly let us know by return mail, at the same time let us know if anything else is necessary to be filled in on the application.

"Yours truly, Huston, Suter & Huston,
"by E. A. Suter.

"P. S. Please return copies of the inclosed form for our files, so that in case he desires us to write the insurance that we can have him sign up. Eas. Eas/A Encs."

On July 28, 1922, a policy complete in form and detail was received by Suter from the general office at Los Angeles. The premium payable thereon was $60 per annum. Suter at once notified Vessels of the receipt of the policy, and the latter visited the offices of Huston, Suter & Huston, but did not consent to accept the policy. It was understood that the policy should be held by Suter for a few days to give Vessels further time for making a decision as to whether he would pay the premium and accept the policy. It was explained that the policy was forwarded without a request from any one to do so, with the view of saving time and labor in the event that Vessels should decide to accept it. On August 10, 1922, Suter wrote the following letter to his principal, Geo. T. Mahana & Co., for further instructions:

"Since the time you mailed the policy to me Mr. Vessels was in and says that business has fallen off so owing to the recent cuts in the price of oil that he did not know whether he would have work for the men, and asked me if I would hold the policy for a few days, which I agreed to do; however, since he has not been in, I thought that I had better write the circumstances and have you advise us."

On the following day Geo. T. Mahana & Co. replied as follows:

"Answering your favor of the 10th, we wish to advise that it is all right for you to hold the above policy in your office for a period of not exceeding sixty days so the assured may make up his mind whether or not he wants to continue the same.

"You understand the premium is based upon a pay roll and if the assured expects to have $1,000 worth of pay roll any time during the policy period he might as well take the policy now and pay the premium for it. * * *"

On the afternoon of the following day, August 12, at about the hour of 3:40 o'clock, Lilenquist received the injuries from which he died. On the afternoon of the same day that Lilenquist received said injuries Vessels presented himself at the office of Huston, Suter & Huston, and paid the $60 premium by check. Suter then and there delivered to him the policy of insurance. The conversation had at this visit was brief; no mention was made of an accident having occurred.

Two days after the accident, to wit, August 14, 1922, Vessels appeared at the office of Huston, Suter & Huston, and notified Suter of the accident. Suter remarked to him that it "was pretty close figuring." Nothing further of consequence was said. On August 26, at the request of petitioner, Suter drew a check in favor of Vessels for $60, the amount of the premium, and mailed it to Vessels. A copy of the letter which accompanied the check is not in the record, but the testimony is that it was to the effect that peitioner denied or repudiated any liability, by reason of the accident having occurred prior to the acceptance of the policy, and returned the premium. This check was never returned by Vessels or presented for payment. It appears that Vessels sent the check to Mrs. Lilenquist. The record does not disclose what disposition she made of it.

It was the claim of petitioner, and evidence was offered tending to support this contention, that the premium was not paid nor was the policy accepted or agreed to be accepted by Vessels until after Lilenquist had sustained the injuries which resulted in his death, and that Vessels had actual knowledge at the time he gained possession of said policy that the injuries had been previously suffered, and petitioner was without such knowledge, and had no opportunity to inform itself on the subject. It is contended that it was the duty of Vessels to communicate to petitioner the existence of said facts which were known to him, but that he fraudulently concealed the same from petitioner and its agent. It is further contended that, inasmuch as the injuries occurred before the premium was paid or the policy was delivered or accepted, the subject-matter of the contract had ceased to exist, or at least had been materially affected by said casualty. Other objections were made, but they are necessarily included in the main contentions just stated.

In addition to making a finding to the effect that the employer, Vessels, and the employee, Lilenquist, were subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of this state, and that the respondent wife and child were his dependents, all of which was stipulated to by counsel, the Commission found that petitioner was the insurance carrier of said employer at the time the injuries were inflicted, and grounded its findings as to liability on the theory that the delivery of the policy to Suter, on or about July 28, 1922, was a delivery to Vessels. The sole finding upon which liability is imputed to petitioner as the insurance carrier is as follows:

"2. On or about the 27th day of July, 1922, the defendant, General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, executed a certain policy of Workmen's Compensation Insurance in favor of the defendant Frank Vessels, at the special instance and request of said Frank Vessels, communicated to said General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation by Huston, Suter & Huston, who were at said time agents of said Frank Vessels, and not agents of said defendant, General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, and prior to the 12th day of August, 1922, the said General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation delivered said policy to Frank Vessels, by delivering said policy to said Huston, Suter & Huston, who were at the time of said delivery agents of defendant Frank Vessels, and not agents of defendant General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation. At the time of the sustaining of said injury by the employee, therefore, the employer's insurance carrier was General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, and the employer and the employee were subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917."

[1, 2] No finding was made, although the issue was pressed by petitioner before the Commission, as to whether the accident occurred prior to the payment of the premium, and, if so, whether the accident was known to Vessels prior to said payment and that fact was by him concealed from Suter. Clearly the finding to the effect that the delivery of the policy to Huston, Suter & Huston, was a delivery to Vessels is not supported by any evidence in the case. This is the sole finding upon which petitioner's liability is predicated. The firm of Huston, Suter & Huston was the agent for Vessels only for the purpose of obtaining information as to the cost of the insurance. Beyond this it was not authorized to go. Vessels at no time before the accident occurred assumed liability for the payment of the premium. He did not sign the declaration that was forwarded to petitioner. It cannot be contended that Vessels, so long as the premium remained unpaid, could have compelled delivery of said policy. No such contention is made. His whole course of conduct is conclusive of the fact that the policy in the hands of Suter was regarded by him as being in the possession of petitioner. He studiously avoided binding himself by any agreement or promise, either oral or in writing, to accept the policy or pay the premium thereon. No claim was or could be made that credit was to be extended. The policy, by the instructions of petitioner, was to be held in the office of Suter until payment of the premium was made. The finding to the effect that a delivery to Huston, Suter & Huston was an absolute delivery to Vessels cannot be sustained without doing violence to the plain intent and understanding of all the parties to the transaction. No agency having been shown to exist between Huston, Suter & Huston and Vessels, except for the limited purpose of ascertaining the cost of insurance, and it clearly appearing that Huston, Suter & Huston was the agent of petitioner for the collection of the premium and the delivery of the policy in the event that it should be accepted, the finding of the Commission that the forwarding of the policy to

Suter under the specific instructions of the insurer, which were to control delivery, and which were not complied with by Vessels, was a delivery to Vessels is not supported by the evidence. This being true, it follows that the Commission should have found upon the issue whether or not the policy was obtained by fraudulent concealment of a material fact on the part of Vessels under such circumstances as the law makes it the duty of a person similarly situated to disclose to the other who has no knowledge of such fact or reason to believe that it exists. If the Commission should find the facts to be as contended for by petitioner, such finding would constitute a valid ground of defense to the demand of claimant as against petitioner. Vessels, however, would be liable.

The several sections of the Civil Code pertinent to the issues of the case provide:

"Insurance is a contract whereby one undertakes to indemnify another against loss, damage, or liability, arising from an unknown or contingent event." Civ. Code, § 2527.

"Any contingent or unknown event, whether past or future, which may damnify a person having an insurable interest, or create a liability against him, may be insured against, subject to the provisions of this chapter." Civ. Code, § 2531.

"A neglect to communicate that which a party knows, and ought to communicate, is called a concealment." Civ. Code, § 2561.

"A concealment, whether intentional or unintentional, entitles the injured party to rescind a contract of insurance." Civ. Code § 2562.

"Each party to a contract of insurance must communicate to the other, in good faith, all facts within his knowledge which are or which he believes to be material to the contract, and which the other has not the means of ascertaining, and as to which he makes no warranty." Civ. Code, § 2563.

"Materiality is to be determined not by the event, but solely by the probable and reasonable influence of the facts upon the party to whom the communication is due, in forming his estimate of the disadvantages of the proposed contract, or in making his inquiries." Civ. Code, § 2565.

"An intentional and fraudulent omission, on the part of one insured, to communicate information of matters proving or tending to prove the falsity of a warranty, entitles the insurer to rescind." Civ. Code, § 2569.

"The completion of the contract of insurance is the time to which a representation must be presumed to refer." Civ. Code, § 2577.

[3] The foregoing sections form a part of every contract of insurance to become effective by virtue of the laws of this state. They furnish sufficient authority to sustain petitioner's right to have the issue raised by it determined by the Commission.

Applying the test as to the materiality of the facts, which the foregoing code sections require must, in good faith, be communicated by one of the parties of a contract to the other, to the facts of this proceeding, little room is left for doubt as to the influence the accident would have had upon the mind and consequent actions of the insurer had it been informed by Vessels that a compensable injury had occurred to one of his employees immediately prior to his offer to complete the contract.

[4] The time that a contract of insurance is completed is fixed by the terms of section 2577, Civil Code. In Security Life Ins. Co v. Booms, 31 Cal. App. 119, 159 Pa. 1000, which was an action to recover upon a policy of life insurance, the same general principle of law which we are now considering was before the District Court of Appeal for determination. The rule making it the duty of an applicant for insurance to disclose material changes which may have occurred pending negotiations and the materiality thereof as affecting the other party is thus stated:

" 'The completion of the contract of insurance is the time to which a representation must be presumed to refer.' Civ. Code, § 2577. 'It is well settled that the obligation rests upon an applicant for life insurance to disclose such changes in his physical condition as occur pending the negotiation as would influence the judgment of the company as to the advisability of accepting the risk.' Thompson v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 13 N. D. 44 (101 N. W. 900). The decisions generally are to the same effect. See note in 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) p. 983. Since, in accordance with the section of the Civil Code quoted above, the representations contained in the application must in this case be deemed to refer to the time when the premium was paid and the policy delivered, it follows that the assured at that time represented that she had not had any of the diseases to which she returned a negative answer and had not any illness or disease other than as specifically stated by her. To say that these representations may be ignored in the instance of a person who receives a life insurance policy immediately following upon an attack of typhoid fever would be to deny one of the most important rights of the contracting party. The inherent probability that the plaintiff would have hesitated to issue a policy upon the life of Mrs. Young at that particular time raises to very substantial importance its right to have been informed of the facts."

[5] Section 2563, supra, was applied by this court in Hart v. British, etc., Ins. Co., 80 Cal. 440, 22 P. 302, an action to recover upon a policy for marine insurance upon a barge and a cargo of wheat. The applicant for insurance had information concerning the probable loss of the barge, but failed to communicate this information to the insurance company. As a matter of fact, the barge was lost at the time the policy was issued. No inquiry was made by the insurance company as to the safety of the barge and cargo, but the court nevertheless held that the failure on the part of the insured to communicate the information in his possession to the insurer constituted a concealment of a material fact which the assured was bound to communicate, and this failure entitled the insurance company to rescind the contract of insurance. The English rule is that an applicant is bound to disclose a fact material to the risk, even though no specific inquiry is made on that subject, and the weight of authority in this country favors the English rule. Bacon on Life and Accident Ins. (4th Ed.) § 270, p. 500. The statutes of this state commit our courts to the rule approved by the weight of authority. Material facts intentionally concealed or false representations made in reference to them with intent to mislead the insurer is fraud, which, at his option avoids the policy; and, where it is provided that a concealment will warrant the rescission of a contract of insurance, rescission is not an exclusive remedy, as contended by respondent Commission, and the insurer may set up the concealment in an action on the policy. 32 C. J. p. 1271. In California Co. v. New Zealand Ins. Co., 23 Cal. App. 611, 138 P. 960, it was held:

"Rescission is not the exclusive remedy of one who has become entitled to avoid a contract by reason of acts or omissions of the other party to it which are fraudulent in their nature. He may cancel the contract by its rescission; or he may seek affirmative relief in a court of equity for any injury sustained by the wrongful act or omission of the other; or he may set up the fraud by way of defense to an action brought to enforce the apparent liability. Toby v. Oregon Pac. R. R. Co., 98 Cal. 490 (33 P. 550); Field v. Austin, 131 Cal. 379 (63 P. 692); More v. More, 133 Cal. 489 (65 P. 1044); Mabry v. Randolph, 7 Cal. App. 421 (94 P. 403)."

[6] Notice of "repudiation" of the contract and a seasonable return of the premium as made by petitioner to Vessels was sufficient to inform the latter that petitioner did not recognize the contract as valid or binding. The policy being in the hands of Vessels, no cancellation could have been made by petitioner.

[7] Respondent Commission attempts to point out a distinction between a concealment of a material fact and a misrepresentation as to such fact. The legal effect in each instance amounts to the same thing, fraud.

Respondent has cited a number of cases bearing upon various phases of the law of insurance, but, as the facts in those cases are not the facts of the instant case, it is unnecessary to analyze them. As many of the cited cases turn upon the question of a preliminary parol agreement or memorial of a contract, it is proper to specifically state that there is no evidence in the record upon which that issue is sustainable, and for that reason the case must be decided upon the provisions of our statutes heretofore cited.

[8] It is the contention or suggestion of respondent Commission that the dependents of the employee have an enforceable right against petitioner under the alleged policy, even though the employer be cut off from any remedy against petitioner. We are unable to understand what principle of law would give the dependents of the employee a cause of action against petitioner upon a contract which is void or voidable as to the employer. It was said in the case of Employers' L. A. Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 177 Cal. 771, 171 P. 935:

"We may assume that any defense available to the insurance company as against Johnson, the employer, would be equally available against the employee or his dependents."

Whether the foregoing quotation be regarded as doctrine or dicta, it would seem to express an unimpeachable principle of law. 32 C. J. 1314.

[9] There can be no doubt but that the Commission is vested by constitutional and legislative power to hear and determine every issue raised by the parties to this controversy, including the validity of the policy and the question of fraud alleged in its procurement, and that the parties are not required to invoke either a court of law or equity in the determination of said questions. Article 20, § 21, Const.; Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Law, §§ 1, 55, and 63 (Laws 1913, pp. 279, 307, 308); Employers' L. A. Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 177 Cal. 771, 171 P. 935.

The sole finding of the Commission is not sustained by any evidence in the proceeding. Petitioner is entitled to a finding by the Commission on the question of whether or not the accident to the employee occurred prior to the time that Vessels paid the premium and gained possession of the policy, and whether the accident was then known to Vessels and not known to petitioner, and was by said Vessels concealed from petitioner. If these facts be found against the employer, it would be a bar to a recovery as against the petitioner. If, however, the accident occurred after the payment of the premium and delivery of the policy, claimants would be entitled to a finding to that effect and judgment accordingly.

It follows that the award made must be and it is hereby set aside. The proceeding is remanded to the Commission for further proceedings agreeable to the views herein set out.

HAAS v. GREENWALD et al. (S. F. 10602.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1925. Rehearing Denied June 25, 1925.)

1. Pleading ⊂=34(3)—No intendment indulged that pleader did not state case as strongly as possible.

No intendment can be indulged, under most liberal construction permitted by Code Civ. Proc. § 452, that pleader, omitting essential allegation, did not state case as strongly as possible.

2. Brokers ⊂=42—Attorney without real estate broker's license cannot negotiate for purchase of property by and loan to another "real estate broker."

Under Real Estate Broker's Act, § 20, attorney at law, joining with licensed brokers in negotiating for purchase of realty by and loan to another, which section 2 defines as acts constituting business of real estate broker, cannot recover commission, where not licensed as required by section 1, though acts constituted single transaction not in course of business as real estate broker.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Real Estate Broker.]

3. Courts ⊂=107—Supreme Court, taking note of particular provision in stating contents of act, presumed to have approved it in sustaining constitutionality of act as whole.

Where Supreme Court, in stating contents of Real Estate Brokers' Act, took note of provision of section 2 that single act of selling, etc., should make person a real estate broker, required to obtain license, it must be concluded that it had in mind and approved such feature in sustaining constitutionality of act as whole.

4. Constitutional law ⊂=89(1)—Licenses ⊂=7(1)—Act, requiring broker's license to perform single act of selling, etc., for compensation, held not unconstitutional.

Real Estate Brokers' Act, § 2, providing that single act of selling, etc., for compensation shall make one a real estate broker, required to obtain license, held not unconstitutional as interfering with freedom of contract, in view of provisions that act shall not apply to persons performing such acts with reference to their own property or under power of attorney from owner.

5. Brokers ⊂=42—Contract by three brokers, one of whom was unlicensed, held void in entirety.

Contract by attorney at law, not licensed as real estate broker, and two licensed brokers, to negotiate for purchase of realty by and loan to another, held void in entirety, under Civ. Code, § 1608, as in violation of section 1667 in respect to such attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by H. C. Haas against L. Greenwald and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

William F. Humphrey, Lent & Humphrey, and Robert Mack Light, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment entered upon an order sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's amended complaint without leave to amend. The action was one commenced by the plaintiff on his own behalf, and also as the assignee of one A. M. Johnson, who prior thereto had assigned and transferred to said plaintiff all of his right, title, and interest in the claim and demand which formed the basis of said action. The amended complaint, after alleging the corporate character of the Santa Marina Company and its ownership of the tract of land with reference to which the transaction occurred out of which the claim and demand sued upon arose, and after also alleging the corporate character of the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, connected with said transaction, proceeds to allege that:

"On and prior to the 14th day of November, 1921, the above-named defendant L. Greenwald was desirous of purchasing said real property hereinabove particularly described, together with the improvements thereon, from said the Santa Marina Company, a corporation, for the sum of $650,000 net to said the Santa Marina Company, and in order to permit said purchase to be made by him to negotiate a loan from said Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, a corporation, for $450,000, the repayment of which loan should be secured by a first mortgage upon said real property hereinabove described when so purchased by said defendant L. Greenwald, $50,000 of which was to be repaid by said L. Greenwald to said Hibernia Savings & Loan Society in 60 installments of $833.33 per month, and the remaining $400,000 to be repaid on or before five years from the date of such loan, said $450,000 to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. On or about the 14th day of November, 1921, the above-named defendant L. Greenwald employed the above-named plaintiff, H. C. Haas, A. M. Johnson and the defendant Walter W. Stevens, to negotiate on his behalf with said the Santa Marina Company, a corporation, for and to effect a sale by said the Santa Marina Company, a corporation, to said defendant L. Greenwald, of said real property hereinabove described, together with the improvements thereon for said sum of $650,000 net to said the Santa Marina Company, a corporation, and to negotiate and procure from said Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, a corporation, said loan of $450,000 bearing the interest hereinabove set forth and payable in the manner hereinabove specified, the repayment of which was to be secured by a first mortgage upon said real property hereinabove described, and in consideration of the services to be thereafter rendered by said plaintiff and said A. M. Johnson and said defendant Walter W. Stevens in negotiating and effecting said sale of said real property to said defendant L. Greenwald, for said sum aforesaid, and negotiating and procuring said loan aforesaid, agreed that if said plaintiff and said A. M. Johnson and said defendant Walter W. Stevens negotiated and effected said sale by said corporation, Santa Marina Company, to said defendant of said real property, together with the improvements thereon, for said sum of $650,000, net to it and negotiated and procured from said Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, a corporation, said loan of $450,000 aforesaid, he would, when said services were completed, and in consideration thereof, pay to said plaintiff and said A. M. Johnson and said defendant Walter W. Stevens the sum of $20,000, or execute and deliver to them his promissory note or notes for said sum of $20,000. Thereafter and prior to November 21, 1921, said plaintiff and said A. M. Johnson and said defendant Walter W. Stevens, negotiated with said the Santa Marina Company, a corporation, for the sale of said real property to said L. Greenwald, and as a result of said negotiations prior to and on said November 21, 1921, said the Santa Marina Company, a corporation, was willing and agreed to sell said real property, together with said improvements, to said defendant L. Greenwald for said sum of $650,000 net to it. On said 21st day of November, 1921, said the Santa Marina Company, a corporation, was able, ready and willing to sell to said defendant L. Greenwald said real property, together with said improvements, for said sum of $650,000 net to it. Prior to said 21st day of November, 1921, said plaintiff and said A. M. Johnson and said defendant Walter W. Stevens negotiated with said Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, a corporation, for said loan of said $450,000 upon said terms aforesaid, and prior to said November 21, 1921, had arranged with said Hibernia Savings & Loan Society for, and had procured from it for said defendant L. Greenwald, said loan of $450,000, the repayment of which loan was to be secured by a first mortgage upon said real property hereinabove described, together with the improvements thereon, when so purchased by said defendant L. Greenwald, $50,000 of which was to be repaid by said defendant L. Greenwald to said Hibernia Savings & Loan Society in 60 installments of $833.33 per month, and the remaining $400,000 to be repaid on or before five years from the date of such loan, said $450,000 to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. Said loan so negotiated and procured by said plaintiff and said A. M. Johnson and said defendant Walter W. Stevens and the terms thereof were acceptable to and accepted by said defendant L. Greenwald. Thereafter and on said 21st day of November, 1921, said defendant L. Greenwald repudiated said agreement so entered into by him with said plaintiff and said A. M. Johnson and said defendant Walter W. Stevens as aforesaid, and refused to proceed further with the purchase of said real property or to accept said loan, and without any cause or justification therefor notified said plaintiff and said A. M. Johnson and said defendant Walter W. Stevens that he would refuse to further proceed with the purchase of or purchase said real property or any part thereof, and would refuse to accept or consummate said loan aforesaid, and repudiated his said agreement with said plaintiff and said A. M. Johnson and said Walter W. Stevens. Ever since said 21st day of November, 1921, said defendant L. Greenwald has refused to purchase said real property and said improvements or any part thereof, and has refused to accept or consummate said loan aforesaid. Said defendant L. Greenwald has refused, and still refuses, to pay to said plaintiff and said A. M. Johnson and said defendant Walter W Stevens, or any of them, said sum of $20,000, or to make, execute or deliver to them, or any of them, his said note or notes for the sum of $20,000 or any other sum. The said defendant Walter W. Stevens is made a defendant in this action for the reason that he refuses to join in said action with said plaintiff. On the 8th day of December, 1921, said A. M. Johnson assigned, transferred and set over to the above-named plaintiff, H. C. Haas, all of his right, title and interest in said claim against said defendant L. Greenwald, arising out of the rendition of said services and the making of said agreement by said defendant L. Greenwald as aforesaid, and all moneys due thereon. At all of the times herein mentioned the above-named plaintiff, H. C. Haas, and the above-named defendant Walter W. Stevens were and are real estate brokers, and each of them was and is a real estate broker engaged in the business of buying and selling real property in the city and county of San Francisco and elsewhere in the state of California, and at all of the times herein mentioned were and are, and each of them was and is duly and regularly licensed to engage in said business under the laws of the state of California. At all of the times herein mentioned said A. M. Johnson was, he ever since has been, and still is an attorney at law, duly licensed to practice, and practicing his profession as such in the state of California, all of which facts at all of said times were and still are known to defendants. Said A. M. Johnson is not now, and never has been, engaged in business as a real estate broker, and never has been and is not now a real estate broker or engaged in the business of buying, selling, exchanging or handling real property, all of which facts at all of said times were and still are known to defendants."

We have set forth the averments of said amended complaint thus literally in order that exact application may be made of the provisions of the statute under the inhibitions of which it was successfully contended in the trial court that said complaint failed to state a cause of action. The gravamen of this contention centers upon A. M. Johnson, who, as the amended complaint alleges, was one of the three persons who jointly engaged in the negotiations upon which the claim sued upon is predicated and, who, it is contended, comes within the inhibitions of said statute with regard to his participation in such negotiations. The statute in question is known as the "Real Estate Brokers' Act" (Stats. 1919, p. 1252). By section 1 of said act it is provided:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, copartnership or corporation to engage in the business, or act in the capacity of a real estate broker, or a real estate salesman within this state without first obtaining a license therefor."

Section 2 of said act reads as follows:

"A real estate broker within the meaning of this act is a person, copartnership or corporation who, for a compensation, sells, or offers for sale, buys, or offers to buy, or negotiates the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate, or who, for compensation, negotiates loans on real estate, leases, or offers to lease, rents, or places for rent, or collects rent from real estate, or improvements thereon, for others as a whole or partial vocation. A real estate salesman within the meaning of this act is one who for a compensation is employed by a licensed broker to sell, or offer for sale, or to buy, or to offer to buy, or to negotiate the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate, or to negotiate a loan on real estate, or to lease, or offer to lease, rent, or place for rent, any real estate, or improvements thereon, as a whole or partial vocation. The provisions of this act shall not apply to any person, copartnership or corporation who shall perform any of the acts aforesaid with reference to property owned by such person, copartnership or corporation; nor shall the provisions of this act apply to persons holding a duly executed power of attorney from the owner, nor shall this act be construed to include in any way the services rendered by an attorney at law in performing his duties as such attorney at law; nor shall it be held to include any receiver, trustee in bankruptcy, or any person acting under order of any court, nor to a trustee selling under a deed of trust. One act, for a compensation, of buying or selling real estate of or for another, or offering for another to buy or sell or exchange real estate, or negotiating a loan on or leasing or renting or placing for rent real estate, or collecting rent therefrom shall constitute the person, copartnership or corporation making such offer, sale or purchase, exchange or lease, or negotiating said loan, or so renting or placing for rent or collecting said rent a real estate broker within the meaning of this act."

By section 20 of said act it is provided:

"No person, copartnership or corporation engaged in the business of acting in the capacity of a real estate broker or a real estate salesman within this state shall bring or maintain any action in the courts of this state for the collection of compensation for the performance of any of the acts mentioned in section two thereof without alleging and proving that such person, copartnership or corporation was a duly licensed real estate broker or real estate salesman at the time the alleged cause of action arose."

[1] Under the provisions of the section last above quoted it would seem to be clear that if A. M. Johnson, as one of the three persons who are alleged in said amended complaint to have been combined in conducting the negotiations for, and on behalf of, the defendant Greenwald, out of which both the plaintiff's original and assigned claim and demand arose, comes as to the acts done by him within the definitions and inhibitions embraced in the earlier sections of the act above quoted, this action, in so far at least as it involved his assigned claim, must fail. The said A. M. Johnson is alleged in said amended complaint to be, and during all of the time covered by said negotiations to have been, an attorney at law. By the terms of section 2 of said act the provisions thereof are not to "be construed to include in any way the services rendered by an attorney at law in performing his duties as such attorney at law." If the amended complaint herein had alleged that any services rendered by said A. M. Johnson to the defendant in the course of the negotiations, which are fully detailed in said complaint in his capacity as an attorney at law or in the performance of his duties as such attorney at law, or had even alleged that said A. M. Johnson, during the course of said negotiations, represented either said Greenwald or any other person, who was a party to such negotiations, as or in the capacity of an attorney at law, a different question would be presented. But the amended complaint herein is barren of any such allegation, and giving to such pleading the most liberal construction permitted by section 452 of the Code of Civil Procedure no intendment can be indulged in that the pleader has not stated his case as strongly as it was possible so to do. Nason v. Lingle, 143 Cal. 363–366, 77 P. 71; Cal. Navigation Co. v. Union, etc., Co., 122 Cal. 641, 55 P. 591; Glide v. Dwyer, 83 Cal. 477, 23 P. 706; Hays v. Steiger, 76 Cal. 555, 18 P. 670.

[2] The particular negotiations which the plaintiff and his two associates, A. M. Johnson and Walter W. Stevens, are alleged to have conducted were twofold in character. First, a negotiation on behalf of the defendant Greenwald for the purchase by the latter of certain real estate from the Santa Marina Company; second, a negotiation on behalf of said Greenwald for a loan to him by the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society of a sum of money, as and for a large portion of the purchase price of said property, and to be secured by a mortgage thereon. These twofold negotiations come expressly within the terms of the opening clauses of section 2 of said act defining the doing of what acts shall constitute a person, firm, or corporation "a real estate broker." It could not be, and in fact is not, questioned, but, on the other hand, expressly affirmed, that the plaintiff, Haas, was, as to his part in said negotiations, acting as a real estate broker and by virtue of his license issued under the terms of said act so to do. The same is true as to his associate, W. W. Stevens, who held and was acting under and by virtue of a similar license. If the part which these two associates took in the conduct of such negotiations was thus taken in the capacity of real estate brokers, and not otherwise, it is difficult to perceive why the precisely identical part which A. M. Johnson, united with his said two associates in undertaking in relation to these negotiations, was not also undertaken in the capacity of a real estate broker and not otherwise, notwithstanding he was also an attorney at law, especially in view of the fact that the amended complaint is barren of any averment that his said part therein was undertaken or performed in his capacity as an attorney at law. It would seem to follow irresistibly that in the equal part which A. M. Johnson took with his associates in the conduct of these negotiations he was acting in the capacity of a real estate broker, and not of an attorney at law.

It is, however, contended by the appellant herein that conceding that A. M. Johnson did act in the part he took in said negotiations in the capacity of a real estate broker, his action in so doing was only in a single though twofold transaction, and not in a course of business as a real estate broker, and hence that the inhibitive provisions of said act do not apply to him. This argument, with the authorities which are cited in support of it, might have some cogency but for the express and unmistakable terms of the statute to the contrary. The language of the concluding clause of section 2 of the act is as follows:

"One act, for a compensation, of buying or selling real estate of or for another, or offering for another to buy or sell or exchange real estate, or negotiating a loan on or leasing or renting or placing for rent real estate, or collecting rent therefrom shall constitute the person, copartnership or corporation making such offer, sale or purchase, exchange or lease, or negotiating said loan, or so renting or placing for rent or collecting said rent a real estate broker within the meaning of this act."

[3] The particularity with which this clause in said act is phrased leaves no room for any other interpretation than that which its plain terms import, and which are not rendered uncertain by any other phrase or clause which said section of said act or which act as a whole contains. The authorities cited in support of the appellant's position in this regard do not sustain it for the reason, as is well illustrated by the case of Miller v. Stevens, 224 Mich. 626, 195 N. W. 481, mainly relied upon by appellant, that the statute under review in said decision omitted this very provision which our statute contains, rendering a single act of the character defined, for a compensation, sufficient to constitute the person performing it a real estate broker. The appellant discusses this phase of the case chiefly under his next contention, which is that the act, in so far as it seeks to prohibit one individual from employing another to purchase, sell, or negotiate the sale of property, or to secure a loan thereon, or to handle any single transaction in regard to such property, is an unconstitutional exercise of power on the part of the Legislature. In making this contention the appellant concedes that this court in the case of Riley v. Chambers, 181 Cal. 591, 185 P. 855, 8 A. L. R. 418, upheld the general features of the Real Estate Brokers' Act in so far as said act undertakes to regulate the business or vocation of handling real estate transactions, and to that extent determined the constitutionality of the act. An examination of that case, however, shows that this court went much further than the appellant's concession, since in its statement of the contents of said act this court took note of the language therein providing "that a single act of selling, etc., shall make a person a real estate broker."

[4] It must be concluded therefore that in its discussion of the purposes and policy of said act, and in sustaining its constitutionality as a whole, this court had in mind this particular feature thereof, and approved it in approving the act as a whole. But, aside from this reasoning as to what has already been decided, we are of the opinion that the act, in designating the several particular acts mentioned in the concluding clause of section 2 of said act as within its inhibitions, violated no constitutional right of the parties to the transactions involved herein or any of them, in so far as the principle of freedom of contract is concerned. It is to be noted that, in the preceding clauses of section 2 of said act, the right of two or more persons to engage in doing any of the acts enumerated in said section as constituting one or more of said persons "a real estate broker" is perfectly preserved by the provision therein that:

"The provisions of this act shall not apply to any person, copartnership or corporation who shall perform any of the acts aforesaid with reference to property owned by such person, copartnership or corporation; nor shall the provisions of this act apply to persons holding a duly executed power of attorney from the owner."

It is only when persons, firms, or corporations are acting in a purely representative capacity in undertaking to conduct negotiations of the kind specified in said act, and when such persons or entities have not come into that particular relationship to the owner of the property involved in such negotiations, as finds expression in a power of attorney, that the safeguards of the statute are sought to be thrown around the principals to the transaction in question through the requirement that the agent or agents undertaking to conduct or consummate the same shall have that approved character, which the possession of the required license assures. No particular or convincing reason can be urged why the participants in a single negotiation of the sort defined in said act should not be subjected to the same supervision as those engaging in a series of similar transactions, since at the last analysis every transaction of the kind coming within the purview of the statute is an isolated transaction whether conducted singly or as a series of transactions carried on in the course of a business or vocation, and since the lawmakers have seen fit to embrace the participants in each single transaction within the purview, requirements, and inhibitions of the act in question, we can see no adequate reason for holding that in so doing they have violated the constitutional right of freedom to contract any more than they would have done by confining the scope of the statute to those carrying on such transactions in the course of a business or vocation. The cases upon which the appellant relies are as applicable to the one as to the other situation, and are sufficiently answered, we think, by the comprehensive treatment of the subject in the case of Riley v. Chambers, supra.

[5] The only remaining question involved in this case is that for the first time suggested upon this appeal, viz.: That, conceding the contract for the services in question to have been unenforceable on behalf of A. M. Johnson for the foregoing reasons, it was valid as to the plaintiff and his associate Stevens, since each of the two persons held a real estate broker's license. The difficulty with this contention is that the plaintiff herein has in the single count in his amended complaint set forth the contract for services upon which he seeks to recover both on his own behalf and on that of his assignor, A. M. Johnson, as one in the execution of which he and his said associates were jointly enlisted, and in which the services of all made possible the recovery of each. This constituted the consideration for the agreement. If any part thereof was unlawful, the entire contract was void (Civ. Code, § 1608). The portion of said agreement which related to the employment and service of A. M. Johnson was, as we have seen, unlawful, because in violation of an express provision of law (Civ. Code, § 1667). In commenting upon these sections of the Civil Code this court, in the case of Teachout v. Bogy, 175 Cal. 481, 486, 166 P. 319, 321, aptly quoted from the Ency. of Law and Procedure the following words:

"If any part of a single consideration for one or more promises be illegal, or if there are several considerations for one promise, some of which are legal and others illegal, the promise is wholly void, as it is impossible to say which part or which one of the considerations induced the promise." 9 Cyc. 566.

We conclude from the foregoing considerations that the agreement for the joint and equal services of Haas, Johnson, and Stevens in the capacity of real estate brokers, being unenforceable as to Johnson under the terms of the Real Estate Brokers' Act, the entire agreement was void, and hence that the trial court was not in error in sustaining the demurrer to the amended complaint, and in its judgment in favor of the defendant Greenwald based upon said order.

The judgment is affirmed.

McGUINNESS et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 11159.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1925.)

1. Divorce ⟸165(2) — Prohibition ⟸15 — Legatees held entitled to contest motion by decedent's widow to vacate final divorce decree and to maintain prohibition proceeding against hearing such motion.

Legatees under decedent's will had legal capacity to contest motion by decedent's widow to vacate final divorce decree obtained by decedent without her knowledge or consent, and to maintain prohibition proceedings against hearing of such motion.

2. Divorce ⟸170—Mandamus ⟸51—Entry of final decree is ministerial act, which court must perform on motion of either party.

Under Civ. Code, § 132, entry of final divorce decree after expiration of one year from interlocutory decree is ministerial act, which court must perform on motion of either party ex parte whenever facts are shown entitling movant to final decree, and mandamus may be invoked to compel court to perform such duty.

3. Divorce ⟸165(3) — Final decree obtained by husband without notice to wife held extrinsic fraud which court had inherent power to vacate.

Where, after interlocutory divorce decree, parties became reconciled and resumed marital relations, husband's act in procuring final divorce decree without notice to or knowledge by wife, and without informing court of reconciliation, was extrinsic fraud, for which court had inherent power to vacate decree even after expiration of time prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

4. Judgment ⟸386(7) — Court has inherent power to vacate judgment obtained by fraud after expiration of statutory time.

Court of general jurisdiction has inherent power to vacate judgment obtained by fraud after expiration of period prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, provided motion therefor is made within reasonable time; what is reasonable time being matter of sound legal discretion in court in which motion is made.

5. Divorce ⟸83 — Court retains its inherent jurisdiction to correct records after death of husband.

Though divorce action abated on death of husband in so far as issue of marital relations was concerned, court retained its inherent power and jurisdiction to entertain motion to vacate final decree obtained by husband's extrinsic fraud, notwithstanding property rights were not involved in action, nor mentioned in decrees.

Application for prohibition by Henry McGuinness, as executor of the will of James S. White, and individually as legatee under said will, and another, to be directed to the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco and E. P. Mogan, Judge thereof. Writ denied.

Chenoweth & Leininger, of Redding, and Maxwell McNutt, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

R. A. Rogers, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioners seek by this proceeding to have this court issue a writ of prohibition which will have the effect of restraining the respondents, superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco and the judge thereof, from taking further proceedings in a certain action entitled "Josie White, plaintiff, versus James S. White, defendant," and numbered therein 69960, and which had theretofore been pending in said court. The matter came on for hearing upon a demurrer and also an answer to the petition, the denials in which were not insisted upon at the hearing or upon the rehearing; the only matters presented being the questions of law raised by the demurrer. The conceded facts in the case are that in the year 1915 Josie White commenced an action in said superior court wherein she sought a divorce upon the ground of extreme cruelty. In the complaint therein there was no allegation as to property rights, nor did the answer of the defendant raise any such issue. Upon the trial and submission of the cause the court, on December, 14, 1915, duly gave, made, and entered its interlocutory decree in favor of the plaintiff, adjudging her to be entitled to a divorce upon the specified ground, but being silent upon the subject of the property rights, if any, of the parties to the action. Succeeding that date and decree the record in the case was silent until the 3d day of July, 1923, when it appears that upon motion of the defendant a final decree was entered dissolving the marriage relation between the parties to said action, but which final degree was also silent as to any mention or adjudication of property rights. Thereafter, and on the 17th day of October, 1923, James S. White, the defendant in said action, died, leaving a last will and testament in which Josie White, his divorced wife, was omitted from any mention or bequest. Said will was offered for and admitted to probate in the probate department of said court, and the petitioner herein, who was named in said will as the executor thereof, was duly appointed to serve and is serving as such executor. Thereafter, and on January 24, 1924, Josie White filed in said superior court and in said divorce action a notice of motion to set aside said final decree of divorce, wherein she set forth as the basis of said motion the alleged fact that during the several years elapsing between the making and entry of the interlocutory decree and the aforesaid final decree the parties to said action had lived together as husband and wife, and were so living at the time of the making and entry of said final decree of divorce upon the defendant's motion; and that said final decree had been so entered without her knowledge or consent. The petitioner herein, Henry McGuinness, in his capacity as executor of said will, and also as a legatee thereunder, and the petitioner herein, John Maher, also as a legatee under said will, appeared specially in response to said notice of motion, and objected to the hearing or granting of the same upon the ground that the said superior court had lost jurisdiction therein and in said action, and that it had no jurisdiction over said action other than to decline to hear and either to grant or deny said motion. Upon the hearing, upon said motion and these special appearances and objections thereto the said superior court, through the judge thereof, who is also respondent herein, decided that it had and has jurisdiction to entertain said motion, and set the hearing thereon for the 22d day of May, 1924. Thereupon, and on May 20, 1924, the petitioners herein applied to this court for and were granted an alternative writ of prohibition restraining said superior court from further proceeding in said action and upon said motion, except to dismiss or deny the same until the hearing upon said writ. Upon said hearing the petitioners insisted, and still insist, that the respondent superior court and the judge thereof is without any jurisdiction to hear or pass upon the said motion of Josie White for an order setting aside the final decree in said divorce action for the reasons set forth in their said petition. The respondents, on the other hand, insist that, since it appears upon the face of the notice of motion to set aside said final decree, as the ground thereof, the entry of said final decree in said action was procured by extrinsic fraud on the part of said James S. White, the defendant therein, consisting in his concealment of the asserted fact that for the several years elapsing between the making and entry of the interlocutory decree in said action and the date of said final decree the said parties to said action had been and still were living together in the relation of husband and wife; and that the said court, being deceived and misled by such concealment, had been fraudulently induced to sign and enter said final decree, the said court, notwithstanding the intermediate death of said James S. White, had and has power and jurisdiction either upon motion of the plaintiff in said divorce action or upon its own motion to act in the matter of investigating said alleged acts of extrinsic fraud, and, in the event of finding its existence, to purge its records of the decree obtained through its exercise. The respondents herein, the said superior court and the judge thereof, in their answer herein allege the fact to be that the said court is engaged upon its own motion in conducting an investigation as to whether or not such fraud was committed upon said court in the procurement of said final decree, and that it has not yet directly or indirectly intimated what the judgment of the court will be as a result of such investigation.

[1] The first contention which the respondents herein make upon the threshold of this proceeding is that the petitioner, Henry McGuinness, in his capacity as executor of the will of James S. White, deceased, and that both of the petitioners herein in their capacity as legatees under said will, have no legal capacity to appear either in said divorce action or in this proceeding in opposition of the effort of Josie White to have set aside the final decree of divorce therein. We think this contention is without merit, since, assuming that the power and duty of an executor to intervene in an action which involved only the personal status of his testator in a divorce action has been doubted in the case of Kirschner v. Dietrich, 110 Cal. 502, 42 P. 1064, the executor and petitioner herein appears, not alone in the capacity of executor, but he and his associate petitioner, Maher, herein also appear in the capacity of legatees under the will of the deceased defendant in the divorce action; and, since whatever the purpose which the plaintiff has in that proceeding the obvious effect of her success therein would be that of re-establishing the status existing between herself and her deceased husband prior to the entry of said final decree as the undivorced wife of said deceased, and since the re-establishment of this status would entitle her to assert certain wifely rights in relation to the property of said estate in which as legatees they each have an interest and which, if so asserted, they would admittedly have a right to resist, they claim to have an equal right to appear at the very inception of the plaintiff's effort to obtain standing ground for the assertion of such rights and to oppose such effort. No authorities are cited contravening this reasoning and we are satisfied none exist.

This brings us to the only remaining inquiry herein which is as to whether the trial court in the divorce action, or the judge thereof, the respondents herein, retains or has any jurisdiction either upon the motion of the plaintiff in said action or upon its own motion to consider or decide the question as to whether the final decree of divorce therein was caused to be made and entered by the fraud of the defendant in said action practiced upon it and whereby it was misled into granting and entering said final decree. The petitioners herein assert that the trial court in said action retains and has no such jurisdiction, basing their contention in that regard upon two several reasons: First, that said final decree of divorce being valid upon its face, the trial court has no jurisdiction to set it aside either upon the plaintiff's motion or upon its own motion after the expiration of the six months' period prescribed in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure; second, that, the defendant in said divorce action having died subsequent to the entry of said final decree, the action was thereby abated, and is no longer pending in said court, for the reason that the marriage relation between the parties has been dissolved by the defendant's decease. For the purpose of passing upon each of these objections it must be assumed in the state of the record before us that the averments made by the wife as to the basis of her application for the relief in the divorce court are true; that a reconciliation had taken place between the parties to said divorce action shortly after the entry of the interlocutory decree therein; that they had reassumed their marital relations, and thereafter continued living together as husband and wife for several years, and were so living together in that relation when the husband, unknown to the wife, procured the entry of the final decree of divorce; that in so doing he had committed a fraud upon her and upon the court through his action in procuring said decree and through his fraudulent concealment from the court, at the time of his application for and of the entry of said final decree, of the fact of such reconciliation and consequent resumption and existence of marital relations between himself and his wife; and that the court by such concealment was deceived and misled into granting and entering said final decree of divorce. These facts being thus, for the purposes of this proceeding taken to be true, the primary question arises as to whether they constitute intrinsic or extrinsic fraud. If the former, it would seem to be settled under the authorities that, the time for appeal from said decree having expired, and the time for seeking relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure having elapsed prior to the application of the plaintiff in that action to have said decree set aside, the trial court had lost jurisdiction over said action to grant relief under said section. People v. Mooney, 178 Cal. 525, 530, 174 P. 325.

[2, 3] We do not think, however, that the facts of this case as above outlined constitute this a case of intrinsic fraud, as that term is defined in the case of People v. Mooney, supra, or in the case of Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 P. 970, 27 P. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159, or in the case of Flood v. Templeton, 152 Cal. 148, 92 P. 78, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 579, or in the case of United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 66, 25 L. Ed. 93, upon the reasoning in which latter case the former three cases were decided. In each of the three former cases the fraud which was held to be or defined as intrinsic fraud was such as occurred in the course of an adversary proceeding; such as the production of perjured testimony or forged documents during a trial wherein the adversary party had the opportunity to make the truth appear. In the case of United States v. Throckmorton, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States, after instancing situations in which the fraud practiced upon the adversary party or the court would be intrinsic fraud, points out the line of demarcation between these instances and those wherein by reason of something done by the successful party to a suit there was in fact no adversary trial or decision of the issue in the case, as "where the unsuccessful party has been prevented from fully exhibiting his case by fraud or deception practiced upon him by his opponent, as by keeping him away from court by a false promise of a compromise; or where the defendant never had knowledge of the suit, being kept in ignorance by the acts of the plaintiff; or where an attorney fraudulently or without authority assumes to represent a party and connives at his defeat; or where an attorney regularly employed corruptly sells out his client's interest to the other side—these and similar cases which show that there has never been a real contest in the trial or hearing of the case"; such are, in the view of that tribunal, instances of extrinsic fraud. In the recent case of Simonton v. Los Angeles Trust and Savings Bank, 192 Cal. 651, 221 P. 368, it was held by this court that the fraudulent concealment or omission through mistake of an executrix to account for personal property belonging to the estate of the decedent with the result that such property was appropriated by such executrix for her own personal use and benefit constituted extrinsic fraud, and this court in that case cited numerous other cases in this and other courts supporting the principle illustrated in the Throckmorton Case. It seems to us that the facts of this case bring it by clear analogy within the doctrines thus laid down defining cases of extrinsic fraud. In the case in hand there was no adversary proceeding attending or embracing the action of the court in the divorce action at the time of the application for and entry of the final decree. Section 132 of the Civil Code provides that, when one year has expired after the entry of an interlocutory judgment in a divorce action, the court, "on motion of either party, or upon its own motion, may enter the final judgment granting the divorce." Such final decree may be entered ex parte, and its entry by the court is in the nature of a ministerial act which the court must, on motion of either party, perform whenever the facts are shown entitling the movant to such final decree and which mandamus may be invoked to compel the court to perform in a proper case. It was so held by this court in the case of Olson v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 250, 165 P. 706, 1 A. L. R. 1589. In the instant case the wife not only had no knowledge of her husband's action in seeking and obtaining the entry of such final decree, and hence no opportunity to appear and resist such action, but by the reconciliation and resumption of marital relations between herself and her husband and by long years of cohabitation she had apparently been led to regard the divorce proceedings between them as obliterated and their marital union as completely restored. That her husband, having resumed and while occupying these relations toward her, should have covertly sought the divorce court, ex parte, and without any notice or knowledge imparted to her, have there caused to be entered a decree of final divorce apparently in her favor, but which would have the effect of rendering the relations between himself and his former wife meretricious, was, upon the face of the showing thus far made in this proceeding, a fraud of the most despicable quality, and was a fraud which was essentially extrinsic in character, since it was such a fraud as she had no opportunity to combat or protect herself against in the proceeding by which ex parte and through an imposition practiced upon the court he obtained the entry of said final decree. It was also extrinsic fraud in so far as the court itself granting such decree was concerned, since it was effected through concealment from the court in an ex parte proceeding of facts which the defendant in said action was bound to disclose, and which, if disclosed, would have rendered improper the granting and impossible the procurement of such final decree. In the case of Olson v. Superior Court, supra, it was pointed out that one of the great purposes of the law enforcing the delay of one year before the absolute severance of marriage ties was to provide a period during which the parties might become reconciled, and thus avoid the unhappy consequence of a final decree of divorce; and that, where such reconciliation had occurred, and the parties were living together in their restored marital relationship, it would be a grave reproach upon our jurisprudence that a final decree of divorce could be forced upon a blameless and nonconsenting wife after such reconciliation. Yet this is precisely what would be accomplished in this case if the fraud practiced upon both the plaintiff and the court were held to be intrinsic, and thus beyond the power of the court to avoid its consequence after the time for appeal and for application under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure had expired.

[4] The petitioners, however, contend that whether the fraud be extrinsic or intrinsic is immaterial, since the final decree is valid upon its face, and that a judgment, no matter how much tinctured with either form of fraud if not void upon its face, is only assailable in the court in which it is rendered under and within the time provided in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The cases cited by the petitioners in support of this contention do not support it. In the case of People v. Dodge, 104 Cal. 487, 38 P. 203, the ground for the relief sought was not fraud, but was an alleged defective service of summons. The case of People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 P. 651, was a similar case, involving no question of fraud in the procurement sought to be set aside. The case of Suttman v. Superior Court, 174 Cal. 243, 162 P. 1032, while it arose out of an action for divorce, and involved the erroneous action of the trial court in setting aside an interlocutory decree without notice to the adversary party thereto, involved no issue of fraud. The case of Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 359, 173 P. 579, was a proceeding wherein one of the parties to a previous action for divorce was seeking relief in an independent action in equity from a decree of divorce obtained through a collusive agreement between the parties to such divorce action, and the language of the court cited by counsel was used in commenting upon certain other cases wherein relief had been sought under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is to be confined in its application to the particular cases to which it referred. On the other hand, this court, in the case of Ex-Mission L. & W. Co. v. Flash, 97 Cal. 610, 32 P. 600, has held that a motion to set aside a judgment upon the ground of fraud in its procurement is not subject to the six-month limitation provided in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and in the opinion in that case it is pointed out by the court that said section of the Code, while providing for relief in cases of "mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect," does not include "fraud" among the grounds upon which relief from a void or voidable judgment may be sought under its terms. In the case of Williams v. Reed, 43 Cal. App. 425, 185 P. 515, it was held that the trial court has inherent power to set aside a judgment obtained through a fraud upon the court, and that its right to so act or grant relief is not derived from section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is true, as the petitioners assert, that this holding may have been obiter in that case. It is also true that it rests for its authority upon the case of Stierlen v. Stierlen, 18 Cal. App. 609, 124 P. 226, 228, wherein similar language is employed, and that certain broad language in the latter case was disapproved by this court upon its denial of a petition for rehearing therein, but the Stierlen Case was, as to its facts, a case wherein the motion made in the trial court was one to set aside a judgment in an action for divorce obtained through fraud committed both upon the court and the adverse party; and, while certain language of the appellate court in dealing with this phase of the case was so broad as to apply to all void judgments and hence was properly subject to the criticism made upon rehearing, the unmodified portion of the opinion in that case correctly states the rule to be that "the power to vacate upon motion a judgment obtained by fraud is inherent in courts of general jurisdiction, and that the same may be exercised after the lapse of the statutory time which limits the entertainment of applications based upon surprise, inadvertence, and so forth, provided that such motions are made within a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time is a matter of sound legal discretion in the court in which the motion is made." We are therefore of the opinion that there is no merit in the petitioners' contention that the plaintiff in the divorce action had lost the right to make her motion to set aside said final decree in the trial court upon the ground of fraud committed upon herself and upon the court in its procurement, because her said motion was not made within the time prescribed in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[5] This brings us to the second and most serious contention of the petitioners herein, which is that, the divorce action being one brought solely to sever the marriage relation between the parties thereto, and in which no property rights of the parties were involved, and both the interlocutory and final decrees in said action being confined to such purpose, the said action abated upon the death of the party defendant subsequent to the entry of said final decree, and the trial court thereby lost jurisdiction to take any action whatever in said case. The petitioners in making this contention rely strongly upon the cases of Begbie v. Begbie, 128 Cal. 154, 60 P. 667, 49 L. R. A. 141, and of Kirschner v. Dietrich, 110 Cal. 502, 42 P. 1064, as fully sustaining their said contention. The case of Begbie v. Begbie, supra, was one in which the court dismissed an appeal taken in a divorce action upon the ground that, the defendant having died after the entry of the decree of divorce, and the divorce action being one brought solely for the purposes of establishing her personal status as the wife of the plaintiff, the action had abated upon her death, and this court had thereby become deprived of the right to review the action of the trial court upon appeal. No question as to the right of the trial court to entertain a proceeding to purge its record of a decree of divorce fraudulently obtained was presented in that case. The court in its ruling relied upon its earlier decision in the case of Kirschner v. Dietrich, supra. The facts of the latter case and the relief sought therein differ, however, essentially from those of the case at bar. In that case there had been a judgment of divorce obtained by the wife upon service of summons by publication. The judgment in the plaintiff's favor was entered July 13, 1893. The plaintiff died February 22, 1894. An administrator was appointed in her estate. On June 8, 1894, the trial court made an order on motion of the defendant in the divorce action directing the substitution of the administrator of the deceased wife as a party plaintiff in her stead, and directing that the action be continued in the name of such administrator. Thereafter the defendant, on notice to such administrator, moved the court under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure to vacate the judgment of divorce, and that he be allowed to answer the complaint upon the ground that the summons had not been personally served upon him, and that the judgment was void, because procured by false testimony. The court denied his said motion. The defendant appealed. Under the foregoing state of facts this court held, and we think properly, that, since the purpose of the defendant in making his said motion was to reopen and litigate the question as to whether the plaintiff was entitled to a decree of divorce, the plaintiff's death by severing the marital relation between the parties had abated the action which had that as its sole purpose, and hence deprived the court in which said action had been pending of all power to review its action and determine her right to a divorce. But the case at bar presents an essentially different situation. The plaintiff by her motion made in the divorce action is not seeking to reopen said action for the purpose of further litigating the question as to whether she, or the defendant either, is entitled to a divorce. That question has been settled by the defendant's death, and as to it or any further litigation regarding it in said action it has been abated. But the plaintiff, notwithstanding the abatement of the action in so far as the issues therein are involved, is seeking to invoke the power of the court over its own records, by suggesting and offering to show to the court that it has been imposed upon by the extrinsically fraudulent acts and concealments of the defendant while living with the plaintiff as his wife into the making and entry of a decree which it had neither the right nor power to make. This is the principal purpose of her said motion; and, if the declared purpose of the trial court as affirmed in its response to this writ is to be taken as true, this is the purpose which the said court and the judge thereof has in view in proceeding to the hearing upon the plaintiff's said motion which the petitioners by their application for this writ seek to prohibit. To such a purpose the death of the defendant in said action is merely incidental, and is in no wise controlling upon the power of the court to purge its records of orders and decrees which the court has been wrongfully misled into making through the fraudulent imposition of a party to an action pending, at the time of such imposition, before it. To hold that the party having accomplished such imposition could by dying deprive the court of the right when properly advised to so purge its own records would be to abridge to the point of denial one of the most salutary of the inherent powers of the court.

In the case of Rehfuss v. Rehfuss, 169 Cal. 86, 145 P. 1020, this court directed attention to the fact that actions for divorce differ from ordinary suits between private parties in the degree of solicitude which the law as well as public policy imposes upon the courts in the interest of preserving the integrity of the marriage relation. The court says:

"That relation is the basis of the family, the foundation of society. It cannot be destroyed by the mere consent, whim, or caprice of the parties to the marriage, nor can it be stipulated away in judicial proceedings. The relation can be dissolved only by consent of the state, and upon statutory grounds, presented in good faith to a court of competent jurisdiction. * * * It is the duty of the court, representing the state, in accordance with the letter and policy of the law, to guard strictly against fraud, collusion, or imposition when the husband or wife seeks to dissolve the bonds that bind them together. * * * Where it becomes manifest to the court before it loses jurisdiction of the case, that a judgment decreeing a divorce has been obtained by collusive agreement between the parties, or through fraud practiced upon the court, the court has the inherent power to set aside the judgment. This it may do on its own motion," citing many cases.

The petitioners lay, we think, undue stress upon the phrase in the foregoing quotation, "before it loses jurisdiction of the case," as indicating that the court had in mind either the limitation of time imposed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure or the loss of jurisdiction caused by the death of one of the parties to the divorce action; but that the court did not refer to a loss of jurisdiction in the trial court from either of these causes would seem to be made clear, not only by reference to its earlier decision in the case of Williams v. Reed, supra, holding that applications for this form of relief were not governed by section 473 of said Code, but also by reference to certain of the cases cited in support of its above ruling in the Rehfuss Case; as in the Matter of Boyd's Appeal, 38 Pa. 241, wherein it was held that the court of common pleas had power to vacate and annul a decree of divorce obtained through fraud and imposition on the court after the death of one of the parties to the action. In Long on Domestic Relations, § 141, p. 289, the rule is stated that a decree of divorce which has been obtained by either party to the marriage by fraud may be set aside by the court in which the decree was rendered upon application of the party aggrieved; and the fact that the party who procured the divorce is dead does not necessarily defeat a proceeding to vacate the decree. The author cites in support of this doctrine Lawrence v. Nelson, 113 Iowa, 277, 85 N. W. 84, 57 L. R. A. 583, and Johnson v. Coleman, 23 Wis. 453, 99 Am. Dec. 193, and also cites 2 Bishop on Marriage, Divorce, and Separation, §§ 1549, 1554, and 1556, wherein it is stated that the death of the defrauding party, without unreasonable delay by the other, will not prevent the vacating of a decree of divorce in cases where a fraud has been practiced on the court by one of the parties to the action to the injury of another who is innocent, and that in such cases the proceeding for annulling the decree must be in the same court and cause wherein it was rendered and where remains the record which is to be vacated.

We are therefore satisfied that, notwithstanding the fact that the divorce action had abated in so far as any further trial or determination of the issue as to the marital relations of the parties to it is concerned, the court retained its inherent power and jurisdiction to conduct the investigation into the integrity of its records which the plaintiff's motion suggests and which the court of its own motion is proposing to undertake. What was said by this court in the case of Kirschner v. Deitrich, supra, while correct in its application to that case, has no application to the proceeding which the petitioners herein seek to prohibit.

The application for a writ of prohibition is denied.

1. Dedication ⟸57—Deed of land in subsequently incorporated city held to vest discretion in public officials thereof to devote land to public uses according to changing conditions.

Deed conveying land in newly founded city, to present and future owners of town lots therein, for such public uses as "future incorporated authorities of said city from time to time declare and determine," held intended to commit choice and extent of such public uses to discretion of public officials of subsequently incorporated municipality, to be exercised according to changing conditions.

2. Dedication ⟸58—Devotion of land to school purposes held to work no derogation of power to devote it to other purposes.

That land conveyed for such public uses as municipal authorities should declare, without limitation as to particular use, was devoted to school purposes for time, worked no derogation of such officials' power to devote it to other and more comprehensive uses, including erection of municipal auditorium thereon.

3. Dedication ⟸57—Devotion of land to erection of municipal auditorium held within scope of powers granted municipal officials by deed.

Devotion of land, conveyed for public purposes determined by municipal authorities, to erection of municipal auditorium for public assembly and convention purposes, held within scope of powers granted to such officials, though not contemplated by grantor at time of deed.

4. Dedication ⟸57—Deed of land for "public use" or "public purposes," held not to preclude use of municipal auditorium thereon by private persons giving concerts, etc., for which admission fees are charged.

Deed of land within city to present and future owners of town lots for such public uses as municipal authorities determined held to have granted such owners no other rights therein than those of general public, so that such authorities were not precluded from permitting use of municipal auditorium thereon by private persons, giving concerts, exhibitions, etc., for which admission fees were charged, when not being used for public assemblages.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Public Purpose; Public Use.]

5. Dedication ⟸57—Permitting private persons to use municipal auditorium for concerts, etc., for which admission fee is charged, not precluded by deed conveying land on which erected for public use or public purposes.

Public uses, to which city block or structures thereon could be put under deed to lot owners for public uses declared by municipal authorities, held not limited to such as would allow general public free access thereto at all times, so as to preclude public officials from allowing private persons, paying license fees, to use municipal auditorium thereon for concerts, etc., for which admission fee is charged, or permitting societies of limited membership to use portions to exclusion of nonmembers, when not required for public use, especially in view of St. 1903, p. 413, § 8, requiring that all moneys derived from hire of public assembly halls be deposited in city treasury to credit of public hall fund, etc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by H. J. Futterer for a declaratory judgment against the City of Sacramento and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. A. Bliss, of Sacramento, for appellant.

R. L. Shinn, of Sacramento, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Sacramento in an action brought by the plaintiff, who asserts himself to be a citizen of the United States and a resident and taxpayer of the city of Sacramento, for a declaratory judgment declaring the rights of the plaintiff and all other residents, citizens, and taxpayers of said city with respect to a certain block of land lying between Fifteenth and Sixteenth and I and J streets therein, and upon which block of land the city of Sacramento through its proper officials has declared its intention of erecting a public assembly and convention hall, otherwise designated as a "municipal auditorium" and for the purpose of which erection the people of the said city have heretofore and at a duly held election voted bonds in the sum of $750,000. The averments of the plaintiff's complaint were in the main admitted in the answer, and as to certain disputed matters in the pleadings the findings of the trial court were in accord with the averments of the defendants' said answer, and as to these the plaintiff makes no assault upon the findings on this appeal. The findings of fact of the trial court may therefore be taken as setting forth the conceded facts of the case.

These findings, briefly summarized, show that on or about the 2d day of January, 1849, John A. Sutter, Jr., who was then the owner of the lands in question, and in fact of most, if not all, of the property upon which the then newly founded city of Sacramento was rising, executed a deed by the terms of which he conveyed and quitclaimed "unto the present and future owners of town lots and town property in Sacramento City, in the territory of California, all my right, title and interest in and to certain portions of said city described as follows and under the conditions following." Then follows the description covering all the streets and alleys in said city, with certain reservations, and also certain blocks or squares in said city designated therein including the lands involved in this litigation. The deed proceeds as follows:

"The said several squares are hereby conveyed unto the present and future proprietors of town property in said city for the public use of the inhabitants of said city, to be applied to such public purposes as the future incorporated authorities of said city from time to time declare and determine. To have and to hold the aforesaid premises unto the present and future owners of town property in said city, their heirs and assigns, forever."

The findings further show that the said conveyance and the trusts embodied therein were accepted by the city of Sacramento, and that ever since the incorporation of said city the said land has been under the control of and its use administered under the authority of the governing body of said city, pursuant to the provisions of said deed; that from and after the 26th day of August, 1872, the said lands were devoted to public school purposes under a certain ordinance of said city, which was repealed in 1923; and that on June 30, 1924, the board of education abandoned said premises and ceased to use the same for public school purposes. The findings then proceed to adopt the averments of the complaint as to the holding of said bond election, and as to the result thereof, which show that at the time of said election and in the favorable vote for said bonds the place for the erection of the building for which the funds to be derived from the sale of said bonds were to be devoted was not designated, but that thereafter, and on the 21st day of May, 1923, the said city, by resolution duly adopted by its city council, designated the location of said assembly and convention hall and auditorium to be that of the lands here in question. The court proceeds to find:

"That it is the intention of the city of Sacramento, when said public assembly and convention hall, otherwise designated as the 'municipal auditorium,' is finished, to rent the same from time to time, at times when the said auditorium is not being used for public assemblages or conventions, for compensation to private persons who will give concerts, exhibitions, plays, and performances therein and charge an admission fee thereto, and exclude therefrom all persons who may not pay for such admission.

"That in addition to renting the said auditorium to private persons, as aforesaid, the city of Sacramento intends to rent the same to associations and societies of limited membership, at times when said auditorium is not being used for public assemblages or conventions, which associations will use the same and give performances therein, and exclude therefrom all persons who are not members of such societies or associations.

"That the revenue derived from said renting by the city of Sacramento will be placed in the city treasury of the city of Sacramento, to be used for the public purposes prescribed by law.

"That unless the defendant city of Sacramento has the right to erect said auditorium on said site, and use the same in accordance with its intention as above set out, it will not construct said auditorium on said site, but will locate the same elsewhere."

As conclusions of law from the foregoing findings of fact the court finds:

"That the legal title to the block or square situated in said city of Sacramento, state of California, and being the block or square between Fifteenth and Sixteenth and I and J streets, is vested in plaintiff and others, by virtue of their ownership of lots in said city of Sacramento, subject, however, to the trust that said square should be for the public use of the inhabitants of said city, and to be applied to such public purposes as the governing authorities of said city shall from time to time determine.

"That the construction and maintenance of a public assembly and convention hall is a public use and purpose, and is within the public purposes referred to in the said deed by John A. Sutter, Jr., and that the defendants have the right to utilize the said block or square for said purpose, with full power to control and operate the said public assembly and convention hall, when constructed, including the right to hire or rent the same, at times when said public assembly and convention hall is not being used for public assemblages or conventions, to private persons, associations, or societies, for concerts, exhibitions, plays, performances, and like activities, admission to which will be restricted to persons paying a fee, or being members of such association or society, and from which all persons except those who pay the admission fee, or are members of such society or association, may be excluded."

The judgment of the court was in accord with the foregoing conclusions of law, and from such judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The appellant shows and the respondents admit that the above-mentioned deed of John A. Sutter, Jr., was before this court for interpretation in the case of Mayo v. Wood, 50 Cal. 171, in which case the plaintiff therein claimed title to a certain other of the blocks or squares of land described in said original deed of Sutter under a subsequent deed from Sutter, and under such claim of title, and also under the claim that said original deed of Sutter was void, for the reason that there was no sufficient designated grantee therein, sued a defendant in possession of said block or square of land in ejectment. The court said:

"1. The instrument executed by John A. Sutter, Jr., on the 2d day of January, 1849, dedicated the land in controversy to public use, to be applied 'to such public purposes as the future incorporated authorities of said city [may] from time to time declare and determine.' It purported in terms to convey whatever title he had, to 'the present and future owners of town lots and town property in Sacramento City.' It recognized the fact that there were such 'present' owners, and that Sacramento was then known as a city, though not at that time formally incorporated as such. Aside from the question of dedication, the instrument was operative as a conveyance to vest the title in the then 'present' owners of the town lots and property. This was a sufficient designation of the grantees to uphold it as a conveyance, and thereafter Sutter, Jr., had no title to this property which could pass by his deed to Mesick."

[1] While this court has thus declared the said original deed of John A. Sutter, Jr., to be valid as containing sufficiently identified grantees in the then existing owners of "town lots and town property" in the then actual, though unincorporated, city of Sacramento, it has not heretofore been called upon to define the rights of such "present" grantees or of their successors in the future ownership of property in that city in respect to the property in question here. Nor has it been heretofore required to interpret said deed as to the nature, extent, or limitations upon the trust for public purposes which was thereby created, either in the grantees of said deed or in the public officials of said city upon its due incorporation as such. The deed itself does not leave room for much, if any, doubt that it was the intention of the grantor therein that the public purposes to which said property was to be applied were to be broadly and not narrowly defined, since they were to be such as lay, not so much within the present conception or intent of the grantor, or even of his immediate grantees, but were to be such as "the future incorporated authorities of said city from time to time declare and determine."

[2] The contemporaneous history of the civil and political institutions of California, which were in the first and primitive stages of formation during the years 1848 and 1849, the fact that the turbulent social conditions of our golden prime had not yet settled into those of an ordered or organized state, and that, at the date of this instrument, and in fact for nearly a year thereafter, no constitutional or statutory authority existed for the organization of municipal corporations, or for any definition of the powers or of the public purposes or uses to be ascribed to such organizations, lends support to our conclusion that it was the intent of the grantor of this instrument to commit the choice and extent of the public purposes or uses to which the lands in question were to be devoted to the public officials of a municipality which had not as yet officially been born, and which discretion was to be exercised by such officials according to the changing conditions of the city of the future which the grantor forevisaged in his gift. This is not a case wherein the grantor has circumscribed his grant with such limitations as that the properties conveyed shall be used for a public park, or public playground, or zoological garden, or for any of the various purposes of public education; nor is it such a grant as the officials of the city, exercising their function at any particular period in its history, might have limited by the adaptation of the property to a particular or limited use. The fact, therefore, that this property was for a time devoted to school purposes has worked no derogation of the powers of the present officials of the municipality to devote it to other and more comprehensive uses.

[3] It is not seriously contended by the appellant herein that such is the case, nor is it within the appellant's insistence that the city of Sacramento may not legally devote the said property and the whole thereof to having erected thereon a building or buildings to be devoted to public assembly and convention purposes and to be designated and used as a "municipal auditorium." We hold, therefore, that such purposes, while probably not within the conscious mind of the grantor at the time of his grant are fully within the scope of the powers which the city of his vision was to exercise through its officials from time to time during the future years.

[4] It is, however, the contention of the appellant herein that, while it may be conceded or held that the city of Sacramento has power to devote said property and the structures to be erected thereon to such uses as "a public assembly and convention hall," or as a "municipal auditorium," it has no power to place such limitations upon the entire freedom of use at all times by the general public of such property or the buildings thereon as are attempted or threatened to be imposed by the present city council of said city in the occasional use thereof, when not being used for public assemblages, by private persons for such uses as the giving of concerts, exhibitions, plays, or performances for which admission fees are to be charged as the price or condition of admission thereto. The appellant urges this contention, both in his capacity as a citizen and resident of Sacramento, and hence a member of its body politic, and also in his capacity as a successor in interest of one of the original grantees of said deed by virtue of the latter's ownership of a portion of a town lot in said prospective city at the date of Sutter's said deed. Dealing first with said latter claim, we are of the opinion that, while the predecessor of said plaintiff, in common with all the other owners or proprietors of town lots in said primitive and as yet inchoate municipality were given by said deed a sufficiently definite status as grantees therein to render the same valid, as was held in the case of Mayo v. Wood, supra, they were granted thereby no rights in said property or in the uses or usufruct thereof other than those which were to be exercised by the general public under the trusts for such public uses as the "future incorporated authorities of said city" were "from time to time to declare and determine."

[5] The appellant has cited us to no authority which would uphold any other interpretation of this grant, and it therefore follows that the appellant must rest his contention solely upon his membership of the body politic of the city of Sacramento. His contention as thus limited, then, would be that the only public purposes or public uses to which the said block or square of land in said city, or the structures erected or to be erected thereon, could ever be put, would be such as would permit the general public at all times and upon all occasions, when such property or the buildings thereon were being put to any use, free access thereto and to the untrammeled enjoyment of such use. We are not willing to go thus far with the appellant in this case, nor do we think that either the terms of said grant, and of the trusts and uses covered thereby, or the purposed devotion of the property in question to the specific purposes declared by the public authorities of said city, require us so to do. The utilization of the structures proposed by the city council of Sacramento upon said block or square of land for a public assembly and convention hall, or for a so-called municipal auditorium, is unquestionably a laudable and proper public use and purpose, viewed in the light of the almost universal civic and social needs and usages of modern cities. To these uses and purposes the property in question, with the structures proposed to be placed upon it and the whole thereof, are generally to be put upon all occasions when the same shall be required for such uses and purposes; and it is only when such properties are not being required or not being used for such wholly public purposes that the authorities and agents of said municipality are to be permitted to allow private persons the temporary and licensed permission to use such of said properties as may be required for concerts, exhibitions, plays, and performances, charging an admission fee therefor, and is also to be permitted to allow associations and societies of limited membership to use portions of said premises and to give performances therein, to the exclusion of those who are not members of such societies or associations. This limited occupation and use of said premises is in either or any case confined to such times or occasions as said properties are not being used for public assemblages or conventions, while the revenues to be derived from such limited uses are to be deposited in the city treasury and devoted to such public purposes as are prescribed by law.

We are directed by the briefs of appellant to numerous cases holding that, when property has been deeded or dedicated for specific public purposes and uses, such as for a public park or playground, or other like uses, where in the nature of things the general public must have equal access to the thing granted or dedicated in order to share in the enjoyment of its specific uses, in which cases it has been quite generally and properly held that the subject of such uses cannot be devoted to such other uses as would materially interfere with such general public enjoyment. We are also cited to cases holding that, where property has been acquired or dedicated to public use, it cannot be wholly set apart to uses or purposes which are not essentially public in their nature or control. Such was the case of California Academy of Sciences v. City and County of San Francisco, 107 Cal. 334, 40 P. 426, wherein it was held that pueblo lands of said municipality, held in trust for its inhabitants for municipal purposes, could not be set apart for the sole occupancy and use of the Academy of Sciences, a private corporation with limited membership, and the purposes of which, while incidentally for the public benefit, were essentially private, and intended primarily for the benefit and enjoyment of the few. Such was also the case of La Societa Italiana, etc., v. City and County of San Francisco, 131 Cal. 169, 63 P. 174, 53 L. R. A. 382, wherein it was held that lands of said municipality held in trust for public uses as a cemetery could not be granted to a private corporation for the burial exclusively of its own members, citing as authority the former case.

We are also cited to the case of Spires v. City of Los Angeles, 150 Cal. 64, 87 P. 1026, 11 Ann. Cas. 465, wherein it was held that lands dedicated to use as a public park could be occupied while properly usable as a site for a library but could not be devoted in whole or part to the general administrative purposes of said city. Our attention is also directed to the case of Egan v. City and County of San Francisco, 165 Cal. 576, 133 P. 294, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 754, in which it was held that the city of San Francisco could not turn over in perpetuity any portion of its public land to a private corporation for the erection of an opera house thereon. On the other hand, we are cited to the case of Harter v. City of San Jose, 141 Cal. 659, 75 P. 344, wherein it appeared that said city was proposing to devote a small portion of a tract of land known as Alum Rock Park, containing about 400 acres, with numerous mineral springs thereon, to a hotel to be erected by a private person under a lease for a limited period, and to be operated for private gain, but for the general convenience and welfare of visitors to the park, and under the rules and regulations of the city authorities, and in a manner consistent with the general public nature and use of said park, the city to derive a revenue from such lease and use. It was held that such proposed limited use of a portion of said public property was not beyond the powers of the city authorities; and it was further held that the discretion confided in municipal authorities in the matter of the utilization of property devoted to public uses ought not to be interfered with in the absence of a clear showing of manifest abuse. Among the authorities relied upon by the court as supporting its conclusion in that case was the case of State v. Schweickardt, 109 Mo. 496, 19 S. W. 47, wherein the city authorities of St. Louis were proposing to give possession to a lessee of certain buildings in a public park for the purpose of the sale of refreshments therein, and wherein it was held by the Supreme Court of Missouri that such possession and use of a limited area for such purposes were not to be regarded as a diversion from the legitimate uses of the park.

Passing from a review of these cases to the law as declared by text-writers and by the courts of other jurisdictions, we find it stated in McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, p. 2479, under the heading "Power to Erect Convention and Assembly Halls," that it is generally held that a municipality has power to erect an assembly hall or auditorium for public purposes, and that under such power it may erect, even in public parks, a pavilion for public amusement or convenience, and may fit up a portion of a building intended for strictly municipal purposes as a hall for public assemblies, dramatic exhibitions, etc., and it is also declared to be the law (page 2478) that a town which has authority to devote its public funds to the erection of a market house, which is to be the leading object in erecting the building, may devote an upper story thereof to other subordinate and incidental purposes—citing Spaulding v. City of Lowell, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 71, and also citing the case of French v. Quincy, 3 Allen (Mass.) 9, wherein it was held that a town may erect a building for the transaction of its public business and may make a provision in the same for its prospective wants, and, if all the rooms are not used, the vacant ones may be rented for private business, and that the provision in the deed to the land on which the building stands that the same "shall not be used for any other purpose than as a place for a town house for said inhabitants" is not violated, because a hall on the second floor has been used for miscellaneous purposes, and vacant rooms rented to a private business. In the case of Wheelock v. City of Lowell, 196 Mass. 220, 81 N. E. 977, 124 Am. St. Rep. 543, 12 Ann. Cas. 1109, where it appeared that a building proposed to be erected for the use of municipal boards and officers was also being used as a place for holding theatrical exhibitions, dances, and other amusements, the court held that such incidental use was not a diversion of the building from its public purposes, and in so holding said:

"If the dominating motive for the erection of the hall is a strictly public use, then the expenditure for it is legal, although incidentally it may be devoted occasionally to uses which are not public. If, however, the project of the defendant city is merely colorable, masking under the pretext of a public purpose a general design to enter into the private business of maintaining a public hall for gain, or devoting it mainly to any other than its public use as a gathering place for citizens generally, such an attempt would be a perversion of power and a nullity and no public funds could be appropriated for it. * * * The reported facts show a substantial use of Huntington Hall for political rallies, conventions, and other public meetings of citizens, although from time to time it has been rented for purposes of amusements and instruction. That the building has also been let for private uses, when not required by the public needs, does not affect the general legal purpose"—citing French v. Quincy, supra.

The facts of the foregoing case are strikingly similar to those of the instant case, and we are satisfied that the principles of law therein enunciated have also direct and proper application to the case at bar, and hence meet with our full approval. It is not an insignificant fact, having an important bearing upon this case, that the state Legislature in the year 1903 adopted an act entitled "An act authorizing cities, towns, and municipal corporations to establish and maintain public assembly or convention halls, and to incur indebtedness for such improvements" (St. 1903, p. 412), and that apparently the city of Sacramento has proceeded under said act in resolving to erect its said "assembly or convention hall" and to vote and issue bonds therefor. Section 8 of said act provides that:

"All moneys derived from the use or hire of such assembly or convention hall shall be deposited in the treasury of the municipality to the credit of said public hall fund," etc.

Herein is to be found the plain intendment that upon occasion such public assembly and convention hall may be let for purposes to the enjoyment of which the general public may be excluded, except upon the payment of admission charges. Looking to the findings and conclusions of the trial court, we fail to perceive that the uses and purposes to which the city authorities of Sacramento intend to devote the lands and structure in question are such as are inimical to the scope and intendment of the original grant of such lands.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GIBSON. (Cr. 1203.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 16, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1159(3)—Where there is a conflict in the testimony, the verdict of the jury is binding on appeal.

Though, in prosecution for murder, there was sufficient evidence to warrant acquittal on theory of self-defense, where evidence was conflicting, verdict of guilty was binding on appeal.

2. Criminal law ⟸1037(2)—Alleged misconduct not considered on appeal, when instruction not requested, or misconduct assigned.

Conduct of district attorney in murder trial would not be considered on appeal, where it was not assigned as misconduct, and no request was made for instruction to disregard it.

3. Homicide ⟸169(1)—Testimony in murder trial, that companion of deceased carried a weapon, properly excluded.

Testimony, that person, who accompanied deceased to defendant's flat, but remained outside, carried a revolver, was properly excluded, there being no showing that such person took any part in the struggle, or that defendant fired the fatal shot because he was armed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Dee Gibson was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Edmond H. Lomasney, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction of the crime of manslaughter. He had been charged by information with murder, but the jury found him guilty of the lesser crime.

It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. There is a conflict in the record, not only as between testimony of witnesses, but in possible inferences to be drawn from much of that testimony. Had the jury chosen to believe all testimony in the record and drawn all inferences therefrom most favorable to the defendant, they would have had substantial reasons for acquitting the defendant upon the theory that he had killed Sanford in self-defense; but the jury has chosen to disregard such testimony and such inferences, and to accept as facts the testimony appearing in the record, which is inconsistent with the theory of the defense. We shall review, briefly, such testimony, and its presence in the record is a complete answer to appellant's position upon this aspect of the case.

On January 16, 1924, defendant rented a flat at 2300 California street, San Francisco. He testified that he intended to move into it with his family, when his rent was due upon premises at 561 Cedar street, where he was living at the time of the homicide. He had rented out rooms in this flat to various persons, among whom was a woman, Alma Jackson, over whom the killing occurred. All persons concerned in this tragedy are negroes. Alma Jackson, before going to live at defendant's flat, had been living with Willie Sanford. She had left him, he had refused to give up her clothing, she had secured a warrant for his arrest, and in response to this, he had returned her clothes. Sanford was not satisfied, evidently, to end the relationship between himself and Alma Jackson, and he met the defendant and complained about the conduct of the Jackson woman in leaving him and trying to have him arrested, and inquired as to how long she had been living in the California street flat. Defendant told him that the woman had said she didn't wish to have anything to do with Sanford, and had asked him (defendant) not to permit Sanford to come to the house, as she was afraid of him. Sanford said he would go up there and run the women out of the house. It also appears that Sanford threatened to kill defendant, but defendant stated that he was not afraid of him, and did not take his threats seriously. On the night of February 1, 1924, several women were visitng at the flat and defendant was spending the evening there. About midnight Sanford came to the house and wanted to see the Jackson woman. Defendant went to the door and refused to allow Sanford to enter. Sanford was accompanied by another negro, who remained outside while Sanford forced his way into the hall. There is abundant evidence from which it may be concluded that Sanford had no weapon of any kind with him. The two men engaged in a "scuffle" in the hall, defendant trying to eject Sanford and Sanford struggling to remain in the house. Defendant was armed and in the struggle drew his revolver and shot Sanford. It is true that he testified at the trial that Sanford had a gun and was endeavoring to shoot him (defendant), but this testimony is in conflict with his statement to the police shortly after the shooting, and contrary to the inference to be drawn from the fact that no weapon of any kind was found in the premises after Sanford was shot, although the police came there shortly thereafter, and Sanford was injured so seriously as to be unable to move or make away with any weapon which he might have had. In support of the verdict there is also the dying statement of Sanford, in part as follows:

"D. Gibson shot me over that woman, Alma Jackson, colored woman. I was living with her at 2503 Bush street. Happened inside of house 2300 California. She was living with me, and left me for D. Gibson. Mrs. Alma Jackson was in room. We had words. I had no gun, no revolver, no razor. I did not strike D. Gibson or attack him or attempt to attack him. I knocked at the door of room at 2300 California street. He opened the door. I asked for Mrs. Alma Jackson and Mr. Gibson told me to beat it. He said you can't talk to her. I said I just want to tell her about her stockings. He grabbed me, Gibson tore my coat, could not hold me, drew his pistol and shot me. Pistol was in his bosom. He fired one shot at me."

[1] There is testimony in the record presenting a different picture of the struggle, and appellant has discussed that testimony in his brief. We shall not review it here, because in so far as it is in conflict with the foregoing, the jury was entitled to disregard it, and we are bound by their view of the parties and their motives.

[2] Appellant complains of alleged misconduct of the district attorney in stating during the trial that counsel for defendant was nodding to a witness upon the stand—Alma Jackson. Counsel denied this in court, explaining that he could not hear the witness, and was putting his head forward to hear her. The district attorney then said that the nodding was done unconsciously, perhaps. That was all there was to the incident, and counsel for defendant did not assign it as misconduct, nor request an instruction to the jury to disregard it. Under this state of fact, we must disregard it upon appeal.

[3] The only other point urged upon the appeal is the contention that error was committed in refusing to admit the testimony of a witness, Reese, that a negro called "Stickhorse" and who accompanied deceased to the scene of the homicide and remained outside the house, was armed with a revolver on the night of the homicide. The witness was asked:

"Was 'Stickhorse' or Sanford armed with any deadly weapon, if you know?"

The question was objected to as complex. Counsel was directed by the court to ask separate questions as to each of these persons. He then asked:

"Was Sanford armed with any deadly weapon, if you know? A. Not that I know of, sir."

The witness was then asked if "Stickhorse" was armed, objection was made upon the ground of incompetency, irrelevancy, and immateriality, and such objection was sustained.

No authorities are cited by appellant which would support the admission of this testimony. There is no evidence in the record that "Stickhorse" assaulted the defendant, and nothing to suggest that defendant fired the shot which killed Sanford, because he knew "Stickhorse" was armed. The jury was justified in believing that "Stick-horse," armed or unarmed, did not come into the house, and took no part in the struggle, and that deceased was entirely unarmed at the time he was shot by defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

EHLERS v. LANGLEY & MICHAELS CO.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 8, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 3, 1925.)

1. Master and servant ⟸40(3)—Evidence held to justify recovery for dismissal of employee.

In action by employee for breach of contract of employment requiring 30 days' notice of dismissal, defended on ground that plaintiff's failure to obey lawful and reasonable orders and willful disobedience warranted dismissal, under Civ. Code, §§ 1981, 2000, evidence held to justify verdict for plaintiff.

2. Master and servant ⟸30(5)—To justify dismissal of employee, there must have been willful violation of rule or instruction.

Although willful disobedience by employee warrants peremptory dismissal, to justify dismissal without notice required by contract of employment, employee must have deliberately and willfully broken some rule, order, or instruction of employer.

3. Master and servant ⟸30(5)—To justify dismissal of employee, thing done or omitted to be done contrary to rule or instruction must be done or omitted intentionally.

To justify dismissal of employee without notice required by contract of employment, although it is not necessary that violation of rule, order, or instruction of employer be perverse or malicious, or that it be result of evil intent toward employer, thing done or omitted to be done must have been done or omitted intentionally.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by C. W. Ehlers against the Langley & Michaels Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McCutchen, Olney, Mannon & Greene, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. J. Treat and T. F. Draper, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. The plaintiff, an employee of the defendant corporation, was dismissed from his employment without notice, and later brought this action to recover the amount of salary and commissions accruing during the 30-day period following his discharge, plaintiff contending that such summary dismissal was in violation of the express terms of the contract of employment, which he claims required a 30-day notice to be given before the employment thereunder could be terminated. The action was tried by a jury, resulting in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $814.57, that being the amount of salary and commissions plaintiff would have received if he had been allowed to remain in such employment for the additional 30 days. Judgment was entered upon said verdict, and defendant appeals.

The contract of employment was made up of certain letters which passed between the parties. Those letters were afterwards lost or destroyed, and, consequently, the terms of the contract were established by secondary evidence. Appellant concedes that the evidence adduced at the trial in relation to the contents of said letters was conflicting, and for that reason has not urged on this appeal the point that said contract of employment did not require the giving of the 30-day notice contended for by respondent.

The main contention upon which appellant seeks a reversal of the judgment is grounded upon the principle of law that it is the duty of the servant to obey all lawful and reasonable orders and instructions of the master and that willful disobedience thereof warrants peremptory dismissal. Civ. Code §§ 1981, 2000; Wiley v. California Hosiery Co., 3 Cal. Unrep. 814, 32 P. 522; May v. New York Motion Picture Co., 45 Cal. App. 396, 187 P. 785.

The appellant company is engaged in the wholesale drug business in San Francisco, and in connection therewith conducts a department for the sale and installation of drug store fixtures, of which department respondent had been the successful manager for two years. The controversy here arose over certain contracts secured by the appellant company for the manufacture and installation of fixtures, and the performance of certain construction work, for a firm in Petaluma, which contracts were, in accordance with the usual custom of appellant company, sublet on this occasion to the Mullen Manufacturing Company of San Francisco, to whom it had previously sublet similar contracts.

Appellant contends that it was an office rule of appellant company, known to respondent, that no part of the work of the subcontractor should be paid for until the entire contract was completed and a written acceptance of the work received from the customer; that before the work of the subcontractor on this particular job was completed respondent fraudulently procured a written acceptance of the work from the customer, contrary to business morals, and injurious to appellant's business standing and reputation, and that therefore the summary dismissal of respondent was justified. Respondent denied that he had practiced any fraud or deceit whatever in obtaining said written acceptance of said work, and further denied that there was any such rule, as appellant contends for, in operation at the time the Petaluma transaction occurred. These disputed questions of fact were resolved by the jury in favor of respondent, and we are of the opinion that the jury's conclusions find ample support in the evidence.

Testimony was given by respondent to the effect that, some eight months previous to the dispute concerning the Petaluma job, the appellant company installed certain fixtures in a drug store in Oakland under a contract which had been also sublet to the Mullen Company; that at that time the impracticability of the rule requiring a written acceptance to be secured from the customer before any of the work of the subcontractor was paid for, came into question and was discussed by respondent with Mr. Pattioni, the vice president and manager, and Mr. Norton, the secretary of appellant company; that the discussion arose on account of the objections made by Mullen, who asserted that it was impossible for him to accept contracts subject to such a rule for the reason that the customer might, for some fanciful reason, refuse to accept the work at all and in that event he, as the subcontractor, would never be paid. Respondent further testified that following said discussion it was understood, by said corporation officers, that written acceptances from the customer would not be insisted upon; and that thereafter said acceptances were not, in fact, procured, although completion of the work was always required as a condition precedent to payment.

The particular circumstances relating to the Petaluma job were as follows: The entire job was covered by three contracts, the first of which was the main agreement and called for the manufacture and installation of fixtures to the extent of $5,625, of which amount appellant received $1,400 when the contract was signed; the second contract specified certain paneling for a fixed price of $1,020; the third contract, an oral one, related to screens and window backs. The fixtures were manufactured and assembled by the Mullen Company, at its factory in San Francisco, and shipped to Petaluma. After installation work under the first contract, and construction work called for by the additional ones, had been in progress for a week or nine days, and the work under the first contract had been practically finished, respondent, following his usual practice, so reported to Mr. Norton, the secretary, stating that Mullen would like to have his check delivered in time to meet his payroll on the following Saturday, May 13th. Norton replied that the check would be ready. On May 12th Norton told respondent that Mr. Michael, the company's president, had seen the check lying on the cashier's desk and had stated that it should not be delivered until a written acceptance was obtained from the customer. Respondent so informed Mullen, and the latter protested that the delay would work a hardship on him because he had depended on said check to meet his payroll. In order to obviate the embarrassment respondent, that night, personally inspected the work at Petaluma, ascertained that the material called for by all three contracts was on the job, and that the work under the first contract had been practically completed; that the only thing remaining to be done was to shove the showcases into position "like you would a table or desk"; thereupon respondent obtained from the customer the necessary written acceptance, which was filed in the company's office and the next day the Mullen check for the sum of $4,200 was delivered to Mullen.

About 10 days later respondent was called before a meeting of four of the officers of the appellant company, those present being Mr. Michaels, the president, Mr. Pattioni, the vice president and manager, Mr. Norton, the secretary, Mr. Terry, the treasurer, also the company's sales manager, and a member of the drug firm for whom the work was being done. After some questioning, respondent was arbitrarily discharged from his employment by the president, Mr. Michaels. He was first asked by Michaels if he did not know that it was against the rules of the company to pay the accounts of a subcontractor without first obtaining a written acceptance from the customer and he replied that he did not. Respondent then explained that the same difficulty had arisen in reference to the Oakland job, and that the understanding at that time with the company's officers was that said rule should be relaxed. He further attempted to explain how the appellant company was being benefited by prompt payment to the subcontractor, upon completion of the work, without awaiting the customer's acceptance. In this connection respondent stated that the success of the department depended largely upon pleasing the customer; that in the performance of all contracts for the manufacture and installation of fixtures the customer invariably requested small extras not included in the contract; also that it was frequently the case that several days after the job had been completed and accepted it would be found that a drawer would stick or a door would jam, owing to shrinkage of material; that if the subcontractor was paid promptly upon completion of the work, and thereby able to take care of his current demands for labor and material, he was always willing to go beyond his contract and perform these small extra jobs without cost to either the customer or the appellant company. Respondent testified that upon explaining these matters to Mr. Michaels the latter said:

"He did not care anything about that; what he wanted to know was whether or not I had received instructions not to pay it—any bills on any occasion—pay any bills until we had received an acceptance from the customer."

Continuing, respondent testified:

"I tried to explain as I did to you now, and he didn't want any explanation, he wanted an answer 'yes' or 'no.' Well, I said yes, I did receive those instructions, then he said this remarkable thing, that because I had violated those instructions, and seem so anxious to pay Mr. Mullen that money, that I was more loyal to Mr. Mullen than I was to him, and therefore had lost all confidence in me and having lost confidence in me, there wasn't any room for he and I under the same roof. Those were his very words. * * * Then I asked him if that meant I was through working for him and he said, 'It does.' I told him then that I did not believe that he had lost confidence in me, he was the first man that ever in my life had told me that. I left the company."

[1] It would thus appear from respondent's testimony, which, in view of the verdict of the jury in his favor, must be taken as true, that the rule upon which the president of appellant company assumed to stand in the matter of the peremptory discharge of respondent, was not effective at the time the Petaluma transaction occurred, but had been suspended for several months prior thereto, with the express approval of the officers of said company. And so far as the special instructions of Michaels were concerned, to the effect that the Mullen check be withheld until written acceptance was obtained, the evidence shows, without dispute, that those instructions were complied with. But in this regard appellant claims that said acceptance was procured through fraud and deceit. The evidence does not so prove, and we think the jury was fully justified in deciding adversely to appellant upon this issue. Even construing the testimony of the witness Tuttle, who signed the acceptance, most strongly against respondent, it utterly failed to show that said acceptance was the product of any deception whatever. The work under the first contract, for which the check was delivered in payment, was at that time practically finished. Even Tuttle testified the things remaining to be done were comparatively trifling. The reason said work was not entirely finished, respondent testified, was that Mullen's men had been working on the second and third contracts. Tuttle knew, however, of the true conditions as they existed when said acceptance was signed, and the mere fact that he believed, from respondent's statements, that it was Michaels who requested the acceptance, cannot be considered as a reflection upon the integrity of respondent.

On the other hand, respondent testified that he truthfully explained to Tuttle the situation of Mullen's approaching pay day, his reliance upon the check to meet it, and that Michaels had insisted upon the acceptance before the delivery of the check; that thereupon Tuttle said, "Certainly I will sign it." There is nothing in the record which tends to prove that respondent's action in securing said written acceptance resulted in any personal gain to him or that it operated to the injury of the customer or to the prejudice of appellant company, which of itself may be taken as negative proof of the charge of fraud made by appellant. The entire job was afterwards satisfactorily finished, and the small extra jobs requested by Tuttle, when he signed the acceptance, were performed by Mullen without cost.

In further justification of the payment to Mullen, it was shown that as subcontractor Mullen had no contractual relations with the customer and was, in fact, entitled to his money when his work was completed; that he had expended large sums of money in the manufacture of the fixtures and incurred labor bills in the installation of the same; that there was no agreement on his part that he should wait until the customer had accepted the work before he received any part of his pay; that up to that time he had received no money whatever, although the appellant company had received $1,400 in cash from the customer at the time their contracts were signed. The evidence further shows that during the two years respondent managed said department the business thereof increased about 20 per cent. in volume, amounting during the second year to about $200,000 gross. In fact, appellant states that there is no criticism raised as to his general conduct of his department.

[2] While it is doubtless the law, as appellant contends, that willful disobedience by the servant warrants peremptory dismissal by the master, nevertheless before the law will allow an employer to ignore the specific terms of a contract of employment, which requires notice to be given the employee of its proposed termination, it must appear that there has been some rule, order, or instruction of the employer violated, and that such violation was committed willfully and deliberately on the part of the employee.

[3] Although it is not necessary that the violation be perverse or malicious, or that it be the result of an evil intent toward the master, it must be made clear that the thing done or omitted to be done was done or omitted intentionally (May v. New York Motion Picture Co., supra) the rule being grounded upon the theory that willful disobedience of specific instructions of the master, if such instructions be reasonable and consistent with the contract of employment is a breach of duty—a breach of the contract of service; and like any other breach of contract, of itself entitles the master to renounce the contract of employment. Labatt's Master and Servant, (2d Ed.) § 291, p. 877.

Under the circumstances and for the reasons above stated, we believe the jury was justified in concluding that there was no breach of duty on the part of plaintiff, and therefore he was entitled to the benefit of the 30 days' notice provided for in the contract of employment.

Judgment affirmed.

HERBERT v. GRAHAM et al. (Civ. 4863.)

1. Mines and minerals ⟸77—Where no dispute as to facts or inferences drawn therefrom, question of abandonment of oil lease becomes one at law.

While question of abandonment of an oil lease is one of intention to be determined only upon an investigation of all facts and circumstances, still, where there is no dispute as to facts or inferences to be drawn therefrom, question becomes one at law.

2. Mines and minerals ⟸78(1)—Lessee held not to have abandoned oil lease.

Lessee, under oil lease, compelled to stop drilling operations because of storms, rains, and impassable roads, but who left drilling machinery and tools on ground with man in charge, held not to have abandoned oil lease.

3. Mines and minerals ⟸78(3)—Lessor must give notice of intention to terminate oil lease for nondevelopment.

If a lessor desires to declare a forfeiture of oil lease on ground that land has not been fully developed, he must give notice of such intention, and a reasonable time must be given for the development.

4. Mines and minerals ⟸78(3)—Notice held not sufficient notice of intention to declare a forfeiture of lease.

Where lessor of oil lease informed one of lessees he wanted him to resume work on land or quit, such notice fell short of notice to declare a forfeiture and could not effectuate any such purpose, merely indicating dissatisfaction on part of lessor and desire to have operations resumed.

5. Mines and minerals ⟸77—Nonuser, without intention to abandon oil lease, does not constitute abandonment.

Mere nonuser alone, without any intention to abandon an oil lease, does not constitute an abandonment thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action by Stanley Herbert against E. F. Graham and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Porter & Sutton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. A. Bardin and Russell Scott, both of Salinas, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to quiet title. The complaint is in the usual form. The answer sets forth that plaintiff and his wife had executed to defendant Graham a certain oil lease, whereby they granted to him all the oil, gas, coal, sulphur, shale, and other minerals in and under the premises demised, and that this lease had been assigned to the appellants, who had entered upon the property and expended over $14,000 in sinking oil wells, and had paid plaintiff the sum of $50 per quarter up to the 31st day of March, 1921, the date when drilling was commenced, as provided for in the lease. By an amended answer they allege that, since they commenced drilling on the property, they had sunk a well to a depth of 600 feet, and it then had to be abandoned, as it was destroyed by an earthquake, and they thereafter sank a second well to a depth of some 590 feet, and in the sinking thereof had used due diligence, and had continued work until December 31, 1921, when they were compelled to stop drilling by reason of rains, storms, and impassable roads, but that they had left their rig, tools, and machinery upon the property and intended to resume operations; that plaintiff knew of these facts, and never gave appellants any notice to resume drilling, or that no extensions would be granted, but instead commenced this action on the 31st day of May, 1922.

Included in the lease were provisions to the effect that the lessee should drill a well upon the premises within one year from the date thereof, or thereafter pay to the lessor $50 a quarter until the well was drilled or the property granted was reconveyed, and that, unless a well had been completed to a depth of 2,000 feet (providing oil, gas, or other minerals were not found at a less depth) within 2 years from said date, the lessor, by giving 6 months' notice in writing, could thereafter refuse to accept further rentals under the grant, and if, before the expiration of such notice, the lessee had not commenced a well on the premises, the grant should be null and void, and both parties released therefrom.

The trial court found that the lease had been executed between the parties, but that the same had been wholly abandoned by the assignees of the lessee, and judgment was accordingly rendered, quieting plaintiff's title.

The contention of the appellants is that the facts shown do not as matter of law constitute an abandonment, and that the decree of the court in effect enforces a forfeiture entirely unjustified by the evidence.

Respondents, on the other hand, claim that the question of abandonment in a mining lease is a question of fact, and that the determination of the trial court on the subject is conclusive.

[1] While the question of abandonment is one of intention, to be determined only upon an investigation of all the facts and circumstances, still, where there is no dispute as to the facts or the inferences to be drawn therefrom, the question becomes one of law.

[2, 3] Given the most favorable interpretation for plaintiff, we are of the opinion that the evidence fails entirely to show any abandonment, but, on the contrary, it at most shows a mere disuse or nonuser of the grant for the period of 6 or 7 months. Aside from this, the evidence also affirmatively shows that no notice of termination of the lease was ever given. If a lessor desires to declare a forfeiture on the ground that the land has not been fully developed, he must give notice of such intention, and a reasonable time must be given for the development. Thornton on Oil and Gas (3d Ed.) 862.

[4, 5] Here there is no evidence of any such notice. It is true that plaintiff informed one of the appellants that he wanted him to resume or quit, but this falls far short of notice of a determination on his part to declare a forfeiture, and cannot effectuate any such purpose. It merely indicated dissatisfaction on the part of plaintiff and a desire to have operations resumed.

Nor is there any merit in the contention that the evidence shows that the defendants abandoned the property and vacated the same upon receiving plaintiff's complaint as to the progress of the work. Mr. Okell, to whom the notice to resume work was given, seldom visited the property. His absence signified no intention of abandoning the same. He left his machinery on the ground and his crew in charge, with directions to have the tools repaired so that operations might be resumed. We have already referred to the fact that the evidence shows that two wells had been started; that the first was abandoned, and the second had caved, in consequence of which work was suspended, and the machinery was left upon the property with a man in charge. These acts rebut any inference that the assignees of the lease had abandoned the premises. People v. Southern Pac. Co., 172 Cal. 692, 158 P. 177. Nonuser alone, without any intention to abandon, does not constitute an abandonment. Utt v. Frey, 106 Cal. 397, 39 P. 807.

Appellants make the further contention that the lease in question provided for the payment of rent, and that they had paid the same up to the 31st day of March, 1921, in conformity with the terms of the lease, which did not provide for forfeiture upon nonpayment of rent, or contain any provision for a right of re-entry upon breach of this covenant. It is accordingly claimed that to give plaintiff a right of re-entry a demand for the rent was essential, as also to complete a forfeiture, citing Sauer v. Meyer, 87 Cal. 34, 25 P. 153. Considering the conclusion we have reached, this question becomes unimportant, and a discussion thereof is unnecessary.

Act of state in taking cognizance of, and jurisdiction over, matter of flood control, and all other works germane thereto, involves a valid exercise of state's police power.

4. Eminent domain ⟹293(1)—Complaint in action against drainage district held not to state facts showing that private property was taken for public use without just compensation.

In action for damages for injury to property resulting from negligence of servants of drainage district in setting fire to grass, which spread to another's property, complaint held not to state facts showing that property was taken for public use without just compensation, as provided by Const. art. 1, § 14.

5. States ⟹112, 191(1)—State cannot be sued without its consent; state not liable for torts of its officers or servants.

State cannot be sued without its consent, and generally is not liable for torts of its officers, agents, or servants, and can be made so liable only by its clear and definitely given consent.

6. Drains ⟸19 — Drainage district, being deemed a governmental agency, was not liable for negligence of servants.

Drainage district organized under St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 117, being deemed a governmental agency, was not subject to an action for damages for injuries to property, resulting from negligence of its servants in setting fire to grass in front of dredger, being used by it for that purpose, which fire spread to and destroyed another's property.

7. Drains ⟸17 — Statute providing that reclamation board should have power to sue and be sued is remedial only.

St. 1913, p. 266, § 3, creating reclamation board and providing that it shall have power to sue and be sued, merely affords a remedy where none was formerly available for enforcement of such liability as would have existed if statute had not been enacted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by the Western Assurance Company of Toronto, a corporation, and others against the Sacramento & San Joaquin Drainage District, a body corporate and politic. From judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Miller & Thornton, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Downey, Downey & Seymour and Stephen W. Downey, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiffs, five in number, are duly organized corporations, and, during all the times mentioned in the complaint, engaged in the fire insurance business in the state of California, by authority of and obediently to the laws thereof. Each of these insurance companies—some in the year 1919 and the others in the year 1920—issued a policy of insurance in a certain specified sum on the dwelling house, a tankhouse, and windmill, a blacksmith shop, a garage, a large barn and two small barns, all located upon the east side of Sutter basin by-pass levee, on what was formerly known as the Ball ranch, in Sutter county, and of which property the Sutter Basin Company was then and at the time of the commencement of this action the owner and in possession. The aggregate amount of the insurance so taken upon and covering said property was $23,587.88.

The defendant is a body corporate and politic under and by virtue of the provisions of an act of the Legislature of the state of California, approved Dec. 24, 1911 (Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 117), and subsequent acts amendatory thereof, said defendant being "generally known and designated as the 'Reclamation Board of the State of California.'"

The complaint thus states the ground upon which the plaintiffs base their alleged cause of action against the defendant as follows:

"That on the 1st day of September, 1919, the defendant above named acting by and through the reclamation board of the state of California, made and entered into a contract in writing with one William P. Dwyer, wherein and whereby the said Dwyer was engaged and employed by it to do certain work in connection with the construction and completion of the east levee of the Sutter by-pass and the east and west levees of Wadsworth slough canal and the drainage east of Sutter by-pass under and in accordance with and subject to the supervision, directions, and instructions of said reclamation board, or its representatives, which said work or a portion thereof, was done for the said Dwyer under and subject to the supervision, directions and instructions of said reclamation board, or its representatives, by the Ajax Dredging Company.

"That in the doing of said work the said Ajax Dredging Company set fire to grass and weeds in front of a dredger being used by it for that purpose, which fire, by and through the carelessness and negligence of the persons in charge thereof, spread to a stubble field adjoining the place where said fire was started, and then to the buildings and structures of the said Sutter Basin Company, which are set forth and described in paragraph VI of this complaint, and totally destroyed the same to the damage of the said Sutter Basin Company in the sum of $4,410, which said sum was the reasonable market price and value of said property so destroyed at the time of its said destruction."

The payment by the several plaintiffs of their respective proportions of the loss, sustained by reason of the destruction of the property mentioned, is then alleged, and, further, that, prior to the commencement of this action, the said Sutter Basin Company, "in consideration of the payment to it by said insurance companies, respectively, of the amounts" paid to said company for the loss as alleged in the complaint, assigned and transferred to the plaintiffs all claims and demands that it had "against any person or persons whatsoever arising out of the fire which destroyed the property referred to in paragraph VI" of the complaint, "and that, ever since that time, the plaintiffs have been, and now are, the sole and exclusive owners of said claims, and all thereof." These claims and the assignments thereof to plaintiffs, the complaint proceeds, were before the commencement of this action, duly presented to the reclamation board of the state of California, "which said reclamation board at all the dates and times herein stated was, and now is, acting for and on behalf of the defendant above named with reference to any and all of the matters of fact and things herein alleged," and that said reclamation board, acting for and on behalf of the defendant, rejected and refused to allow said claims, or any part thereof," and refused to allow or pay the same or any part thereof. The aggregate amount for which judgment is prayed is the sum of $2,472.92.

The defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground of the insufficiency of facts to state a cause of action, and on the special grounds of ambiguity, unintelligibleness, and uncertainty in numerous specified particulars. The court sustained the demurrer, without leave to amend, and thereupon dismissed the action. This appeal is by the plaintiffs from the judgment entered upon said orders.

The pivotal question presented herein is whether an action will lie against the defendant for damage to property occurring in consequence of the negligence of its servants or employees. This question was, of course, raised by the general demurrer, and the ruling sustaining the demurrer presents the question to us.

[1-3] It is established by the decisions that drainage and reclamation districts, in strictness, are not corporations, "but rather governmental agencies to carry out a specific purpose—the agency ceasing with the accomplishment of the purpose." People ex rel. Chapman v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 382, 103 P. 207, 212. See, also, People v. Reclamation District 551, 117 Cal. 114, 48 P. 1016; People v. Levee District No. 6, 131 Cal. 30, 63 P. 676; Reclamation District No. 551 v. County of Sacramento, 134 Cal. 477, 66 P. 668; Reclamation District No. 70 v. Sherman, 11 Cal. App. 399, 105 P. 277; Whiteman v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irrigation District, 60 Cal. App. 234, 212 P. 706. Some of the drainage and reclamation and irrigation districts considered by the cases just mentioned were formed and organized under special acts of the Legislature and some under the general laws of the state, and, while the administration of the affairs of all of them is committed entirely to the owners of the lands embraced within the districts, still they are, nevertheless, public mandatories or governmental agencies through which the state administers and executes one of its most important functions. The reason that that is so as to reclamation districts is because the swamp and overflowed lands of California were granted by the general government to the state upon condition that the latter would see to the reclamation of the same so that they might become suitable for the purposes of cultivation, and, as an essential corollary of that proposition, those who purchase such lands from the state so take them subject to the right, and indeed the duty, of the state, either by a scheme immediately directed and supervised by itself through officers or agents appointed for that purpose, or by committing that duty to the owners themselves of such lands, to coerce such reclamation according to such rules, regulations, and plans as may be prescribed by the state through its Legislature. If, however, drainage and reclamation districts organized and their affairs administered by virtue of special acts or under the general laws of the state are public mandatories or governmental agencies of the state, there is much stronger reason for holding that where the sole and exclusive right and power to administer the affairs of a district organized to carry out and accomplish the same general purpose is by the state, through its Legislature, vested solely in itself, the district or organization so established constitutes a public mandatory or governmental agency of the state in the strictest sense—as much so, indeed, as any other governmental agency or department created by the Legislature, such as the state highway commission, the state board of education, the state board of health, the state mining bureau, and the numerous other like instrumentalities, through and by means of which the state exercises and applies portions of its sovereign authority. Indeed, it has frequently well been held that the act of the state in taking cognizance of and jurisdiction over the matter of flood control and all other works germane thereto involves a valid exercise of the state's police power. See Gray v. Reclamation Dist. 1500, 174 Cal. 622, and cases therein cited at page 638, 163 P. 1024.

That the defendant herein is strictly a state agency is a proposition not only clearly shown by the provisions themselves of the several legislative acts creating and vesting in it the powers which it is authorized to exercise to accomplish the great purposes of its creation, but also thoroughly established and settled by the decisions of our courts. In confirmation of this statement, it is hardly necessary to go further than to reproduce herein the following from the case of Argyle Dredging Co. v. Chambers, 40 Cal. App. 332, 343, 181 P. 84, 88:

"Much more closely is the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district knitted to the state and really part of it than is the ordinary drainage district. Section 7 of the Reclamation Act of 1915 declares that 'the state of California and the people thereof are hereby declared to have a primary and supreme interest in having erected, maintained and protected on the banks of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers and their tributaries and the bypasses and overflow channels and basins mentioned herein, good and sufficient levees and embankments or other works of reclamation, adequately protecting the lands overflowed or subject to overflow by said streams, * * * and it shall be the duty of the reclamation board at all times to enforce on behalf of the state of California and the people thereof the erection, maintenance and protection of such levees * * * as will, in their judgment, best serve the interests of the state of California. The purposes and objects of this act are to carry into effect the plans of the California débris commission with such modifications and amendments and such additional plans as have been or may hereafter be adopted by the reclamation board for the control of the flood waters of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers and their tributaries and said basins and to vest in said reclamation board control and jurisdiction over said plans.'"

Interesting, too, to the present inquiry, is the clear and succinct statement, embraced in the opinion in the Argyle Dredging Co. Case, of the Honorable Robert T. Devlin, a recognized authority upon the subject, of the objects and legislative history of the acts creating the state board of reclamation and the defendant and providing for the work to be done and for the governing machinery thereof. Mr. Devlin therein shows that said legislative acts were the culmination of an agreement between the general government and the state of California, based upon elaborate reports as to flood control and reclamation along the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers by government engineers, whereby the federal government and the state of California were to undertake, under the exclusive jurisdiction and control of the state, at the joint expense of the two governments, and the landowners to be benefited thereby, the accomplishment of the prodigious purposes of said legislation.

Thus it is to be seen that, in considering this appeal, or the questions presented for solution thereby, we are dealing with a public mandatory or governmental agency of the state—indeed, with the state itself, exercising through and by means of the defendant or its governing body portions of the infinite variety of functions which belong or are pertinent to its sovereign powers and the policies essentially incident thereto.

[4] The complaint, it will be observed, does not state facts which would bring this case within the terms of section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution, which, among other things, provides that—

"Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made to, or paid into court for, the owner."

There is no allegation in the complaint from which it is to be inferred or implied that the property destroyed was thus taken or damaged for a public use or to promote the ends of a public use. It is not alleged that the setting of the fire to the grass and weeds "in front of the dredger" constituted an act necessary to the doing of the work in the performance of which, for the defendant, the dredger company was then engaged. And, even if a direct averment to that effect were in the complaint, and it was true, the basis of the charge of the plaintiffs would not rest on that fact, but upon the fact that the agents or servants of the defendant, by their carelessness and negligence, caused an act, in and of itself necessary and proper, to extend its effect beyond the designed and legitimate purpose and scope thereof, to the damage of the property described in the complaint. This, it is clear, makes a case only in which it is sought to bind the defendant, upon the doctrine of respondeat superior, to liability for the consequences of a tort negligently committed by its officers, agents, employees, or servants while performing their duties as such.

[5] It is elementary that the state cannot be sued in any case without its consent; and all the authorities are united upon the proposition that it is a general principle of law that a state is not liable for the torts of its officers, agents, or servants, and that it can be made so liable only upon its clear and definitely given consent. See notes, 13 A. L. R. 1276.

In Gibbons v. U. S., 8 Wall. 275, 19 L. Ed. 453, Mr. Justice Miller said:

"The general principle which we have already stated as applicable to all governments, forbids, on a policy imposed by necessity, that they should hold themselves liable for unauthorized wrongs inflicted by their officers on the citizen, though occurring while engaged in the discharge of official duties."

In his work on Agency (§ 319), Judge Story declares that—

"The government does not undertake to guarantee to any person the fidelity of any of its officers or agents whom it employs, since that would involve it in all its operations in endless embarrassments, and difficulties and losses, which would be subversive of the public interests."

See, also, Hensley v. Reclamation District No. 556, 121 Cal. 96, 97, 53 P. 401; Sels v. Greene (C. C.) 81 F. 555, affirmed in (C. C.) 88 F. 127.

[6, 7] Neither the acts creating the defendant or the state board of reclamation, nor any other statute with which we are familiar, authorize actions against the defendant or the state board of reclamation for damage or injury to property resulting from the negligence of its servants, agents, or employees, while engaged in the performance of services or their duties as such. It is true that the act whereby the defendant was brought into existence (section 3, Stats. 1913, p. 266) provides that said board "shall have power to sue and to be sued"; but such a provision in a statute creating a governmental agency is remedial only—that is, its effect is not to create a liability against such governmental agency, but merely to afford a remedy where none was formerly available for the enforcement of "such liability as would have existed if the statute had not been enacted." Denning v. State of California, 123 Cal. 316, 319, 55 P. 1000, 1001. See, also, Chapman v. State, etc., 104 Cal. 690, 38 P. 457, 43 Am. St. Rep. 158; Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 16, 53 P. 416.

It has uniformly been held in this state, as we have seen, that irrigation districts, formed and organized under the general laws, of the state or by special legislative acts, are governmental agencies of the state, and it has also likewise been held that the law as to such organizations is the same as that applicable to public or governmental agencies, whose objects or purposes are similar to those of the defendant. See In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 28 P. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106; Jenison v. Redfield, 149 Cal. 500, 87 P. 62; Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 315, 187 P. 1056; Turlock Irr. Dist. v. White, 186 Cal. 183, 198 P. 1060, 17 A. L. R. 72; Tormey v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irr. Dist., 53 Cal. App. 559, 200 P. 814; Whiteman v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irr. Dist. et al., 60 Cal. App. 234, 237 et seq., 212 P. 706.

In the case last named (Whiteman v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irr. Dist.), the very question involved herein was presented to this court. In the opinion the late Justice Burnett, the author thereof, after reviewing many authorities, and an exhaustive consideration of the several points involved therein, summarized the conclusions of this court in said case as follows:

"(1) Whatever may be the recognized rule in other jurisdictions under similar legislation, an irrigation district organized under the Wright Act or California Irrigation District Act must be deemed a public agency created for a public purpose; (2) such agency is not subject to an action for damages resulting from the negligence of its officers or agents in the absence of a statute expressly imposing such liability; (3) that no such liability is expressly imposed in or by the law providing for the organization and government of such districts or by any other statute of this state."

The foregoing summary of the conclusions arrived at in that case is precisely applicable to this. Indeed, that case is decisive of the instant case,

It is not necessary to review the cases cited by the plaintiffs herein which they claim support their contention that the complaint states a cause of action against the defendant. There is no inconsistency between the rulings in those cases and the conclusions herein reached. We do not, of course, here hold that, where public work is done by the agents or employees of a public corporation, such, for instance, a municipality, in accordance with specific directions of or plans and specifications adopted by the corporation itself through its governing body, such corporation would not be liable in damages for injuries to the property of a citizen necessarily and directly resulting from the performance of the work itself. That in such circumstances a public corporation would be so liable is precisely what section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution declares, and what the cases relied upon by the plaintiffs herein hold, and properly so. No such a case is presented here, however, as has above been pointed out.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BUCK. (Cr. 835.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 16, 1925.)

Criminal law ⟸1129(1), 1130(1)—Appellate Court not required to search record, where no brief is filed, and no specifications of error made in trial.

Appellate Court is not required to search record to determine whether or not trial was without prejudice to rights of defendant, where no brief has been filed on his behalf, and there has been no specification of errors made in the trial of the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

H. Buck was convicted of incest, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Hale Day, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

McDANIEL, Justice pro tem. The defendant was convicted of the crime of incest. The appeal to this court is from the judgment of conviction following a verdict of guilty, as charged in the information, and the order denying defendant's motion for new trial.

The appeal has been submitted upon the record in the case. No brief has been filed on behalf of the defendant, and there has been no specification of errors made in the trial of the case.

As is said in the case of People v. Perry, 16 Cal. App. 771, 117 P. 1036:

"This court is not required, in the absence of special assignments, in some form, of alleged error, to search the record for the purpose of determining whether the trial in the court below was in all respects conducted without prejudice to the substantial rights of the accused.

"We have, however, taken the pains carefully to read the stenographer's transcription of the testimony, and we have, from such investigation, discovered no reason for questioning its sufficiency to justify and support the verdict."

The judgment and order are accordingly affirmed.

TUFFIN et ux. v. WARFIELD et ux. (Civ. 2862.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟸143—Vendee held to have waived vendor's default by remaining in possession thereafter and admitting he was bound for purchase price.

Vendee held to have waived vendor's failure to have title quieted within time specified in contract by remaining in possession and improving land after expiration of time limit and by writing letter in which he indicated that he deemed himself bound for purchase price, though he objected to paying part cost of clearing title.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟸120 — Vendee, waiving vendor's default, must demand performance within reasonable time to again put vendor in default.

Vendee, having waived provision of contract fixing time limit for clearing up title, could place vendor in default only by demanding performance within a reasonable time, and a letter by vendee demanding that vendor "settle" pecuniarily with him, but which did not demand that vendor clear up title, was not such a demand.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Allan Tuffin and Helen Tuffin against Charles F. Warfield and Annie E. Warfield. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

E. Fitzgerald, of Placerville (Thomas Maul, of Placerville, of counsel), for appellants.

Abe Darlington and Henry S. Lyon, both of Placerville, for respondents.

JONES, Justice pro tem. On December 15, 1920, the appellants and respondents entered into an agreement, by the terms of which the respondents agreed to sell to the appellants, and the latter agreed to buy, certain farm land situate in El Dorado county, for the sum of $7,500, of which amount $2,000 was paid on the execution of the agreement, and the balance was to be paid upon the execution and delivery of the deed. The vendees, it was agreed, should have immediate possession of the premises, and, if the vendors failed to give a good and sufficient title, the vendees should be permitted to remain on the land for the period of one year from the date of the agreement, and to take the proceeds of the farm as compensation for their services and loss of time in cultivating and caring for the premises.

It was further "agreed that certain landmarks used in the description of said property have been obliterated by the lapse of time, and it is necessary that the said property shall be resurveyed, and that thereafter a suit to quiet title be instituted for the purpose of decreeing the title vested in said vendors, and for that purpose the parties hereto agree to equally share said expenses; that in event said suit shall not be successful that all moneys heretofore paid by said vendees to said vendors shall be refunded to said vendees by said vendors. And it is agreed that said surveying and the prosecuting of said action shall be done within one year from the date hereof, and, in case the title to the whole of said lands has not been quieted and found to be sufficient within said period of one year, said vendors shall be regarded and treated as having failed to give title as herein provided and required. Time is expressly made the essence of the contract.

Upon the completion of said survey of said premises and the final adjudication in said suit to quiet title, decreeing said title to be vested in said vendors within the time limited in the contract, the vendees agreed to pay $1,750, and give a mortgage on the property for the sum of $3,750. We have not set forth all the provisions of the agreement, but only those we deem necessary to be considered on this appeal.

The appellants entered into the possession of the land, and cultivated it, and made certain improvements thereon. The title, however, was not quieted within the time specified in the contract, and on July 21, 1922, the appellants commenced an action against the respondents, alleging the failure by the latter to furnish the former with a good title and to complete proceedings in perfecting the title according to the agreement, and demanding the return of all moneys paid and damages for the breach. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, from which judgment the plaintiffs have taken an appeal.

The appellants contend that certain findings made by the trial court are not supported by the evidence, and that the court erred in admitting certain testimony offered by the respondents.

Appellants' claim for relief is based upon the alleged failure of respondents to procure, within the time designated in the contract, a decree quieting their title to the land, but it is the contention of the respondents that the appellants waived such default of the respondents and gave no new notice demanding performance at any particular time. The findings objected to are, in the main, of facts supporting this contention of the respondents.

[1] An examination of the record reveals that there was evidence presented supporting the findings of the court that the appellants had waived the time limit fixed in the agreement for the procuring of the decree quieting title. The admitted acts and conduct on the part of the appellants were such as to compel the conclusion that, if the vendors were in default on December 15, 1921, the default was waived, and that they had lost their right to insist that time was of the essence as to that clause of the agreement. They continued to remain in possession of the land after the expiration of the year, and made improvements thereon, such as the setting out, in March, 1922, of 2,800 grape cuttings. On March 19, 1922, the following letter was written by Allan Tuffin to the respondent Chas. F. Warfield:

"Am writing you a few facts regarding the ranch. Of course you are aware, I suppose, that our agreement is out dated and is useless as far as I can see, so everything stands about the same as it did a year ago, but I know quite a lot more about this ranch than I did at that time."

Here follows a description of the bad condition of the orchard, and the writer then continues:

"Well, Mr. Warfield, under those conditions and the price I agreed to pay for the place which I think is all that is worth in more improved conditions, do you think it is fair and just for you to expect me to pay half of the expense of getting a clear title for your property? I will take my medicine on the purchase price of the place but paying half of the cost is a little too strong."

One would be justified in construing this communication to mean that, while the writer deemed himself bound to pay the purchase price fixed by the contract, yet, owing to the poor condition of the farm and the work he had done to improve it, he did not feel that he should be expected to pay one-half of the expense of clearing the title. The terms of this letter, combined with the acts of the appellants in connection with the land, were sufficient to constitute a waiver of their right to declare the respondents in default as of December 15, 1921.

The rule is laid down by Pomeroy in his work on Contracts, § 418:

"Whether time is originally essential or is made so by notice, or is simply material, all objections to a delay, either in finally completing or in doing any particular act, or to a failure to comply with the stipulations concerning time, will be waived by conduct on the part of the one who could otherwise raise them, which show with reasonable certainty that he could not consistently have intended to insist upon the objection, or that he did intend to treat the contract as still subsisting, notwithstanding the delay. * * * If the title is not yet perfect, and the day for completion passes, but the vendee continues the negotiation or dealing concerning it, he thereby waives the delay."

[2] Appellants, having waived the provision fixing the time for the clearing of the title, could then place the respondents in default in regard to such provision only by demanding performance within a reasonable time. "Where time was originally essential, but for sufficient cause a forfeiture for default therein has been waived, time ceases to be essential, and becomes only material thereafter until the vendor again makes it essential by a proper notice and demand." Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 299, 110 P. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126; and in the case of Daly v. Ruddell, 137 Cal. 671, 70 P. 784, it was held that—

"The circumstances disclose a waiver of Ruddell's right to insist that time was of the essence of the contract, and this being the case, it was incumbent upon him before terminating the contract to give notice to the other party, and allow a reasonable time within which to do any act required before the contract can be considered as violated or rescinded."

Appellants contend that such a notice for performance was given by a letter from Allan Tuffin to Mr. Warfield, dated June 19, 1922, the pertinent portions of which are as follows:

"I want you to settle with me as quick as possible. I mean pay me what you owe me and I will get off the place. * * * I will expect some action on your part in less than thirty days, if not I will take some. Hoping we will settle without trouble. * * *"

This document fails completely to demand that the respondents clear the title within 30 days or any other time. It does demand that the respondents "settle" with the appellants, and the writer explains that he means by "settle" to pay what is owing him. It clearly lacks those matters essential to later place the respondents in default for a failure to complete their contract.

"The notice cannot be an arbitrary and sudden termination of the transaction; it cannot put an immediate end to a pending dispute or negotiation as to the title; it must allow a reasonable length of time for the other party to perform, and, if it fails in any of these respects, it may be disregarded, and will produce no effect upon the equitable remedial rights of the party to whom it is given. * * * The notice also to be effectual in making the time allotted an essential element of the performance, must be express, clear, distinct, and unequivocal." Pomeroy on Contracts, § 396.

A review of the evidence determines that there was a sufficient showing to justify the trial court in finding that there was a waiver on the part of the appellants of the time limit fixed by the agreement for perfecting the title, and that no notice terminating such waiver and allowing a reasonable time for the performance of the contract in that respect had been given by appellants at any time, from which it would follow that the respondents were not in default at the time of the commencement of the action.

As to the contention of the appellants that the court erred in admitting evidence of a conversation of the appellant A. Tuffin with the witness Darlington, in which reference was made to an alleged request by the former to be permitted to withdraw certain money on deposit in his name, it must be held that no error was committed, as the conversation was clearly admissible as bearing upon the question of waiver.

Respondents, in their brief, seek to have reviewed an order of the trial court, relieving appellants from their default in failing to give the notice to the clerk to prepare the transcript within the time required by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure; the appellants having elected to proceed under the provisions of that section. The authority of this court to review such an order on an appeal from the judgment may be questioned, but the conclusion we have reached on the merits of the appeal make it unnecessary to determine the question or to review the making of the order by the trial court, if such review would be proper.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HEAPE. (Cr. 1192.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 9, 1925. Rehearing Denied May 9, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 8, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⟸413(1)—Conversation occurring after defendant's arrest, and after he had become aware that he was suspected of larceny, held properly excluded as being self-serving.

In prosecution for larceny by fraud and trickery, question which was broad enough to call for conversation occurring after defendant's arrest, and long after he had become aware that he was suspected of larceny, held properly excluded as being self-serving.

2. Criminal law ⟸413(1)—Statements after larceny are not admissible in defendant's behalf, unless made at or about time property was taken, or as a part of res gestæ.

Though statements at any time after larceny are admissible against accused to show his felonious intent, they are not admissible in his behalf to show an honest intent, unless they are made at or about the time property was taken, or as a part of the res gestæ.

3. Criminal law ⟸670—Exclusion of question relating to conversation not erroneous where no offer of proof made.

In prosecution for larceny, exclusion of question relating to conversation between complaining witness and defendant was not erroneous, where no offer was made by defendant to prove by conversation any specific fact, and purpose of question was not obvious from its terms.

4. Criminal law ⟸670—Question as to delivery of money or property by defendant to complaining witness properly excluded, as including acts after defendant's arrest.

In prosecution for larceny, question whether defendant ever gave complaining witness any money or property was so broad that it included acts after defendant's arrest, and after he knew that he was charged with larceny, and was properly excluded.

5. Criminal law ⟸670—Questions concerning demands made by complaining witness on defendant properly excluded when not limited to date prior to consummation of larceny.

In prosecution for larceny, questions to complaining witness to show unreasonable demands made by him on defendant were properly excluded when not limited to date prior to consummation of crime.

6. Criminal law ⟸1170(1)—Refusal to permit defendant to testify as to what he had done with all his funds in prosecution for larceny held not prejudicial.

In prosecution for larceny of money received for investment, court's refusal to permit defendant to testify as to what he had done with moneys received from his business transactions held not prejudicial, where defendant was allowed to state his reasons for failing to carry out his contract with complaining witness.

7. Larceny ⟸52—Refusal to permit defendant to testify as to failure to possess a broker's license, held not prejudicial.

In prosecution for larceny of money received for investment, in which there was evidence of false representation by defendant that he had broker's license refusal to permit defendant to testify as to his reason for failing to procure a license held not prejudicial.

8. Larceny ⟸44—Refusal to permit defendant to testify why incorporation of fictitious corporation was never completed held not erroneous.

In prosecution for larceny of money obtained by false pretenses for investment in corporation, which defendant claimed he had taken steps to incorporate, but which was nonexistent at time he pretended to be its authorized representative, empowered to contract for it, refusal to permit defendant to testify as to why incorporation was never completed held not erroneous.

9. Witnesses ⟸388(2) — Conversation with complaining witness subsequent to larceny held properly excluded.

In prosecution for larceny, exclusion of conversation with complaining witness, subsequent to time when crime must have been fully consummated, held not erroneous, where no foundation had been laid for impeachment of complaining witness, since, save for such purpose, nothing said by complaining witness after consummation of crime could be competent evidence for defense.

10. Witnesses ⊂⊃245—Refusal to permit witness to testify further as to defendant's reputation in prosecution for larceny held not erroneous.

In prosecution for larceny, refusal to permit witness, who disclaimed any knowledge of defendant's reputation for honesty in community in which he resided, but who was permitted to testify that, so far as he knew, defendant's reputation in his business relations was good, to testify further as to defendant's reputation, held, not erroneous.

11. Criminal law ⊂⊃379—Accused cannot show what his reputation for particular trait is among members of a particular class of people.

While it is permissible for accused when a particular trait of character is in issue to show his general reputation with regard to such trait in communities in which he has lived, it is not permissible to show what his reputation for such trait is among members of a particular class of people.

12. Criminal law ⊂⊃829(3)—Refusal of defendant's requested instruction held not prejudicial, in view of court's instruction.

Refusal of defendant's instruction that if he had no felonious intent to steal property when he took it, jury must acquit him, though he subsequently conceived such intent, though correct as an abstract proposition of law, held, not prejudicial, in view of court's charge that accused must have obtained possession "with felonious intention of stealing it when he gets possession of it."

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Trafford Henry Heape was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. A. Shutt and Arthur C. Fisher, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Hamish B. Eddie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant was charged with the larceny of $250, the property of one Bruce G. Kingsley. He was found guilty as charged, and now appeals from the judgment of conviction.

A general outline of the case, as shown by the people's witnesses, sufficient for an understanding of the points to be discussed, may be stated thus: On October 3, 1923, Kingsley and the defendant—the latter assuming to act in the name of and for and on behalf of a fictitious corporation designated as the Great Western Builders Inc.—executed a written contract whereby Kingsley agreed to pay $1,000 to the mythical corporation, and that supposititious entity, according to the letter of the contract, agreed (1) to apply the $1,000 to the purchase of a certain lot in the city of Los Angeles, and to build a bungalow thereon for Kingsley; (2) to arrange for all such financial aid as might be necessary to carry out the agreement; (3) to complete the building within 90 days; and (4) to secure for Kingsley, within such 90-day period, a purchaser of the lot with the building thereon who would buy the premises at a price that would net Kingsley a profit of $1,000. There was either no such corporation as the Great Western Builders, Inc., or, if there was, defendant had no connection therewith.

Kingsley did not have more than about $250 in ready money available for the purpose of his agreement, and it was therefore agreed between him and defendant that, instead of paying the full amount of $1,000 in cash, he would give his check for $250 to defendant, and also deliver a certain trust deed which had been executed in Kingsley's favor by certain parties some years previously to secure an indebtedness evidenced by a promissory note upon which the sum of $1,019.19 remained unpaid. Pursuant to the last-mentioned agreement, entered into contemporaneously with the one first mentioned, Kingsley delivered his check for $250 to defendant, payable to the latter's order, and also delivered to him the trust deed and the note secured thereby. Thereupon defendant delivered to Kingsley a written receipt, which recited that the trust deed was to be used by the Great Western Builders, Inc., "as collateral security to the extent of not less than $750, until such time as Dr. Kingsley shall remit $750 in currency, said deed to be thereupon returned to the said Dr. Kingsley immediately." The receipt also recited that the check for $250, with the $750 so to be raised on the trust deed, "shall be taken to apply * * * as payment of the sum of $1,000 referred to" in the first-mentioned agreement.

Upon receiving Kingsley's check for $250, defendant indorsed his name upon it and deposited it to his credit at his bank. The 90-day period passed within which the Great Western Builders, Inc., was to do the things which ostensibly it had undertaken to do, and no attempt was made to build the bungalow or do any of the things which defendant, in the name of the Great Western Builders, Inc., had promised should be done with Kingsley's money. It is true that, when testifying as a witness on his own behalf, defendant advanced a specious excuse for his failure to carry out the terms of the agreement with Kingsley, but it is evident that the jury attached no credence to his story, for, by its verdict of conviction, it impliedly found that defendant intended all the while to convert the $250 to his own use, and that he obtained possession of the check by fraud and trickery; i. e., under the false pretense that he would invest the $250 for Kingsley so that the latter, within a period of 90 days, would be repaid the full amount of his investment, and also make a profit thereon of 100 per cent.

It is contended that the court erred in its rulings upon objections to certain evidence, and also in refusing certain instructions requested by appellant. We shall consider appellant's points in the order of their presentation.

[1, 2] On his cross-examination, the complaining witness, on being asked by defendant's counsel if he knew what had become of the trust deed and the note which he had delivered to defendant to be used as collateral in raising the sum of $750, replied that he had since learned that they had come into the hands of a certain law firm in Los Angeles, but that he did not know how the firm had obtained possession of the documents. Thereupon defendant's counsel propounded this question: "Did you ever have a conversation with Mr. Heape [the defendant] in which you spoke or talked of this trust deed and note, and how it got into these people's hands?" To this question the court sustained an objection interposed by the district attorney. Appellant assigns this as error. We cannot perceive how it was possible for appellant to be injured by the ruling. He was not charged with the theft of the trust deed or of the note secured thereby. He claims that if the question had been answered in the affirmative and had then been followed by a question educing the conversation, it might have been shown that when he made the contract of October 3, 1923, he had no intention to defraud Kingsley. It is not claimed that anything was said by Kingsley in the course of the conversation which would shed light upon appellant's intention. The claim, as we understand it, is that appellant himself might have said something during the conversation which would tend to show that, when he executed the contract in the name of the supposititious corporation, he honestly intended to fulfil his promissory representations. At least one flaw in this argument is that the question to which the objection was sustained is broad enough to include any conversation between appellant and Kingsley in which mention was made of the note and trust deed, and how they got into the hands of the Los Angeles law firm, regardless of the time when the conversation may have taken place. The question was broad enough to call for a conversation occurring after appellant's arrest, and long after he had become aware that his right to the $250 was questioned, and that he was suspected of larceny. Anything which he may have said in his own behalf after his arrest, or after his right to the money was first brought into question, would be self-serving and inadmissible. Though statements made at any time after the larceny are admissible against the accused to show his felonious intent, they are not admissible in his behalf to show an honest intent unless they were made at or about the time the property was taken, or as a part of the res gestæ, i. e., instantly upon the property being discovered in his possession, or immediately upon the accusation of theft being brought home to his knowledge, and before he has had the opportunity to concoct evidence exculpatory of himself. Evidence of statements made by the defendant at any other time is inadmissible in his behalf. 36 C. J. p. 890; 17 R. C. L. pp. 77, 78; Mason v. State, 171 Ind. 78, 85 N. E. 776, 16 Ann. Cas. 1212. Such statements are excluded as evidence on behalf of the accused, not because they might never contribute to the ascertainment of the truth, but because, if received, they would most commonly consist of falsehoods fabricated for the occasion, and would mislead oftener than they would enlighten. 16 C. J. pp. 636, 637.

[3] Moreover, no offer was made by appellant to prove by the conversation, if any was had, any specific fact or facts. The purpose of the question, as now stated by appellant, was not obvious from its terms. In such cases the party seeking to introduce the evidence should make an offer of what he expects to prove, so that the trial court may determine whether the proposed proof is material and relevant.

[4] The complaining witness, when testifying on his direct examination, stated that the $250 represented by the check which he had given defendant was never returned to him. In the course of his cross-examination the witness testified that he never received any consideration from defendant prior to the latter's arrest. He also testified that just previous to defendant's preliminary examination, the latter gave the witness three documents. What those documents were does not appear, for at this point in the witness' narrative he was interrupted by an objection interposed by the district attorney to any evidence as to defendant's acts subsequent to his arrest. From the colloquy which then ensued between court and counsel it appears that it was the purpose of defendant's counsel to show by his client's conduct that it was not the latter's intention to appropriate the $250 to his own use, in violation of the agreement which had been made with the complaining witness on October 3, 1923. Without making any specific ruling upon the objection, the learned trial judge stated from the bench that the rule in such cases is that evidence of a defendant's conduct after his arrest is not admissible in his favor on the question of intention in taking the property. There was no intimation from the court that counsel could not show by his cross-examination of the complaining witness anything which may have been said or done by defendant prior to his arrest. The rule thus announced by the court was as favorable to appellant as he could rightfully expect. As we already have stated, evidence of the acts or declarations of one accused of larceny, done or made after he becomes aware that he is charged with the theft, and when he has had an opportunity to concoct a defense, is not admissible in his favor. After the court had thus announced the line of demarcation which delimits such acts and declarations of an accused as are admissible in his behalf, defendant's counsel propounded to the complaining witness this question: "Did he [defendant] ever give you anything in the way of money or property?" The question was objected to by the district attorney upon the ground that any testimony regarding the return of money subsequent to the 90-day period referred to in the agreement of October 3, 1923, is incompetent and immaterial. The court sustained the objection. It is of this ruling that appellant now complains. From the tenor of the remarks previously made from the bench, defendant's counsel must have known that he would be allowed to question the witness as to any act done by defendant prior to his arrest, and which might tend to shed light upon his intention at the time when he received the check for $250. But notwithstanding the court's painstaking care to enlighten the parties with regard to the proper limits within which all such questions should be confined, defendant's counsel saw fit to ask a question which was of a scope so broad that it included the delivery of any money or property by defendant to Kingsley after the former's arrest, and after he knew that he was charged with larceny. For this reason, if for none other, the question was objectionable.

[5] The court sustained objections to each of the following questions propounded to the complaining witness on his cross-examination:

"Did you ever have a conversation with Mr. Heape in which you asked for $2,800?"

"Did you ever make any demand for any more than $250, or the trust deed?"

We are told by appellant's counsel that the purpose of these questions was to show that Kingsley made unreasonable demands upon defendant; wherefore it is argued that if such demands were made their unreasonableness would tend to explain and to excuse defendant's failure to return the $250. The questions were so general and indefinite as to time that the witness might have answered concerning demands made by him as recently as a date subsequent to the consummation of the crime and after defendant's arrest, or even as recently as some time during the progress of the trial. Obviously, no act of omission or commission on appellant's part, no matter what the excuse therefor may have been, could absolve him or justify his crime if it occurred subsequently to the full consummation of the alleged larceny, which, if committed, must have culminated at a time prior to the filing of the complaint with the committing magistrate. Appellant's counsel made no attempt to ask the witness any question which would have directed his attention to a time prior to the date when the alleged larceny, if committed, must have become a fully consummated and completed offense. It was not error, therefore, to sustain an objection to questions so indefinite and uncertain. State v. Bailey, 31 Wash. 89, 71 P. 715. See, also, People v. Machado, 6 Cal. Unrep. 600, 63 P. 66; People v. Lee, 13 Cal. App. 48, 108 P. 738; and 40 Cyc. p. 2420. Particularly is this so in view of the of the trial judge's clear and explicit statement of the rule that evidence of defendant's conduct, or of conversations had with him, occurring subsequently to his arrest, is not admissible.

[6] After having testified that he received the check for $250 from Kingsley, and that he had deposited it in his bank so as to mingle it with his other funds, defendant, who had taken the stand as a witness in his own behalf, was asked by his counsel on his direct examination to state, not what he had done with the $250, but what he had done with all his funds—the product of moneys which he had received from time to time in his business transactions. The court, on objection being made by the district attorney, and after the witness had commenced to answer the question, refused to permit defendant to testify further along that line. This is now assigned as error, appellant claiming that had he been permitted to testify as to what he had done with all of his funds it would have had a bearing upon the question as to whether he had an intention to defraud Kingsley at the time when he received the latter's check for $250. We fail to perceive how the testimony could have been material or relevant to the issue of fraudulent intent. Moreover, the court expressly announced from the bench, during the ensuing colloquy, that appellant would be permitted to testify as to what resources he had for carrying out his contract with Kingsley, and also that he might give the reason why he did not "go ahead" with that contract. Accordingly, defendant testified that the reason why he did not proceed with his contract was that certain moneys which his business associate expected to have available for the purpose were not forthcoming. Having been allowed thus to state what he claimed was his sole reason for failing to perform his promissory representations to Kingsley, we are utterly unable to perceive how he could possibly have been injured by the ruling of which he now complains.

[7] When the prosecution was putting in its evidence in chief, the prosecuting witness, without any objection from the defense, testified that when defendant was negotiating for the contract of October 3, 1923, the latter represented himself as the possessor of a broker's license, and that subsequently the witness discovered that defendant never had a license. Defendant, when testifying in his own behalf, admitted that he was not a licensed broker. He was then asked by his counsel why he did not have a license. To this question the court sustained an objection. We do not see how appellant could have been injured by this ruling. Assuming, for the purpose of the argument, the relevancy and materiality of Kingsley's testimony to the effect that appellant falsely represented himself as the possessor of a broker's license, nevertheless, the falsity of that representation, and the fact that appellant must have known it to be false, would in no wise be overcome by the fact that appellant may have had some excuse for not procuring a license. His reason for failing to secure a license, whatever that reason may have been, cannot affect the fact that, though he possessed no license, he knowingly and falsely represented himself to be a licensed broker.

[8] When the prosecution was putting in its case in chief, it was shown by the people's witnesses that there never was such an entity as the Great Western Builders, Inc., or, if there was, that defendant had no connection with it. Defendant, testifying in his own behalf, gave evidence to the effect that preliminary steps were taken by him as early as September of 1923 to incorporate a company to be known as the Great Western Builders, Inc., but that the incorporation was never completed. It seems to be conceded that on October 3, 1923, when appellant, in the name of the Great Western Builders, Inc., entered into the contract with Kingsley, there was no corporation of that name with which appellant had any connection whatever. Having testified that steps preliminary to the incorporation of such a company were taken by him in September, 1923, appellant was then asked by his counsel to state why the incorporation was never completed. The district attorney objected to the question upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The court sustained the objection. Appellant now contends that the evidence sought to be elicited by the question was relevant and material to the issue of his alleged fraudulent intent. With this contention we cannot agree. Whatever appellant's purpose may have been respecting the ultimate incorporation of an artificial entity to be known as the Great Western Builders, Inc., the fact remains that there was no such corporation at the time when he pretended to be its authorized representative, empowered to make a contract for it and in its name, and that he knew that no such corporation existed. His representation was, not that such a corporate being had been conceived, but that it had been actually born into the world of reality.

[9] The defense called to the witness stand an acquaintance of the defendant, who testified that he had a conversation with Kingsley in the month of March or April of 1924. This was some five or six months subsequent to the execution of the contract with Kingsley, or two or three months after the expiration of the 90 days within which the contract was to be performed, and was subsequent to the time when the crime of larceny must have been fully consummated by appellant—if crime there was. The witness was asked to state his conversation with Kingsley. The question was objected to by the district attorney, and the objection was sustained. In this we find no error. No foundation had been laid for the impeachment of Kingsley, and save for some such purpose as that of impeachment, nothing which may have been said by Kingsley after the consummation of the crime could by any possibility be competent evidence for the defense.

A character witness having been called by the defense and having testified that he had known defendant for about two years, the following ensued:

"Q. [By Mr. Shutt, defendant's counsel]: I will ask you if you know what the general reputation of the defendant is for truth, honesty, and integrity in the community in which he resides, and in his business relations? A. I don't know about the community in which he resides.

"Q. But in his business relations? A. In his business relations, they are good as far as I know.

"Mr. Jordan [the deputy district attorney]: I object to any further questions of him as a character witness. [Italics ours.]

"The Court: Objection sustained.

"Mr. Shutt: I believe we are entitled to go into that, to show what his reputation is in the business world.

"The Court: The only reputation you can show is the reputation in the community in which he resides."

[10, 11] The court did not err in refusing to permit the witness to testify further as to defendant's reputation. The trait involved in the offense charged against defendant is such that it was proper for him to show, if he could, that he bore a good reputation for honesty and integrity in the community in which he lived. And since the prosecution claimed that the alleged larceny was committed in the course of appellant's business dealings, it doubtless would have been proper to ask the witness to tell, if he could, what appellant's general reputation was in the community in which he lived for honesty and integrity in his business relations. But the question was not so framed. The witness, though disclaiming any knowledge of defendant's general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity in the community in which he resided, was permitted, nevertheless, to testify that, so far as he knew, defendant's reputation in his business relations was good. What more could appellant ask? While it is permissible for an accused, when a particular trait of character is in issue, to show his general reputation with regard to such trait, in the community or communities in which he has lived, it is not permissible for him to show what his reputation for such trait is among the members of a particular class of people. 16 C. J. pp. 582, 583. In State v. Brady, 71 N. J. Law, 360, 59 A. 6—a case in which the defendant was charged with the carnal abuse of a young girl—it was held that a question which called for the defendant's reputation "among his fellow workmen" as to his chastity and morality was too narrow, the court saying:

"The defendant was entitled to give evidence as to his reputation in the community in which he lived for chastity and morality, but not his reputation among a selected number from such community."

"When the character of one is in issue, it can be shown only by evidence of his general reputation as disclosed by the common speech of his neighbors and members of the community." Commonwealth v. Porter, 237 Mass. 1, 129 N. E. 298.

"In all cases where a defendant is allowed to prove his character for peace and quiet, it must be done by proving general reputation in the community or communities where he has lived." People v. Murphy, 146 Cal. 506, 80 P. 709.

[12] Finally, it is claimed that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction requested by defendant:

"You are instructed that if defendant had no felonious intent to steal the property at the time he took it, the jury must acquit him, even if you believe he subsequently conceived the intent to appropriate it."

Considered as an abstract legal proposition, the requested instruction was a correct statement of the law. People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515, 24 P. 892; 15 Cal. Jur. p. 908. And if we could see that appellant was injured by the court's refusal, we doubtless would be constrained to hold that there was ground for a reversal. But upon a consideration of the entire charge to the jury, we think it plain that the refusal to give this particular instruction could not have prejudiced appellant's rights. In giving its charge the court was at pains to instruct the jury that, to constitute larceny by trick, fraud, or artifice, the accused must have obtained possession of the property "with the felonious intention of stealing it when he gets possession of it." (Italics ours.) From the charge as a whole, the jury, in our opinion, could not possibly have failed to understand that it was their duty to acquit unless they believed, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant had a felonious intent to steal the property at the time when he took it, and that any subsequently conceived intention to appropriate it would not justify a conviction.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: WORKS, J.; CRAIG, J.

DYER BROS. GOLDEN WEST IRON WORKS et al. v. CENTRAL IRON WORKS et al. (Civ. 5080.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 7, 1925. Rehearing Denied May 7, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 3, 1925.)

1. Jury ⊜25(2)—Refusal to submit case, involving both legal and equitable issues, to jury not error.

Even if case involved both equitable and legal issues, refusal to submit it to jury was not error, in view of failure to request court to dispose of equitable issues and call jury to try issues at law

2. Damages ⊜78(2)—Use of word "penalty" by parties held not to preclude finding that amount to be paid was liquidated damages.

That witness referring to provision of contract used word "penalty," and that parties in drafting contract committed same irregularity, instead of "liquidated damages," held not to require finding that amount to be paid on breach was penalty, where contract as whole evidenced intent to prescribe liquidated damages.

3. Contracts ⊜272—Party to contract, breaking it subsequent to notice of withdrawal therefrom by other parties, held not entitled to recover on it.

Where manufacturers by contract agreed to common plan of dealing with demands of employees, and shortly thereafter defendants gave notice that they withdrew from contract and would not be bound thereby, and later plaintiffs, the other parties to contract, acting separately, abandoned the contract by adopting eight-hour work day, such abandonment amounted to rescission of contract precluding recovery of liquidated damages from defendants, and subsequent written agreement of plaintiffs terminating contract was an idle act.

4. Contracts ⊜274—Remedies on abandonment of contract stated.

Where contract for common plan of dealing with employees was abandoned by defendants, plaintiffs had option to treat it as rescinded and recover on quantum meruit as far as performance had extended, or could keep contract alive for benefit of all parties, being at all times ready and able to perform, or could treat repudiation as ending contract for all purposes of performance, and sue for profits which they would have realized had they not been prevented from performing.

5. Contracts ⊜274—After rescission or abandonment of contract by both parties, rights of either may not be enforced in action on contract, but may be enforced in action on common counts.

When both parties have rescinded or abandoned contract, rights of either may not be enforced in action on contract; no question of prevention of performance or excuse for nonperformance (Civ. Code, §§ 1511, 1512), being involved, but party maintaining action is confined to common counts, and application of this rule does not depend upon which party was first to depart from covenants of contract.

6. Contracts ⊜274—Purported rescission ending contract without reservation held to prevent maintenance of action on contract.

Under Civ. Code, § 1688, providing that rescission extinguishes contract, conceding that party, after his abandonment of contract, subsequent to withdrawal therefrom by other parties, could rescind purported document of rescission, which was outright termination of contract, without any reservation, terminated contract wholly, and action could not thereafter be maintained on it.

On Petition for Rehearing.

7. Contracts ⊜303(4)—Breach of contract, containing only mutual covenants, held not act preventing performance by other party.

Where contract did not contain single condition precedent, but contained mutual covenants, parties, refusing to be bound thereby, did not breach condition precedent to performance by other party thereto, and therefore did not commit act preventing performance by such party.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the Dyer Bros. Golden West Iron Works and others against the Central Iron Works and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

See, also, 182 Cal. 588, 189 P. 445.

Brownstone & Goodman and Alexander O'Grady, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

William P. Hubbard, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract. It is the second appeal. The first appeal is reported. Dyer Bros. I. Wks. v. Central I. Wks., 182 Cal. 588, 189 P. 445. After the decision on the first appeal, the case was remanded to the trial court and, pursuant to the mandate of the Supreme Court, the demurrer was overruled, the defendants answered, and a trial was had before the court sitting without a jury. A judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendants have appealed.

[1] The nature of the controversy is fully stated in the decision above mentioned, and we pass at once to a consideration of the points made by the appellants. The first point made by the appellants is that the trial court erred in denying the appellants a jury trial. In this behalf, the appellants argue that the case was an action at law. We think the point was decided adversely to the appellants by what was said by the Supreme Court in its decision on the first appeal. Conceding, without deciding, that the case presented certain equitable issues and certain issues at law, at no time did the appellants present the point in the lower court and ask that court to dispose of the equitable issues and call a jury to try the issues at law. The trial court did not commit an error in refusing to submit all issues to a jury.

[2] The appellants contend that the evidence introduced showed that the respondents were seeking to recover a penalty, and not liquidated damages. This point was ruled adversely to the appellants, in so far as the pleadings are conecrned on the first appeal. The evidence which was introduced followed the pleadings. True it is that some of the witnesses made use of the word "penalty," instead of the words liquidated damages. That irregularity was committed also by the parties in drafting the contract, and the fact was before the court on the first appeal. But, taking up the contract by its four corners, the Supreme Court reached the conclusion that the parties were attempting to draw a contract providing for liquidated damages in the event of a breach thereof, and not for a penalty. No evidence is called to our attention that causes us to entertain a different opinion on the evidence than the Supreme Court reached on a consideration of the facts as pleaded.

[3] The appellants also contend that the proof showed that the respondents suffered no actual damage of any kind. From the nature of the case, it was impracticable and extremely difficult for any one of the respondents to fix the amount of its actual damage, and to that extent the appellants' contention is sound, but that very fact was what caused the parties in the first place to attempt to frame the contract and to insert the provisions which are now in controversy. In other words, it is the contention of the respondents that, from the date their contract was made until the alleged breach by the appellants, each and all of the parties to the contract were on an even basis in being precluded by the labor organizations from getting any business. And it is the contention of the respondents that from the time that the appellants made the concessions to the labor organizations that the appellants were at once enabled to get business and completed it, whereas the respondents were not able to compete with the appellants on an even footing. In this contention we think the respondents are clearly correct.

In the next place, the appellants make two points which are but different ways of expressing their contention that they proved at the trial a complete defense, whether the action be said to sound in equity or otherwise. They say, "Respondents did not come into court with clean hands and were not entitled to relief in a court of equity," and they say also, "Respondents, themselves, failed to perform the contract and acted in respect thereto exactly as they have charged appellants with having acted." An understanding of these contentions requires a consideration of the sequence of certain events. June 16, 1916, the contract was executed, and by its terms it was to continue for three years from date. On August 8, 1916, two of the appellants, and on September 12, 1916, the third appellant, served notice on the respondents that they respectively withdrew from the contract and would not thereafter be bound by any of the terms of said contract. On February 1, 1917, the respondents abandoned the contract in the following manner: On that date each of the respondents, acting separately, changed its method of doing business by proceeding to operate its shop on an eight-hour day instead of a nine-hour day. That act by respondents constituted a rescission. Pearson v. Brown, 27 Cal. App. 125, 131, 148 P. 956. Thereafter respondents continued to transact their business until the 26th day of September, 1917, at which time they executed an instrument in writing purporting to terminate the agreement without any reservations whatever. Thereafter, on the 17th day of December, 1917, this action was commenced, which purports to be an action on the contract to recover the liquidated damages provided for in the contract. It is not contended that the writing dated September 26, 1917, was not properly signed and executed, but it is contended that the execution of said writing was an idle act, because theretofore on the 1st day of February, 1917, by their acts the respondents did, in violation of the terms of the contract, cease to act thereunder, and did as individuals, and not as an organization, change from a nine-hour day to an eight-hour day, and thus do and commit the very act that the contract was drawn to prevent. The respondents do not attempt to answer the point. Indeed, we do not see what answer could be made.

[4] When on September 12, 1916, the appellants abandoned the contract, the respondents had three remedies. They could treat the contract as rescinded and recover upon a quantum meruit as far as they had performed; or they could keep the contract alive for the benefit of both parties, being at all times ready and able to perform; or, third, they could treat the repudiation as putting an end to the contract for all purposes of performance, and sue for the profits they would have realized, if the respondents had not been prevented from performing. McConnell v. Corona City Water Co., 149 Cal. 60, 65, 85 P. 929, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171. They did not take any one of those courses, but thereafter, on February 1, 1917, in violation of their own contract, and in violation of the rules adopted by the executive committee, they changed from a nine-hour day to an eight-hour day. That act on the part of the respondents was a breach of performance. It was of such a susbtantial nature as to be a breach on the very identical covenant which gave rise to the formation of the contract. From that day on the respondents could not in any proper sense be said to have performed their contract.

[5] If the respondents would assert that, the appellants having renounced the obligations of the contract, then and in that event the respondents thereafter owed no duty toward the appellants, that contention is sound only within certain limits. If thereafter they expected to make no claim on the appellants the contention would be sound. If, on the other hand, they intended, as they would here attempt to do, to hold the appellants responsible to them in an action for damages for the breach of the contract, then, and in that event, as stated in the McConnell Case, supra, they were bound to "keep the contract alive, for the benefit of both parties. * * *" The respondents were not entitled to breach the contract, rescind it, or abandon it, and to attempt thereafter to base an action on the contract as for a breach of damages. When both parties have rescinded or abandoned a contract the rights of either one thereafter may be enforced not in an action on the contract, but the party who would maintain the action is confined to an action on the common counts. McConnell v. Corona City Water Co., supra; Olson v. Lamb, 56 Neb. 104, 76 N. W. 433, 71 Am. St. Rep. 670, 677. The application of the rule does not depend upon which party was the first to depart from the covenants of the contract. Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 P. 280, 18 Am. St. Rep. 187; Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 449, 450, 25 P. 749, 22 Am. St. Rep. 257; Phelps v. Brown, 95 Cal. 572, 574, 575, 30 P. 774; Easton v. Cressey, 100 Cal. 75, 34 P. 622; Bray v. Lowery, 163 Cal. 256, 261, 124 P. 1004. When the appellants departed from the covenants of the contract, the respondents were not called upon to likewise depart from the covenants of the contract. Nevertheless, as they did so they may not maintain an action on the contract. As said by the Supreme Court in House v. Piercy, 181 Cal. 247, at page 252, 183 P. 807, 809:

"But if the facts exist which justify a rescission by one party, and he exercises his right and declares a rescission in some effectual manner, he terminates the contract, and it cannot thereafter be made the basis of an action for damages caused by the breach of its covenants."

In other words, in the case before us, the terms of the contract are such that the contracting parties agreed one with the other that they would do and would not do certain things with reference to a third party, to wit, their employees. No question regarding excuse for nonperformance (Civ. Code, § 1511) is involved. No question of prevention of performance (Civ. Code, § 1512) is involved. But the very nature of the contract was such that the acts of each employer toward his employees became the consideration for the promise of each and every other employer. To present the case, the plaintiff pleaded outright performance. The trial court found the fact as alleged. Whereas, all of the proof was to the effect that the respondents failed in performance in the same manner as did the appellants, only to a less degree.

[6] If it be said that the contract contained a covenant authorizing the termination of the whole contract, the answer is that on February 1, 1917, the respondents did not attempt to proceed to terminate the contract in the manner stipulated in the contract. When thereafter, on September 26, 1917, they did attempt to terminate the contract in the manner provided therein, their act in that behalf was, as stated above, an idle act. They had breached the contract on February 1, 1917, and continuously thereafter, until September 26, 1917. Being themselves in default, they could not legally rescind. California Sugar, etc., Agency v. Penoyar, 167 Cal. 274, 139 P. 671. However, conceding for the moment that they could at that time rescind, still their position is no better. The purported document of rescission is set forth in the transcript, and it purports to be an outright termination of the contract without any reservations. If, therefore, it be treated as a rescission, it operated to exterminate the contract wholly (Civ. Code, § 1688), and, as the contract had been rescinded by both parties prior to the commencement of the action, neither party had any right to maintain any action founded thereon. 13 C. J. 623, § 683.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [7] The petition for a rehearing is denied. The respondents admit that they abandoned the contract, and all of their allegations and proofs are to the effect that the appellants abandoned the contract. The authorities, cited in our former opinion, sustain the proposition that under such circumstances no recovery can be had on the contract. The respondents, however, earnestly contend that their whole case rests on the theory that they were prevented from performing, but we do not see any "prevention" as that expression has been defined by the courts of this state. There is neither allegation, proof, nor finding that the respondents have "been prevented from going on with their contract by the positive affirmative act of" the appellants. Cox v. McLaughlin, 54 Cal. 605. The contract between the parties does not contain a single "condition precedent." It does contain mutual covenants. In doing what they did, the appellants did not "breach a condition precedent to the performance by the respondents." They did not therefore commit an act preventing the performance by the respondents. Alderson v. Houston, 154 Cal. 1, 96 P. 884. Neither in the former opinion, nor in this opinion, are we holding that the appellants can take advantage of their own wrongful breach. We are holding that the respondents, having themselves failed to perform from February 1, 1917, until September 26, 1917, may not recover on a cause of action based on the contract. Their rights, however, may be enforced in a different manner.

"We have seen that when parties make a contract, which is not apportionable, no part of the consideration can be recovered in an action on a contract, until the whole of that for which the consideration was to be paid is performed. But it must not be inferred from this that a party, who has performed a part of his side of a contract, and has failed to perform the residue, is in all cases without remedy. For though he can have no remedy on the contract as originally made, the circumstances may be such that the law will raise a new contract, and give him a remedy on a quantum meruit.

"Thus if one party is prevented from fully performing his contract by the fault of the other party, it is clear that the party thus in fault cannot be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong, and screen himself from payment for what has been done under the contract. The law therefore will imply a promise on his part to remunerate the other party for what he has done at his request; and upon this promise an action may be brought." 2 Parsons on Contracts, 522, 523.

"Where one party renounces the contract and refuses to perform, the other party is excused from performance on his side, this being a code provision in some jurisdictions. But it should be noted that the repudiation of the contract by one party cannot be held equivalent to performance, or a legal excuse for nonperformance by the other party of conditions precedent, so as to authorize a recovery as for performance of such conditions." 13 C. J. 653, 654.

"An allegation that the opposite party refuses to permit performance of conditions precedent is not equivalent to an allegation of performance (Myrick v. Merritt, 22 Fla. 335); and especially is this true where the complaining party, as in this case, does not allege his willingness and ability to perform at the time of such refusal, or at any time prior to the expiration of the period fixed for performance. It is true that an absolute repudiation of his part of a contract by one of the parties thereto prior to the time fixed by the contract for performance of the agreement of the other party, or while the contract is being performed by such other within the time limited, will entitle such other party to an action for damages, as for a breach of the contract (Myrick v. Merritt, 22 Fla. 335; Sullivan v. McMillan, 26 Fla. 543); but in this case the defendant does not allege or claim any damage to him arising from the complainant's alleged repudiation of the contract, and in no case can a repudiation of a contract by one party be held equivalent to performance, or a legal excuse for nonperformance by the other party of conditions precedent, so as to authorize recovery as for performance of such conditions precedent." Thompson v. Kyle, 39 Fla. 582, 598, 23 So. 12, 17, 63 Am. St. Rep. 193, 199.

"The general rule is that where one of the parties has endeavored in good faith to perform, and has substantially performed his contract, and thereby conferred on the other party a substantial benefit, although he has failed to perform in some particulars, he may recover, as the case may be, on the quantum meruit or the contract price, less the damage sustained by the other party by reason of the failure of strict performance. The right to this recovery does not always come from the original contract, but rests on another contract implied by the law. It is another statement of the principle to say that, where the default was not willful, but due to such causes as sickness, death, prevention of performance by the other party, or other causes not due to his fault, the law creates a promise to pay for the benefits received from part performance." 3 Elliott on Contracts, § 2101.

MACEDO et al. v. GOODRICH et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. April 18, 1925.)

Appeal and error ⟸1011(1) — Where there was conflicting evidence as to alleged false representations, finding of trial court held conclusive.

Where, in action for damages for alleged false representations as to value of land received from defendants in trade for other property, evidence as to making of alleged representations was conflicting, finding of trial court that no false representations as to value of the land were made was conclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by M. V. Macedo and another against V. D. Goodrich, doing business under the name and style of the San Joaquin Valley Company, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

O. H. Speciale, of San Jose, for appellants.

Fry & Jenkins, of San Jose, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued to recover the sum of $5,400 as damages for the alleged false representations as to the value of land situated in Santa Clara county which they received from the defendants in trade for their property situated in Madera county. The cause was tried before the court, sitting without a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, from which the plaintiffs appeal under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The cause of action is founded upon the allegations of the third amended complaint in which it is claimed that the respondent Goodrich falsely represented to the appellants that the seven-acre tract of land situated on the Story road in the county of Santa Clara, and which came to the appellants as a part of the trade, was of the value of $10,000, and that the house and lot situated in the city of San Jose, and also traded to the appellants, was of the value of $5,000. The trial court found that the respondent Goodrich did not represent these parcels to be of the value alleged in the third amended complaint, and also found that no false representations were made to the appellants as an inducement to make the trade.

On this appeal the appellants insist that the trial court committed error in finding that the representations as to the value of the two tracts of land in Santa Clara county were merely expressions of opinion and not statements of fact. In reply, the respondents point out that the trial court did not find as claimed by the appellants, but that it did expressly find that the alleged false representations were not made. It is then said by the respondents that, the evidence regarding these alleged representations being in conflict, the finding of the trial court is conclusive upon this appeal.

The respondents have correctly presented the only issue which is involved here. The cause of action was founded upon the alleged false representations as to value. The trial court found that these false representations were not made. The evidence on the part of the appellants is that the respondent Goodrich assured the appellants that he could get $10,000 for the Story road property and $4,500 for the San Jose house and lot. Another witness testified for the appellants that he heard Goodrich tell them that the property in San Jose was worth $4,500 or $5,000, and that he could get $10,000 for the property in the country. On the part of the respondents the evidence is that no representations were made as to the value of either parcel involved in the trade, but that Goodrich stated to the appellants that the house in San Jose would make good trading property at from $4,000 to $5,000; that it was rented for $35 a month, and would pay good interest on the investment. As to the ranch on the Story road, Goodrich testified that he told one of the appellants that, if he would fix it up, he could make it a $7,000 to $10,000 ranch. This testimony was in harmony with that given by the appellant M. V. Macedo to the effect that Goodrich stated to him, in reference to the Story road property, that, if he would "work it up good," he would guarantee to get the appellant $10,000 for the place. All the testimony covering the transactions indicates that the only representations made by the respondent Goodrich related to the value of the properties for trading purposes, and that the only testimony in support of the allegations of the third amended complaint, that false representations as to the values of these properties were made to the appellants, was expressly denied. There is therefore a conflict in the evidence covering the issue of false representations which the trial court resolved in favor of the respondents. As there is sufficient evidence to support the finding of the trial court on that issue, it is conclusive on this appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HAYES. (Cr. 1188.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 15, 1925. As Modified May 12, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⇐1178—Points in brief, which are not argued, will not be considered.

Points, which are stated in brief, but which are not argued, will not be considered.

2. Criminal law ⇐317—Evidence sufficient to show ownership of property in burglary, as against presumption from not calling witness.

In prosecution for burglary, where phonograph and radio set were taken from bungalow occupied by inmate of sanitarium, evidence held sufficient to prove ownership of property stolen in occupant, notwithstanding any presumption which might arise from failure to call alleged owner as witness.

3. Criminal law ⇐317—Failure of prosecution to call witness sufficiently excused.

In prosecution for burglary of bungalow occupied by inmate of sanitarium, testimony as to inmate's condition held sufficient to excuse failure of prosecution to produce him to prove ownership of property stolen, and defeat presumption which would otherwise arise that his testimony would be adverse.

4. Burglary ⊂⊃28(7)—Property need only have been in possession and control of person from whom it was taken.

In charge of burglary, where entry is shown with intent to commit larceny, possession and control of person from whom property is claimed to have been stolen must be shown, but not necessarily his ownership.

5. Burglary ⊂⊃41(1)—Evidence of possession and control of property sufficiently shown.

In prosecution for burglary, where phonograph and radio set were taken from bungalow occupied by inmate of sanitarium, evidence held sufficient to show that stolen articles were in possession and control of occupant, either directly, or through employees of sanitarium.

6. Burglary ⊂⊃41(1)—Evidence sufficient to negative claim that property was taken with permission.

In prosecution for burglary of bungalow occupied by inmate of sanitarium, where phonograph and radio set were taken by attendant of sanitarium, who it was claimed had permission of occupant of bungalow, evidence held sufficient for jury to find he had not permission.

7. Burglary ⊂⊃29—Guardianship of inmate of sanitarium not presumed, and not presumed that any other than officials control his property.

In absence of any showing that inmate of sanitarium, who was incompetent, has a guardian, court will not presume so, or that any one save officials of institution would be qualified to give permission for exercise of dominion over his property.

8. Criminal law ⊂⊃1159(2)—Inculpating testimony alone considered as to sufficiency of evidence to support conviction.

In determining sufficiency of evidence to support conviction, inculpating testimony alone will be considered.

9. Burglary ⊂⊃41(1)—Evidence sufficient to sustain conviction.

In prosecution for burglary in taking victrola and radio set from bungalow occupied by inmate of sanitarium, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

10. Burglary ⊂⊃41(2)—Proof of corpus delicti sufficient.

In prosecution for burglary, in taking victrola and radio set from bungalow occupied by inmate of sanitarium, proof of corpus delicti held sufficient.

11. Criminal law ⊂⊃543(2)—Due diligence in attempting to secure absent witness not shown to warrant introduction of testimony on preliminary examination.

In prosecution for burglary, evidence held not to show sufficient diligence in procuring absent witness, who had been intermediary for sale of stolen property, so as to permit introduction of his testimony at preliminary examination, under Pen. Code, § 686.

12. Criminal law ⊂⊃543(2), 1153(6)—Due diligence in procuring absent witness is for discretion of trial court, whose ruling not disturbed save for abuse.

Determination by trial court as to whether due diligence has been shown in endeavoring to procure attendance of witness, as basis for accepting his testimony at preliminary examination, is primarily discretionary, and ruling will not be disturbed except for abuse.

13. Criminal law ⊂⊃543(2)—Some effort must be made to locate absent witness outside of county of trial in order to introduce testimony at preliminary hearing.

Where witness cannot be found in county of trial, to show due diligence in trying to procure him, so as to admit testimony given at preliminary examination under Pen. Code, § 686, some effort must be made to locate witness in state at large outside of county of trial, unless it would be clearly fruitless.

14. Criminal law ⊂⊃543(2)—Subpœnas for absent witness need not be sent to every county to fulfill requirements of statute allowing introduction of testimony on preliminary examination.

Where witness cannot be found in county of trial, subpœnas need not be sent to every county in state, in order to show due diligence permitting admission of testimony at preliminary examination, under Pen. Code, § 686.

15. Criminal law ⊂⊃1171(6)—Appellation of accused as three-time loser not prejudicial, where same remark had been previously unobjected to.

Cross-examination of accused's accomplice, showing that he had asked not to be put in same cell with accused, because latter was a three-time loser and liable to kill him, held not prejudicial, where, on cross-examination by accused's counsel, police officer had testified to same thing, and his testimony, though subject to motion to strike, was not objected to.

16. Criminal law ⊂⊃728(5)—Propriety of cross-examination not considered, where ruling of court not insisted on or instruction requested.

Whether cross-examination is improper will not be considered, where no ruling of court is insisted on regarding objection, or where no request is made that jury be instructed to disregard, so long as alleged misconduct is not so extreme that admonition would not remove prejudicial effect.

17. Criminal law ⊂⊃728(5)—Objections to final argument of prosecuting attorney not considered, in absence of request for admonition to jury.

Propriety of remarks of prosecuting attorney in final argument will not be considered, in absence of request for admonition to jury.

18. Criminal law ⊂⊃722(2)—Argument by prosecutor, referring to accused as a habitual criminal, whose soul was beyond redemption, misconduct.

Argument of prosecutor that accused was an habitual criminal, whose soul was beyond redemption, held overzealous and unfair to accused, so as to amount to misconduct.

19. Criminal law ⟸722(3)—Reference in instruction to particular propensities or passions of person whose act is in question held erroneous, in absence of evidence of such passion.

In prosecution for burglary, instruction to jury that inference must be founded on fact, and deduction therefrom as warranted by consideration of particular propensities or passions of person whose act is in question, held erroneous, because it was only act of appellant which was under investigation, and there was no evidence of possession by him of peculiar propensities or passions.

20. Criminal law ⟸1186(4)—Errors of court and misconduct of district attorney held not prejudicial, where evidence required conviction.

In view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, errors of trial court, in admitting evidence and giving instructions, and of misconduct of prosecuting attorney in final argument, held not to require reversal, where evidence was such as to have required jury to convict, irrespective of errors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Roy A. Hayes was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Kirby, Holland & Kirby, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman and H. H. Linney, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. The defendant, Hayes, together with one Moe, was charged with the crime of burglary. A trial of the two jointly was commenced, but during its progress Moe, who had previously made a written confession of his culpability, pleaded guilty. The trial then proceeded against Hayes alone, and he was convicted. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The charge against appellant was based upon the taking, from a bungalow, which was part of a private sanitarium for incompetent and weak-minded persons, of a phonograph and a radio set. The bungalow was occupied by one Whiting, an inmate of the sanitarium, and one of the questions argued in the briefs is whether the articles which were taken were his property. Moe, up to the time of the burglary, had been a nurse at the sanitarium, and it is settled beyond dispute that he effected an entrance into the bungalow, that he took therefrom the articles mentioned, that appellant awaited him outside the house and near at hand while he did so, and that the two together then carried the "stuff" to an automobile in front of the sanitarium grounds, in which they, accompanied by a young girl, had driven to the place. Other facts, bearing upon particular points made by appellant for a reversal will be stated as we proceed.

[1] Appellant sets forth 29 points in his brief, but no attempt is made to discuss the merits of many of them. These we shall not decide, as it is a rule, which should be well understood by the profession, that points which are stated in a brief, but which are not argued, are not to be considered.

[2-5] It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. A specific point made under this general specification is that the ownership of the phonograph and radio set was never proved by competent evidence. While there was much testimony that Moe told appellant, before they embarked on their alleged burglarious expedition, that the articles were his property, a circumstance which will later be the subject of treatment upon another point, Moe testified positively that he did not own them. Whiting, whose testimony upon the score of an ownership in him would have been the most satisfactory, granting for the moment that he was competent to testify, was not called to the witness stand. There was, however, other evidence introduced for the purpose of showing a title in that individual. The assistant supervisor of the sanitarium testified, without objection, that Whiting's bungalow was mostly furnished by the institution, but that "the individual" had belongings there, that Whiting owned a Victrola and radio set, and that the witness had seen the radio set in the bungalow nearly a year, and the phonograph several years. An employee of the sanitarium testified that he had been at work there for about 2½ or 3 years, that the phonograph was always in Whiting's bungalow, and that the radio was there 5 or 6 months. It is a part of appellant's contention that, as Whiting was not produced as a witness, it must be presumed, under a familiar rule of evidence, that his testimony, if he had been produced, would have been adverse to the prosecution. The assistant supervisor of the sanitarium testified that Whiting was wholly incompetent and unable to take care of himself. There was also evidence to the effect that he had been an inmate of the place for 5 or 6 years, that he was cared for by a nurse, a part of whose duty it was to superintend his undressing and his going to bed every night, and that the door of his bungalow was locked from the outside after he retired; the key being secreted on the porch of the house thereafter. This evidence furnished ample excuse for the failure to call Whiting as a witness. Even if it did not, however, and if it were proper for the jury to have indulged the presumption alluded to by appellant, nothing but a conflict of evidence would have arisen (Maguire v. Cunningham, 64 Cal. App. 536, 222 P. 838); the presumption being arrayed on one side of the conflict, and the testimony above referred to on the other. The jury was, of course, clothed with the power to resolve the conflict in favor of the testimony and against the presumption, and the testimony furnished ample support for a finding that Whiting was the owner of the property. It is also to be observed, in passing, that, if it be necessary under a charge of burglary to prove anything concerning the title to the property stolen (see 4 Cal. Jur. tit. Burglary, § 19), in order to show an entry for the purpose of committing larceny, a point which we have not heretofore mentioned, and which is not discussed in the briefs, the charge is sufficiently proven in this regard, if it be shown that the property was in the possession and under the control of the person from whom it is claimed to have been taken. 9 C. J. 1062. The evidence here showed that the stolen articles were in the possession and under the control of Whiting, either directly or through the employees of the sanitarium.

[6, 7] It is insisted that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, for the reason that there was no testimony to the effect that Whiting had not given Moe and appellant permission to take the phonograph and radio set. If it be assumed that such proof was necessary, we are satisfied that the point is sufficiently met by testimony in the record. The assistant supervisor of the sanitarium testified that Whiting was under his care and supervision, and that Moe worked under his direction. He further testified that he never gave the latter permission to take from the bungalow the articles which were stolen. Here it is to be observed that there is no evidence that appellant ever entered the bungalow An attendant at the sanitarium, whose duty it was to care for Whiting in the absence of his regular nurse, testified that he gave neither Moe nor appellant leave to enter the bungalow or to take from it the property which was stolen. Whiting's nurse testified to the same effect. There is nothing in the record to show that Whiting had a guardian, either of his person or of his property, appointed under the law, and it cannot be presumed in aid of the appeal that he had one. The witnesses above mentioned appear from the record to have been the only persons who had any direction of Whiting's affairs or who exercised any control over his property. Granting, for the sake of argument, again, that it was necessary for the prosecution to prove the negative that no permission had been given Moe or appellant to remove the phonograph and radio set from the bungalow (but see People v. Moronati [Cal. App.] 232 P. 991), we think that the fact was established prima facie by the testimony of the witnesses mentioned. The record is such that the jury was justified in concluding that there was no other person qualified to give the permission in question. Certainly there is evidence from which the jury might have inferred that Whiting himself was not qualified to give it. The point presented is without merit.

[8, 9] The point is also made in a more general sense that the evidence was insufficient to uphold the conviction of appellant. We here recite the showing made against him by the record, leaving for a later time a statement of some slight features of the evidence which operated in his favor, as we are interested in the inculpating testimony alone in considering the question now presented. The alleged crime was committed in the evening. The girl who accompanied Moe and appellant to the sanitarium, and who was apparently free from guilty knowledge concerning their acts, testified that two trips were made to the place; that on the first occasion the three arrived there at about 8 o'clock; that the two defendants then went into the place and shortly came out, whereupon the three drove away; that they returned 20 minutes or half an hour later; that Moe went into the place first, and that appellant followed him; that after 5 minutes they came back with the phonograph and radio set, appellant carrying a part of the two outfits and Moe the remainder; and that the articles were then taken to appellant's apartment. Viewing the evidence in the order in which it was produced at the trial, the next witness was one MacClark, who testified that the day following the alleged burglary he purchased the stolen property from one Guin, giving him $20 for it. Moe testified that appellant accompanied him when he went to the bungalow to get the property which was taken, and remained outside the house while Moe went inside; that the articles were then taken in the automobile to an apartment which he and appellant rented together; that he (Moe) went with Guin to MacClark's place when the stolen property was sold to the latter; that after the sale they returned to the apartment, where appellant was waiting, and Guin handed the proceeds of the sale to appellant, who complained of the smallness of the amount obtained, and then handed the money to Moe; that he (Moe) then gave a "few dollars" of the twenty to Guin and a "few dollars" to appellant; and that he and appellant together arranged with Guin to sell the property. As already observed, Moe made written confession of his guilt. After appellant was arrested, he was made acquainted with this fact, and was asked by officers if he desired to make a statement. He said, Moe being present:

"No, there is no use. That bastard has already told you everything. There is no use for me to make a statement."

Appellant made use of other expressions to the officers, which the jury was justified in interpreting, in connection with other evidence in the case, as opposed to his plea of not guilty. One of the officers testified to the following conversation with him:

"I asked him where he got that Victrola box. He said he didn't know. He said he didn't know anything about it. He said he didn't know where it came from. I asked him if he did not bring it up to the room, and he said, 'No.' I asked him if he knew who did. He said, 'No,' he didn't; he hadn't the least idea in the world where it came from."

Again, from the same officer:

"Q. Did you ask him whether or not he went out there with Moe and took this stuff? A. Yes. Q. What did he say? A. He said he did not. He said he had not been out there; knew nothing of the place. Q. Did you ask him whether or not he had ever been out with Moe? A. He said he had not."

With this array of evidence, added to the facts which are above stated, it is futile to assert that the record is insufficient to support the conviction of appellant.

[10] The contention is made that there was no proof of the corpus delicti. This point requires no lengthy discussion. The facts already stated, independently of the admissions of appellant, will demonstrate that the contention is not well founded. We are satisfied, also, that the corpus delicti was sufficiently proved before evidence was received of the admissions of appellant. "It is sufficient," as a basis for the offer of a defendant's confession or admissions, "if there is some proof, or prima facie proof, or even slight proof of the corpus delicti." 8 Cal. Jur. tit. Crim. Law, § 303. Without segregating here the evidence which was received before the testimony concerning appellant's admissions went to the jury, we are satisfied that the proof came well within the rule stated.

[11] Guin, the individual who acted as an intermediary in the sale of the stolen property to MacClark, did not appear as a witness at the trial, but his testimony, taken at the preliminary examination, was read to the jury over appellant's objection. It is insisted that no sufficient foundation was laid for the introduction of the evidence in this form, in that there was no showing of due diligence in an endeavor to procure the personal attendance of the witness. Such foundation as there was is confined to the testimony of two witnesses. The first of these was an investigator, a deputy sheriff, who was connected with the district attorney's office. It appearing that at the preliminary examination Guin had given his address as a certain number on West Third street in Los Angeles, the investigator testified that he had called at that address, that the proprietor of the place, a hotel, told him that Guin no longer resided there, and that on departing he had left no forwarding address, and that the proprietor said he did not know where Guin was. Guin testified at the preliminary examination that he "used to live" at Pasadena with his mother. Taking this statement as a guide in his search, the investigator said he visted Pasadena and the adjacent town of Altadena. He testified that he saw all persons named Guin in the two places, there being one of that name in each, but found that neither of them was related to the absent witness. The record discloses that at the time of the sale of the phonograph and radio set to MacClark the missing witness was employed by the Shopping News, evidently a newspaper, in Los Angeles. The witness MacClark was then also an employee in in the same establishment. The investigator testified that he sought Guin at the office of the paper, that he was no longer employed there, that he had left no forwarding address at the place, and that no information could be obtained there as to where he had gone when his employment terminated. He further testified that he visited the postal inspector at the post office at Los Angeles, and was informed by that official that there was in the office no change of Guin's address from the number on West Third street, that he had searched the city directory of Los Angeles, and that Guin's name was not contained in it. He testified to the same effect concerning the directories of Pasadena and Altadena. On cross-examination, the investigator testified that he had begun his investigation on the 1st or 2d day of the month of the trial, the trial having been commenced on the 8th, and the taking of the evidence having been concluded on the same day; that he had never actually visited Pasadena on his quest until the morning of the trial, having theretofore used the telephone "on some occasions" to obtain information from there; that he made no investigation as to whether Guin was deceased; that he visited the county hospital at Los Angeles, the witness MacClark having told him that Guin had been the victim of a heart attack and had been taken to that place, but that he did not find the absent witness there, nor any record of his having been there; and that he did not visit "the jails" or any other hospital.

The testimony of Guin at the preliminary examination was then offered by the district attorney, but, upon objection being made to the offer, the court called MacClark to the witness stand. He testified that the last time he saw Guin he was taken sick; that Guin said it was a heart attack, but that he (MacClark) thought he had been drinking; that the seizure occurred at the office of the Shopping News; that Guin was sent home in a taxicab; and that "his people were sent for, and he stayed home 3 or 4 days from work." This question was then put to the witness: "Then what happened?" The answer was that Guin came back to work the next day, but "they told him his job wasn't there any more," that he was "let off." MacClark next testified that Guin "went from there down to the L. A. Engraving Company and worked there a week, and he suddenly disappeared from there;" that he (MacClark) wanted to get in connection with Guin and called up the L. A. Engraving Company; that the manager of that concern then told him that Guin "laid off from work, and the last they heard of him he was taken sick and was in the county hospital with a heart attack, and if they wanted him to come to work, he left them some telephone number;" that he (MacClark) did not "know the number that he had left;" that his talk over the telephone with the manager of the engraving company was "the latter part of last month, * * * later than a week ago;" that Guin "left a telephone number and said he had been in the county hospital with a heart attack, and if they needed him to employ him again, he left an address, wherever it was;" that "they" did not say it was a telephone number in Los Angeles; that "I don't know the number at all;" and that "they didn't give me the number."

At this juncture the trial judge remarked:

"I think you will have to have the engraving company here. * * * Let the investigator telephone and find out what he can from the L. A. Engraving Company. * * * We will take a recess * * * for 5 minutes."

After the recess, the trial was resumed, but the investigator was not called. MacClark again took the stand and testified, upon questions by the district attorney:

That he had been down to the Los Angeles Engraving Company the day before the trial; that he then saw the manager of the concern; that he asked him if he had any information as to where Guin could be located, and he said at the number of West Third street.

"I asked him if he had any other address, and he said, 'No,' just the one he just gave me. Q. Did he say anything about the county hospital? A. No, sir. Q. Did he say anything about a phone number? A. No, sir."

Upon questions by counsel for the defense MacClark then testified:

"Q. He did not give you the phone number? A. No, sir. Q. Did he tell you when he was last at * * * West Third street? A. He did not. * * * Q. Did he tell you when he had left his employment there? A. No, sir. Q. Did you ask him? A. No, sir."

Thus was left the evidence upon the question of due diligence, and, after a repetition of objection, the testimony of Guin at the preliminary examination was read to the jury.

The admission in evidence, in criminal trials in the superior court, of the testimony of witnesses given at preliminary examinations, is governed by the provisions of section 686 of the Penal Code. The enactment reads, in part:

"In a criminal action the defendant is entitled: * * * To * * * be confronted with the witnesses against him, in the presence of the court, except that where the charge has been preliminarily examined before a committing magistrate and the testimony taken down by question and answer in the presence of the defendant, who has, either in person or by counsel, cross-examined or had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness; * * * the deposition of such witness may be read, upon its being satisfactorily shown to the court that he is dead or insane, or cannot with due diligence be found within the state. * * *"

The question as to what amounts to "due diligence," as that term is used in the quoted enactment, has been before the courts with great frequency. In the following cases, under the particular facts appearing in each, it was determined that due diligence was shown: People v. Reilly, 106 Cal. 648, 40 P. 13; People v. Witty, 138 Cal. 576, 72 P. 177; People v. Lewandowski, 143 Cal. 574, 77 P. 467; People v Grill, 151 Cal. 592, 91 P. 515; People v. Leavens, 12 Cal. App. 178, 106 P. 1103; People v. Edwards, 14 Cal. App. 128, 111 P. 263; People v. Boyd, 16 Cal. App. 130, 116 P. 323; People v. Lederer, 17 Cal. App. 369, 119 P. 949; People v. Kelly, 17 Cal. App. 447, 120 P 46; People v. Louie Dene, 20 Cal. App. 137, 128 P. 339; People v. Mueller, 168 Cal. 526, 143 P. 750; People v. Trent, 25 Cal. App. 740, 145 P. 541; People v. Poo On, 49 Cal. App. 219, 192 P. 1090; People v. Ramos, 52 Cal. App. 491, 199 P. 544; People v. Brown, 61 Cal. App. 748, 216 P. 58; People v. Frank, 193 Cal. 474, 225 P. 448.

[12] There is at least one case in which, under the facts there appearing, it was held that the requirement as to due diligence was not satisfied. People v Ballard, 1 Cal. App. 222, 81 P. 1040. It is well settled that the question as to whether due diligence has been shown in an endeavor to procure the personal attendance of a witness, as a basis for the reception in evidence of his testimony, given at the preliminary examination, is one primarily to be determined by the trial court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and that a ruling upon the question will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it appears that such ruling is the result of an abuse of the discretion reposed in the tribunal. People v. Mueller, supra; People v. Brown, supra. While each of the cases in the long list cited above was necessarily different in its facts from all the others, the collection nevertheless furnishes some guide to a determination of the question now before us. Following that guide and, moreover, reasoning from general principles which must govern in such cases, we are satisfied that there was an abuse of the trial court's discretion in permitting Guin's "deposition" to be read to the jury. As a prelude to a more specific examination of the subject, it is to be observed that the right of the defendant in a criminal case to be confronted with the witnesses against him, while not guaranteed in this state by the Constitution, as it is in some of the Constitutions of the sister commonwealths, but secured only by statutory provision, is one of great value.

"The right thus given to a defendant by the statute is deemed a most substantial one." People v. Plyler, 126 Cal. 379, 58 P. 904.

"That the right of a defendant to be confronted in person by the witnesses against him is a most important one, and that the trial court should be fully satisfied by the evidence that the absent witness cannot with due diligence be found in the state before allowing the deposition of such witness taken on the preliminary examination to be read, may be freely conceded." People v. Lewandowski, supra.

What are the circumstances present in the instant case which show an abuse of discretion by the trial court? It was said as to the missing witness in question in People v. Reilly, supra:

"That diligent efforts to find him had been made in all those portions of the city where he had been accustomed to wander, and where he would be likely to be found, but that all such efforts had been unsuccessful."

[13, 14] No such search was made for Guin. He was a photo engraver by trade. No endeavor was made to locate him at any of the places of business in Los Angeles at which such a craftsman might hope to find employment, except the two at which it was known that he had been employed, nor was such a search made in cities of considerable size which are within easy reach of Los Angeles, notably Long Beach, Santa Monica, Glendale, and Pasadena. No investigation of such a character was made in any of the other cities of Southern California, nor, in fact, in any of the other cities of the state. The statute provides that the testimony of a witness at a preliminary examination may not be used at his trial in the superior court unless he "cannot with due diligence be found within the state." This language necessarily means that some effort must be made to locate the witness in the state at large, unless there is evidence from which the court may properly conclude that such a search would be unavailing. In one case (People v. Witty, supra), subpœnas were sent to the sheriff of every county in the state in an endeavor to secure the attendance of the absent witness, and 46 of the officers made return that after due diligence he could not be found in their respective counties. No attempt of any character was made to locate Guin anywhere outside of Los Angeles county. We have not overlooked the fact that it was said, in People v. Boyd, supra, that it is not necessary, in order to disclose due diligence, to show that a subpœna for a missing witness has been sent to every county in the state. In that case, however, there was ample evidence justifying a finding that the witness there in question was in hiding in a particular county for the purpose of avoiding the service of process. That evidence supported the action of the trial court in allowing the use of the deposition of the witness. Pursuing further the remark in People v. Boyd, we do not mean to say that it can be laid down as a hard and fast rule that subpœnas need be sent to any county in the state from a county in which the attendance of a witness is desired, before his deposition may be received in evidence. We do say, however, that where, as here, there is no evidence tending to show that the witness has left the state, there must be some endeavor to ascertain whether he is in the state at large. The extent of that endeavor will be measured by the necessities of each particular case.

We need not further continue this subject from the standpoint of the language of the courts of the state in the decided cases, practically all of which we have cited; nor need we point out other weaknesses, except one, in the showing made. We close with a reference to one circumstance appearing upon the present appeal—a circumstance which alone shows a lack of due diligence in the quest for Guin. The testimony of MacClark is plainly to the effect that Guin gave to the Los Angeles Engraving Company a telephone number through the use of which he might be located. This number may have been that of the telephone at his Third street address. On the other hand, it may not have been. No attempt was made to ascertain whether it was or whether it was not. This avenue, if followed, might have led to a discovery of the witness, and there was a lack of diligence in not following it. The court erred in allowing the deposition of Guin to go to the jury. Whether this error was harmful will be considered later.

[15, 16] It is complained that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct during the trial. This contention is made upon several grounds. When Moe was on the witness stand, the prosecuting officer, for the purpose of showing that the witness was testifying in behalf of appellant through fear, asked him, "Before you ever made any statement to the police officers, didn't you ask them not to put you in a cell with Red [Hayes]; that he was liable to beat you up; that he was a three-time loser?" Counsel for appellant, evidently assuming that the expression "three-time loser" meant that appellant had been thrice convicted of crime—an assumption which is made throughout the briefs on this appeal—objected to the question on the ground that counsel "well knows he cannot test the record of this man unless he has been on the stand," and moved that it be stricken. On this objection and motion, the trial court ruled adversely to appellant, and the question was answered in the affirmative. If we concede for the moment that in asking the question the district attorney was guilty of misconduct, and if we grant further that the objection and motion of appellant was sufficient to present the charge of misconduct to the trial court, we hasten to observe that the action of the district attorney was harmless. Earlier in the trial, when one of the police officers was under cross-examination, appellant's counsel asked the witness: "Did you, in these conversations with Mr. Moe, make the statement * * * that Hayes was a bad egg, and that you were going to get him?" To this question the officer answered: "Mr. Moe made a statement to us that Mr. Hayes was a three-time loser, and not to lock him up with him; that he might kill him; that he was a bad egg." The answer was not responsive and should have been stricken on motion, but no such motion was forthcoming, nor was the court asked to instruct the jury to disregard the answer. As the expression "three-time loser" was thus fastened upon the minds of the jurors through the act or omission of appellant's counsel early in the trial, the action of the district attorney in later employing it could have worked no damage to appellant's rights. For the same reason his putting the question was not misconduct. The following appears in the record during the cross-examination of Moe by the district attorney:

"Q. * * * Did Hayes ever say anything to you about going out and stealing tires for a living? A. No, sir. * * * Q. That you go out and steal tires and make about $10 a night?

"Mr. Holland: I object to that as not proper cross-examination.

"Q. * * * I am asking you if Hayes ever said that to you?

"Mr. Holland: I do not see how that is an issue in this case."

No ruling was made by the court upon the objection of counsel, and no response was made by the judge to his last remark. It is now contended that the district attorney's action in asking the questions set forth was misconduct, but appellant is in no position to present that question here. In order that the claim of misconduct may be considered on appeal, it is necessary that the point shall have been made in the trial court, together with a request that the trial judge admonish the jury to disregard the fault, unless the alleged misconduct is of such an extreme character that an admonition will not remove its prejudicial effect. 8 Cal. Jur. tit. Crim. Law, §§ 321, 521. Here the objections were not such as to inform the court that misconduct was claimed, and there was no request for an admonitory statement to the jury. If such a request had been made, the effect of the misconduct, if any there was, could have been removed by an admonition. The point is therefore not well taken.

[17] The following record was made during the final argument of the district attorney to the jury:

"Mr. Jordan: * * * I think it has been fully demonstrated to you that the burglary was committed out there, and the ringleader, and the man who stands back of it, a three-time loser, that puts the other boy—

"Mr. Holland: I object to that as improper. There is no evidence in this record to show that this man is at any time a loser.

"Mr. Jordan: There is evidence here—

"The Court: Yes; there is. * * *

"Mr. Jordan: And that Moe, perhaps knowing nothing about this business, falls in and commits this burglary. * * * Then after they get down to the apartment, who is the one most interested in getting the money out of this stuff? Moe is scared to death, from the time he is arrested, of this defendant, asked the police officers to put him in another cell, that Red would kill him.

"Mr. Holland: * * * I object to that statement as not being in the record.

"Mr. Jordan: It is in the record.

"The Court: Proceed with your discussion of the evidence.

"Mr. Jordan: * * * I want to say to you, ladies and gentlemen, that on two occasions on this witness stand, on direct examination and on cross-examination [two police officers] testified that Moe said Hayes was a three-time loser, not to lock him up in the same cell with him, or he would kill him; and that is why Mr. Moe is taking all the blame. And Hayes himself says: 'I have been in trouble before. I cannot afford to talk.' [Substantially this statement was attributed to appellant by one of the officers.] And when Hayes is told that Mr. Moe has made a confession, * * * and asked if he wants to make a statement, and he says: 'No; the bastard has told you all about it. Why should I talk?' And doesn't that show that there is malice, that there is death in the defendant's heart? He doesn't talk; but the new man, the apprentice, talks, confesses. Mr. Holland refers [in his argument, evidently] to Jesus Christ on Calvary. Christ is still here and willing to redeem this defendant's soul. After the first time there was no redemption; after the second time there was no redemption; after the third time he is beyond redemption. And now, ladies and gentlemen, you are looking upon a habitual criminal that none of us can redeem from the world of crime. * * *

"Mr. Holland: * * * I wish to object to that portion of the argument of counsel for the people in reference to the fact that this man is a three-time loser; prejudicial and improper.

"The Court: The jury will remember what the testimony is, and be guided entirely by the testimony."

[18] It is to be observed that the only objection made my appellant's counsel during the district attorney's address to the jury was that it was improper for the speaker to refer to appellant as a three-time loser, except for an unfounded objection that certain matter was not in the record. There was nothing improper, under the circumstances to which we have already adverted, in the district attorney's mere reference to appellant as a three-time loser. Further, if it were improper, the harm done by it easily could have been erased by admonition to the jury, but no admonition was asked for. This objection may therefore be summarily dismissed from consideration. Departing, however, from the limited scope of his assault at the trial upon the remarks of the prosecuting officer, but omitting objections which he might have made, either in the trial court, or here, appellant now contends that the prosecutor was guilty of misconduct in that part of his remarks following his reference to the Master—in his language characterizing appellant as a habitual criminal whose soul was beyond redemption. We think that in the designated portion of his address the prosecutor was guilty of misconduct. He there allowed his zeal to overcome his judgment, and he there took an attitude which was unfair to appellant. No objection having been made to this misconduct at the trial, and the judge not having been requested to admonish the jury to disregard it, we shall not decide that such objection and request was necessary, but shall assume, without deciding, that no admonition could have eradicated the harm done. We make this assumption solely for the reason, as we shall later point out, that the record against appellant is such that the jury could not well have avoided convicting him, even with that record unpurged of its showing as to the prosecutor's misconduct.

It is contended that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that a witness may be impeached by proof that he has been convicted of a felony. It is said that there was at the trial no witness to whom the instruction could properly apply. We have already observed that Moe, against whom the trial was commenced as a codefendant with appellant, pleaded guilty during the progress of the hearing. It was after the entry of the plea that he became a witness. Did his plea of guilty amount to proof that he had been convicted of a felony? If it did, was the instruction so framed as to apply to him, there being no instruction that a plea of guilty amounts to proof of conviction? These questions we shall not pause to decide. For reasons hereafter to be stated, it is our opinion that no reversal of the judgment against appellant should follow, even if it were conceded that the questioned instruction was erroneous.

[19] The jury was instructed:

"An inference must be founded on a fact legally proved, and on such a deduction from that fact as is warranted by a consideration of the usual propensities or passions of men, the particular propensities or passions of the person whose act is in question, the course of business, or the course of nature."

It is claimed that this instruction was erroneous in its reference to "the particular propensities and passions of the person whose act is in question." We think the portion of the instruction which is assailed was erroneous, for the reason that it was only the act of appellant which was under investigation on the trial. There was no evidence of the possession by him of peculiar propensities or passions. We shall deal later with the question whether the error in giving the instruction was prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellant under the Constitution.

[20] We have made a careful examination of the entire cause now before us, including the evidence, and, having in mind the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, we must determine whether the errors of the trial court and the misconduct of the district attorney have resulted in a miscarriage of justice. We first, however, state the nature of the evidence erroneously received in the form of the deposition of Guin, as the bearing of the error in admitting the deposition upon the merits of the cause will not otherwise be understood. Guin's testimony at the preliminary examination was principally corroborative of the testimony of MacClark and Moe, although the latter was sworn as a witness for the defense, but it also covered certain other matters. The deposition was to the effect, in addition to the matters of corroboration just mentioned, that appellant told Guin, upon showing him the stolen articles, that he had gotten them from some person in lieu of a debt due him from that person; that appellant alone arranged with him to sell the "stuff"; and that, when he left appellant and Moe, after delivering the proceeds of the sale to the former, the money was still in his possession.

Disregarding the contents of Guin's deposition, the undisputed evidence in the case was that appellant and Moe together removed the stolen property from the sanitarium grounds; that they then took the articles to an apartment occupied by appellant, although Moe testified that he had paid a part of the rent upon it; that appellant at least aided in procuring Guin to sell the articles; that he kept or was given at least a part of the proceeds of the sale; that when told Moe had confessed he said that the bastard had told the officers everything, and that there was no use in his making a statement; and that he denied all knowledge of the manner in which the stolen property came into his apartment, and denied that he had ever been with Moe to the sanitarium, although he later admitted the last-stated fact. The sole defense interposed by appellant was that Moe had told him, not alone that the phonograph and radio set were his property, but that he had left his personal belongings at the sanitarium, and that he desired appellant to go with him to procure them. We shall state all the evidence bearing upon this defense, and shall then make an estimate of the effect which it, both inherently and as opposed to the inculpatory evidence, must have had upon the jury. The girl who went to the sanitarium with Moe and appellant testified:

"Mr. Moe asked Mr. Hayes to go out there with him to get some of the things. He said he quit his job, and he wanted to take them away; but Mr. Hayes said he could not go because he promised to take me to the skating rink. But Moe kept on asking him, and finally he said if I wanted to go out there with him they would go out and get his things."

It was also shown that at the police station the girl had made a statement to the effect that Moe said "he had a phonograph and some other things he wanted to get, so he went over there in an automobile." An aunt of the girl testified:

"Mr. Moe asked Mr. Hayes if he could go out with him and help him bring in his things. * * * He said he had his trunks and things out there that he wanted to bring in."

Moe testified:

"I went over to Mr. Hayes' apartment, and asked Mr. Hayes if he would come over and get my radio and phonograph. I said, 'I am working out here in a sanitarium, and I am quitting my job in a few days.' * * * I just told him, 'I have got a radio and Victrola out here, and I want you to come out and get it for me, and put it in your apartment.'"

On Moe's cross-examination, this is a part of the record:

"Q. Didn't you say something about going over and getting a trunk, too, along with this radio and Victrola? A. Well, my clothes. Q. You didn't get your clothes that night, did you? A. No, Sir."

In our view, the defense made by appellant must have appeared to the jury to be a mere sham. Observe how the two malefactors went about the business of getting Moe's "things"—his trunks, his clothes, his personal belongings. They, in company with the girl, went to the sanitarium twice. On the first visit the two men entered the grounds, and in a few minutes returned to the automobile empty-handed. No explanation is made as to the purpose of this preliminary invasion of the premises. What possible reason was there for it, if appellant had been hoodwinked into the belief that he was merely aiding Moe to get his property? The jury must have believed that it was a mere reconnoitering expedition, that, whatever may have been said in the presence of the women as a "blind," the purpose of the original entry of the premises was to ascertain if the coast was clear, and that appellant knew that to be the purpose. The party returns to the place after 20 minutes or half an hour, and the two culprits again enter. They then emerge, not with the personal impedimenta which in the main was to have been taken from the institution by the man who was giving up his job, but with a phonograph and radio set only. Nothing more is ever heard of Moe's general personal belongings. It is useless further to discuss what must have appeared to the jury as a simulated defense, cooked up in an endeavor to forestall the conviction of appellant, except to say that, when the circumstances attendant upon the defense were added to the evidence against appellant, which is recited above, the jury must have seen confirmation of appellant's guilt strong as proof of holy writ. The errors of the trial court and the misconduct of the district attorney did not result in a miscarriage of justice. In our view, under an endeavor to put ourselves in the place of the jury, in so far as we may do so from the typewritten record, a miscarriage of justice would have resulted had appellant not been convicted, error or no error.

Judgment and order affirmed.

BURG v. HARRIS. (Civ. 5039.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 22, 1925. Petition for Modification of Decision and Judgment Denied May 20, 1925.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⊂⊃291(17) — Finding that tenancy did not cease on certain day alleged held not to negative allegations as to wrongful occupancy so as to support judgment for defendant.

In unlawful detainer, where plaintiff alleged termination of tenancy on a certain day, finding that tenancy did not cease on that day held not a finding that it had not terminated on some other date, so as to negative allegations of wrongful occupancy and to support judgment in favor of defendant.

2. Landlord and tenant ⊂⊃95—Tender of sum to terminate lease excused, when tender would not have been accepted if made.

Under lease providing for termination on 90 days' notice, and payment of certain sum, tender of that sum as condition to termination of tenancy held excused, where offer or tender would not have been accepted by lessee.

3. Landlord and tenant ⊂⊃95—Tender of sum due lessee on termination of lease held not prerequisite to termination.

Where lease required lessee to vacate on demand, on due notice, 90 days in advance, and stipulated that in such case lessor would pay lessee $500, tender of that sum held not condition precedent to termination of lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Unlawful detainer by C. H. Burg against Henry A. Harris. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

William T. Kearney, of Richmond, for appellant.

Frank O. Nebeker, of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff commenced this action in unlawful detainer to recover possession of premises held by defendant under a written lease. The cause was tried before the court, and judgment went for the defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment on a record prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The facts material to the appeal are that, on December 1, 1920, plaintiff's predecessor leased the premises to the defendant for a period of 5 years, through a written lease signed by both parties, which contained the following condition:

"It is further agreed that, if the parties of the first part make an actual sale of the above-described property, then the party of the second part will vacate the premises, if a demand is made on him, due notice having been given him ninety (90) days in advance and the parties of the first part agree to pay to the party of the second part the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) if the property is sold before December 1, 1923, provided the party of the second part is asked to vacate. Providing, however, that this lease shall not determine before May 1, 1922."

Acting upon the terms of this portion of the lease, the plaintiff, who had purchased the property after the lease was executed, gave notice to the defendant on January 7, 1924, that the lease would terminate 90 days thereafter, and demanded possession of the premises at that time. The defendant refused to vacate, and the statutory 3 days' notice was given after the expiration of the 90-day period and prior to the commencement of this action. The complaint was founded upon the theory that the tenancy terminated on the expiration of the 90-day period—April 6, 1924—and that the occupancy of the defendant thereafter was without right.

The trial court made just three findings of fact: First, that for more than one year prior to the date of the trial the plaintiff had been the owner of the premises (a matter which was admitted in the pleadings). Second, that the allegation in the complaint that defendant's tenancy ceased on April 6, 1924, was untrue, and that all the denials of defendant's answer were true. As the answer is in the same form, merely denying "that on the 6th day of April, 1924, the tenancy of defendant * * * ceased," it is a negative pregnant in keeping with the finding. Third, that at no time "during the tenancy of the defendant" has plaintiff offered to pay to defendant $500, or any other sum, for defendant's removal from the premises—a matter which was not in issue.

[1] On this appeal the appellant argues that the second and third findings are not supported by the evidence, but we are satisfied that the graver error is that the findings do not support the judgment. The finding in the form of the denials of the answer, that the tenancy did not cease on April 6, 1924, is not a finding that it had not ceased at some other time, and therefore does not negative the allegations of the complaint as to the wrongful occupancy.

[2] The third finding, so far as it is limited to a definite "offer" of $500, is supported by the evidence, though as to this there is a direct conflict in the testimony of the various witnesses. But the uncontroverted evidence is that the respondent refused to vacate the premises on payment of that sum and the showing was conclusive that no offer or tender would have been accepted by him. Such being the case, the appellant was entitled to a finding that any tender or offer to pay the respondent this sum of $500 would have been futile. This fact alone was sufficient to excuse a tender if one was necessary. Hoppin v. Munsey, 185 Cal. 678, 685, 198 P. 398, 401. In the latter case the Supreme Court said:

"A tender is not necessary where the conduct or declarations of the vendee are such as to show that it would be unavailing. 'It is a maxim that the law does not require a man to do a vain and fruitless thing, so it has been held that a strict and formal tender is not necessary where it appears that if made it would have been vain and fruitless.'"

[3] We have said that the appellant was entitled to a finding excusing a tender, but this is so only on the theory that a tender was necessary. But we are satisfied that, under the peculiar terms of the lease, no tender was necessary at the time the notice to vacate was given. The lessee agreed to vacate the premises if a sale was made, and "if a demand is made on him, due notice having been given him ninety (90) days in advance, and the parties of the first part agreed to pay to the party of the second part the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) if the property is sold before December 1st, 1923," and the lessee is asked to vacate. There is nothing in this contract which requires either the payment or the tender of the $500 when the notice to vacate is given. The only reasonable interpretation of the clause is that the owner would pay when the lessee vacated the premises. As the lessee refused to vacate, and so notified the owner when the notice was given, it would have been an idle act for the owner to have either paid or tendered the sum, which was due only on the surrender of the premises, particularly when the rental for the premises would continue to become due from the lessee for each succeeding month.

Judgment reversed.

DAVIS et al. v. BOSCOU. (Civ. 2802.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Trial court's finding, on conflicting evidence, that architects did not waive right to compensation for drawing plans and specifications for one-story building, in consideration of being employed to draw plans and specifications for three-story building, held binding on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1033(9)—Trial court's acceptance of figures in determining architects' compensation, resulting in awarding them smaller compensation than testimony justified, did not injure defendant.

In action by architects for compensation for drawing plans and specifications, acceptance by trial court, as basis of calculation of architects' compensation, of figures that awarded them a smaller compensation than their testimony would have justified, resulted in no injury to defendant.

3. Work and labor ⟸14(2)—Architects held entitled to recover reasonable value of services for preparing amended plans to conform with building requirements.

Where plans submitted by architects failed to comply with state building laws and city ordinances, whereupon they corrected plans to conform to legal requirements, held that, on owner's discharging architects before amended plans were completed, architects were entitled to recover reasonable value of their services.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Hugh Y. Davis and others, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the Davis-Heller-Pearce Company, against L. Boscou. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Daniel V. Marceau, of Stockton, for appellant.

Warren H. Atherton, of Stockton, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiffs, to recover from the defendant the reasonable value of services rendered by plaintiffs for defendant, at his instance and request, as architects, in preparing plans and specifications for two buildings—one a one-story building and the other a three-story building. Plaintiffs had judgment for the sum of $1,950. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

It appears from the transcript that the defendant, the owner of a lot of land situate at one of the corners of Channel and California streets, in the city of Stockton, applied to the plaintiffs for the preparation of plans for the construction of a one-story building and after the plans and specifications for the one-story building had been completed, the defendant, conceiving the idea that the erection of a three-story building would produce a greater revenue, directed the plaintiffs to prepare plans and specifications for a three-story building, the lower story to be used for store purposes, and the two upper floors to be used as a hotel, and that, in pursuance of such directions, the plaintiffs entered upon the preparation of plans for a three-story building. It further appears that no specific directions were ever given by the defendant to the plaintiffs as to the kind and character of building which he desired to erect. The only directions, so far as the transcript shows, appear that the defendant desired the erection of a building which could be leased so as to yield him a return of 7 or 8 per cent. on the investment. The plaintiffs proceeded with the preparation of plans for a three-story building, the lower portion to be used for store purposes, and the upper floors to be used for hotel purposes, and thereafter delivered to the defendant plans and specifications for such a building. In the course of defendant's efforts to find a tenant for the proposed building, it was pointed out to the defendant, by some of the persons contemplating the taking of a lease thereon, that the contemplated buildings, in some particulars, violated the provisions of the state Housing Act, or the act to regulate the building and occupancy of hotels then in full force and effect, and would also violate certain ordinances of the city of Stockton. These defects were called to the attention of the plaintiffs, and certain tentative plans and drawings were again made by them for the purpose of obviating the objections so raised. In the course of the attempted leasing of the proposed building, it was pointed out, among other things, that the rooms were too small to admit of being let for occupancy by two persons under the state Housing Act (St. 1923, p. 781), as it then existed, and that changes and alterations would have to be made therein, in order to give sufficient cubic air space for the different rooms, to provide additional windows for the hallways, and certain other defects which were discovered. It appears from the transcript that the defendant and the persons with whom he was negotiating went to the offices of the plaintiff and stated that they wanted larger rooms, that the rooms as designed were for one person instead of two, and asked how long it would take to make the changes, and were informed that it would take approximately three days. The testimony of one of the witnesses is that he prepared the necessary sketches, and that the defendant promised to come back the same day, but that the defendant never returned. Thereafter, on the 22d day of May, 1923, the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs the following letter:

"I am returning, under separate cover, blue prints and specifications prepared by you for a store and hotel building. My reason for the return is that the building designed by you is not suitable for use as a hotel, by reason of the fact that the rooms, as laid out by you, are too small. That under the state Housing Act, two persons cannot occupy any room in the proposed building. There are certain other provisions in the plans and specifications which are likewise objectionable. For the reasons above noted, the building, as designed by you, cannot be used for the purpose designed by me. Inasmuch as these plans have required over two months for preparation, it will be impossible for me to wait until new ones are prepared as an entirely new design of the building must be made." (Signed by the defendant.)

[1] Following the receipt of this letter, the plaintiffs instituted this action to recover the reasonable value of the services performed in drawing the plans and specifications for the two buildings herein referred to. The pleadings in this action show that the stipulated price to be paid for the services was the sum of 3 per cent. of the estimated cost of the buildings. There is a conflict in the testimony as to whether the plaintiffs had waived any right to compensation for services performed in drawing the plans and specifications for the one-story building, in consideration of being employed to draw plans and specifications for the three-story building. The finding of the court in favor of the plaintiffs, that there had been no agreement not to charge for the one-story building, based upon such conflicting evidence, is binding upon appeal.

As his principal ground for reversal herein, the defendant argues that the plans and specifications as drawn provided for a building that could not be erected under the state Housing Act as it then existed, and in support of his contention, relies principally upon the case of Nave v. McGrane, 19 Idaho, 111, 113 P. 82, and Bebb v. Jordan, 111 Wash. 73, 189 P. 553, 9 A. L. R. 1035. The McGrane Case states the law in relation to architects and their qualifications as follows:

"So far as an architect is concerned, there is always an implied contract that the work shall be suitable and capable of being used for the purpose for which it is prepared. Apart from questions of public policy, this principle would prevent him from recovering upon plans and specifications prepared in violation of law, unless he was directed to so prepare them by the owner."

The same rule is announced in the Bebb Case, supra. There is practically no conflict in the cases having to do with this subject, in holding that an architect is not entitled to recover compensation for plans and specifications drawn by him for a building which cannot be erected upon a specified lot, by reason of the provisions of building laws or ordinances, unless the architect is specially employed to prepare plans and specifications for such a building, irrespective of the place where it is to be erected. If the architect knows where the building is to be erected, and is employed generally to draw plans and specifications therefor, the plans and specifications so drawn by him, must provide for a building that can be legally erected, and reasonably suitable for the uses and purposes for which it is to be erected.

On the part of the plaintiffs, the reply is made that the plans and specifications under consideration have not been finally completed, that the defendant discharged the plaintiffs while they were engaged in preparing plans and specifications for the contemplated building. The testimony upon this question is conflicting, and the finding of the trial court is to the effect that the plaintiffs were discharged while they were so engaged. It is true that to make the plans and specifications conform to the requirements of the law as it existed at the time of the preparation of the plans in controversy would necessitate providing for larger rooms, which necessarily limited the number of rooms for the two stories of the building to be used for hotel purposes. There is nothing in the transcript which shows whether the rental value of the building would be lessened by reason of providing rooms capable of being occupied by two persons, rather than providing rooms that could be occupied by only one person, nor is there anything in the transcript from which the trial court could infer that the building could not be leased when the plans had been changed to conform with the state laws and building ordinances of the city of Stockton. There is testimony to the effect that three persons interviewed by the defendant declined to take a lease upon the premises, and there is testimony to the effect that, in the opinion of certain witnesses, the premises could be leased. The finding of the court is that the premises could be leased. The testimony shows that the defendant desired a building that would yield him the highest rate of interest on the investment, but there is no evidence that the plaintiffs made any representations whatever that a building could be erected on the premises that would yield a return of 7 or 8 per cent. per annum on the investment. The plans and specifications having been returned, as above stated, and the plaintiffs still being engaged in the correction of the same and in the rearrangement of the rooms to make them comply with the laws and ordinances relating thereto, and the court having so found, the respondent relies upon the case of Bebb v. Jordan, supra, cited by the appellants. In that case it appears that the architects were employed to draw plans and specifications for the erection of two buildings. The plans and specifications, as contemplated for the erection of one building, were completed, and were in violation of the building laws of the state. It was held by the court that no compensation could be recovered for the drawing of such plans and specifications. The plans and specifications for the other building were not completed, and the services of the architect were dispensed with before such plans and specifications had been finished. The court stated the law applicable thereto, as follows:

"As to the services performed on the plans for the six-story building, we think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover their reasonable value. The defendant employed the plaintiffs to prepare them, and stopped the work thereon before they were completed. By these acts, unless a sufficient reason intervened, he obligated himself to pay such sum as the services performed thereon were reasonably worth. The defendant seeks to escape liability by showing that the plans as far as they had been prepared contemplated a building which could not be constructed within the limit of cost agreed upon, and showed, as do the plans for the building of eight stories, a violation of the city ordinances. As to the first of these objections the evidence was contradictory, and to our minds supports the one theory as well as the other. But we think the true answer is that the plans were incomplete when the defendant stopped work upon them, and that he cannot now be heard to say that when completed they would have violated the contract as to cost, or the city ordinances, or would have been otherwise defective. These are matters that cannot now be certainly known, and the reason they are in this uncertain condition is because of the defendant's acts, not because of the acts of the plaintiffs."

Judgment was awarded for the reasonable value of the services performed in preparing plans and specifications for the six-story building. There, as here, the question depends upon conflicting evidence, not as to the probable cost of the building, but as to the rentable value of the building and whether the building could be leased. The trial court found that the building could have been leased, and that the building, as designed by the plaintiffs, with the changes directed by the defendant, would have rendered it suitable for use as a hotel, and that such a building could have been legally constructed under the building laws of the state of California and the ordinances of the city of Stockton, and that, at the time of the termination of the plaintiffs' employment, they were engaged in making the necessary changes.

[2] The testimony was to the effect that the cost of erecting a building contemplated by the plans and specifications for a one-story structure would approximate the sum of $25,000, and that the cost of erecting a three-story building would approximate the sum of $65,000. The witnesses for the plaintiffs testified that the reasonable value of the plaintiffs' services was three-fifths of 6 per cent. of the estimated cost. The pleadings show that the compensation agreed upon for the contemplated plans was the sum of 3 per cent. of the cost of the building. Upon this calculation the amount of compensation earned upon the contemplated plans for a one-story building would be the sum of $750, leaving $1,200 allowed by the court as reasonable compensation for the services performed in preparing the plans and specifications for the three-story building. In fixing the reasonable value of services, the testimony was all based upon completed plans, but there was some testimony as to the reasonable value or cost of changing the plans so as to make them conform to the building laws and ordinances. This testimony was to the effect that the cost of making such changes would approximate the sum of $180. Making such deduction, the finding of the court that the reasonable value of the services performed by the plaintiffs for the defendant, amounted to the sum of $1,950, is considerably less than the sum that would have been supported by the evidence, had the court found for such greater sum. In this particular, the defendant cites as error the admission of the testimony of the witness Davis that the cost of the one-story building, with walls for a three-story building, would approximate the sum of $45,000, and that the court must have taken such testimony as the basis for its calculations in fixing the amount to which it found the plaintiffs reasonably entitled. There is nothing in the transcript which shows that applicability of testimony as to the cost of such a building, and there is nothing in the record which distinctively shows how the court arrived at the figure of $1,950, but, as the amount is below that which the admissible testimony would have justified the court in finding, the defendant has not been injured by the court accepting, if it did accept as a basis of calculation, figures that awarded the plaintiffs a smaller compensation than their testimony would have justified, assuming that the trial court believed the testimony to which we have referred.

[3] The evidence set forth in the transcript shows that the plans and specifications at the time the defendant wrote the letter, which we have herein set forth, failed to comply with the building laws of the state and ordinances of the city of Stockton in the particulars pointed out by the defendant, but the finding of the trial court, sustained by the evidence, that the plaintiffs were engaged in correcting and amending the same at the time of their discharge, makes directly applicable the ruling of the Bebb Case, supra, and relieves us from the necessity of considering the various instances in which the plans and specifications are said to be violative of the law of the state.

So far as the record shows, it does not appear that the defendant ever gave any specific directions as to the exact kind of building he desired to erect. It appears generally that he wanted a building with a maximum number of rooms, and a building that would yield a certain percentage on the investment. Further than that, it would seem that the arrangement of the building and all the details as to the plans and specifications were left to the plaintiffs. The trial court found that the work performed by the plaintiffs was, as far as the same had been completed, skillfully and properly performed, and it could not be said, as a matter of law, that the plans and specifications when finally completed, would not have complied with the law. This obviated any necessity for the trial court making a number of the negative findings in relation to the plans and specifications presented by the defendants. It is strongly insisted that there is no testimony supporting the finding of the court that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, were making alterations in the plans to conform to the state building laws. The testimony does show that the plaintiffs stated they would proceed with the work of making the change, or changes, necessary, and that the defendant promised to come back the next day to see the amended plans, but that he never returned, from which the court would be entitled to draw the inference that the plaintiffs were proceeding to correct the plans to make them conform to the legal requirements.

While the trial court, upon the testimony introduced, might have come to a different conclusion, we think that there is sufficient testimony to support the findings, as made, and that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

CONTRACTORS' INDEMNITY EXCH. OF CALIFORNIA v. STATE INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5162.)

1. Master and servant ⇐419—Order reducing total disability indemnity from time of hearing on petition only sustained.

Order reducing total disability indemnity to half compensation from time of hearing on petition, instead of earlier date, held sustained by evidence as to employee's ability to do light work.

2. Master and servant ⇐419 — Burden of proving injured workman's ability to obtain employment on insurer.

After total disability award in compensation proceedings, insurer petitioning for reduction of compensation had burden of proving employee's condition had so improved that he was able to obtain employment.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Judge King, employee, to recover compensation for injuries, opposed by the Hutchinson Lumber Company, employer, and the Contractors' Indemnity Exchange of California, insurer. The Industrial Accident Commission made an award granting compensation to claimant, which by subsequent order on petition of insurer was amended by reducing compensation, and insurer brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

H. C. Kelsey, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari for the purpose of having determined the lawfulness of a certain order and award made by the Industrial Accident Commission.

The record discloses the following facts:

Judge King, aged 51 years, was, on or about November 29, 1923, employed as a laborer by the Hutchinson Lumber Company at Oroville, California. On the date last mentioned he sustained an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment, when he was struck by a piece of lumber proximately causing injury of a serious nature to his hip and back. Both employer and employee were subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279).

Petitioner Contractors' Indemnity Exchange was the insurance carrier of the employer. On May 28, 1924, King filed an application with the respondent Commission for compensation benefits, reciting that Contractors' Indemnity Exchange had stopped payments on March 5, 1924, because of his alleged refusal to submit to an operation.

Hearings were held on June 13, 1924, at Oroville, and on August 12, 1924, at San Francisco, at which times medical reports relating to the injuries of the employee were filed. Upon said hearings and medical reports the Commission entered its findings and award on August 27, 1924. It found that King was still wholly disabled from labor on account of his injury, and awarded temporary total disability payments until the termination of such disability or the further order of the Commission. No rehearing was asked for.

On October 21, 1924, Contractors' Indemnity Exchange filed a petition with respondent Commission, reciting that, inasmuch as King had testified at the hearing on August 12, 1924, that he was able to do some light work, petitioner had directed him to report to the employer at Oroville immediately, and that light work would be supplied him. It was further stated in the petition that King had not reported to the Hutchinson Lumber Company as requested, and was not attempting to do light work of any kind, and petitioner further claimed that, since August 12, 1924, King had been able to do this character of work.

The petition came on for hearing on November 19, 1924. King was the only witness at the hearing. He testified, in effect, that since the last hearing in the case he had done some light work around his home, and that, while his condition was improving, he could not stoop without suffering pain, nor could he lift anything that was heavy. He further testified that he would be glad to try to do light work, and that he had presented himself to the lumber company by whom he had been employed, and also another company, and asked for work, but had been unable to obtain any.

At the close of the hearing King was directed to report to the assistant medical director of respondent Commission, and also to petitioner's physician for examination. The report of the physician of the Commission shows that there was a gradual improvement in the injured workmen's condition, and that it would be for his best interest to obtain some light work which did not involve heavy lifting. The report of petitioner's physician states that King still suffered some muscle spasm in his back, but he believed that he could return to work, although he might be fatigued therefrom the first few days.

This is all the evidence that was had relative to the injured workman's condition between August 12, 1924, the date of the last hearing, and November 19th, when the modified award was had. Upon this evidence the Commission reduced King to half compensation, commencing November 19, 1924. From this order, amending the award, petitioner asked for a rehearing, which was denied.

[1, 2] The present petition is one to review this amendment of the prior award. It is petitioner's contention that all the evidence shows that the total disability indemnity should have been terminated, and partial disability indemnity should have been provided for as of August 12, 1924, or some date prior thereto.

It is conceded that the existence of disability caused by an industrial injury, and the extent or duration of that disability, are questions of fact to be established as other facts are established, but it is claimed that there is no evidence upon which the amended award can be based.

The contention is without merit. There is no question but that King was entitled to the award made in his behalf, following the two original hearings based upon the nature of his injuries, and there is no evidence in the record to show any improvement in that condition between the date of the last hearing, held August 12, 1924, and the one of November 19th of the same year. There is evidence to show that, upon the latter date, King's condition had improved, and he could, in all probability, have performed some character of work. But during the interval between these dates there is nothing to show what his condition was. The injured workman, upon being requested by petitioner to apply to his former employer for light work, repeatedly did so. He also solicited employment from another firm, work of the same character, but in both instances it was denied him. His own testimony does not show that he could have satisfactorily performed light work, but only indicates that he desired to do so. His weakened condition which the evidence shows still existed at the date of the last hearing, might have been responsible for his failing to secure the light employment he sought.

This physical impairment was a fact for the Commission to consider. The act in question does not contemplate that one in the weakened condition the evidence shows King to have been in should, from day to day, measure his strength and capacity in order to satisfy himself that he might be able to perform a light task of some character. It was for petitioner to prove that the injured workman's condition had so improved that he was able to obtain employment.

Compensation is payable for inability to do work, or to obtain work because of the weakened physical condition of the workman, due to the accident, and the evidence here presented is sufficient to justify the conclusion of the Commission that, before the period fixed, King was unable to perform work.

The award is affirmed.

Ex parte HOWARD. (Cr. 1225.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 21, 1925.)

Criminal law ⟸1001—Suspension of sentence for 3 days does not render sentence unenforceable after lapse of period of sentence.

Where execution of sentence for 180 days was "suspended for 3 days," and prisoner remained at liberty from May 13th to Feb. 17th following, without any revocation of suspension of sentence, held that suspension should not be presumed an admission to probation, under Pen. Code, § 1203, and judgment was not satisfied, and was still enforceable.

Application by Albert Howard for writ of habeas corpus directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles. Prisoner remanded.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

J. M. Friedlander, City Pros., J. D. Taggart, and Tracy C. Becker, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On petition of Albert Howard, a writ of habeas corpus was allowed herein. On return duly made the matter has been submitted for decision.

On the 13th day of May, 1924, in the police court of the city of Los Angeles, in an action wherein the petitioner was defendant, he pleaded guilty to a charge of misdemeanor. Thereupon the defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the city jail for the term of 180 days. At the same time the court made this order: "Execution suspended for 3 days." At that time, the defendant was in fact allowed his liberty without any order of court to that effect, other than a supposed implication from the suspension of execution. On the 17th day of February, 1925, petitioner was arrested and imprisoned in the city jail to begin the service of said sentence. The commitment bears date May 13, 1924, which was the date of the judgment.

The sentence was not enforced or modified, nor was any revocation of the suspension of sentence ever requested or granted during the six months immediately following the date of the judgment; and six months, it will be noted, was the maximum period of sentence allowed by law for the stated offense.

Petitioner contends that his imprisonment is illegal in this, that because he was allowed to remain at liberty throughout the maximum possible term of his sentence, and during that period of time there was no revocation of the suspension of execution, no authority thereafter exists to imprison him in satisfaction of such judgment. In support of this contention petitioner contends that the facts bring this case within the reasoning of In re Giannini, 18 Cal. App. 166, 122 P. 831; People v. O'Donnell, 37 Cal. App. 192, 174 P. 102, and Ex parte Slattery, 163 Cal. 176, 124 P. 856.

In the Giannini Case, the justice's court, at the time of sentence of the prisoner to a term of 90 days in the county jail, ordered that the sentence be suspended "during the good behavior of defendant Francisco Giannini, and any violation made by defendant in future, commitment will issue for his imprisonment." This order was made in June, 1911. After the expiration of the 90 days, but within six months, the justice issued the commitment under which petitioner was taken into custody. The maximum possible term of sentence was six months. Prior to the year 1911 there was no statute authorizing a court to suspend the execution of sentence, and an order of suspension of execution of sentence, if valid at all, was only authorized as an exercise of an inherent power of the court. In re Collins, 8 Cal. App. 367, 97 P. 188. But section 1203, Penal Code, as amended in the year 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 689, effective April 6, 1911), in connection with its provisions relating to the admission of convicted persons to probation, directly authorized the court to suspend execution of a sentence of imprisonment. In the Giannini Case this court said:

"We think a proper construction of the statute is that absolute power of suspending sentence is given by this section, and that where a court acts under the statute, within the limits thereof, such order of suspension is not invalidated because the court omits a duty imposed by law upon it: namely, to place the party in charge of a probation officer."

People v. O'Donnell, 37 Cal. App. 192, 174 P. 102, was a proceeding in mandamus against the superior court of Solano county and the judge thereof. It related to a criminal case in which a defendant, after plea of guilty, had been admitted to probation. It was held by the court of appeal that, in relation to said criminal action, the superior court had lost jurisdiction to set aside the order of suspension, for the reason that there had been no revocation or modification of the order of suspension during the prescribed period of probation.

The case of Ex parte Slattery, 163 Cal. 176, 124 P. 856, was a case arising in the year 1912. It appeared that Slattery had been sentenced by the police court of the city of Oakland to serve a term of six months in the city prison; that the execution of his sentence was stayed by order of the court withholding the issuance of the commitment; that defendant was allowed his liberty; that he remained at liberty for seven or eight months, and was then arrested and imprisoned under a commitment issued upon said judgment. The Supreme Court referred to the fact that section 1203 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1911, was in effect at the time when judgment was pronounced against petitioner and the commitment upon such judgment withheld; and the court held that the withholding of the commitment was the equivalent of suspending the execution of the sentence. The court then referred to In re Collins, supra, as containing a satisfactory discussion of the inherent power of a court in a criminal case "to withhold the pronouncement of judgment or to suspend judgment when pronounced." But the court then said:

"By section 1203 of the Penal Code, the Probation Act, the Legislature has prescribed the form and method by which these powers may be exercised. It will be held that courts in exercising their powers so to withhold sentence or to suspend execution of sentence do so in conformity with these legislative provisions and it will not be held that by reason of any informality or irregularity of the order so doing a defendant should be made to suffer. * * * So treating the court's order as one permitted by and within the purview of section 1203 petitioner shows that his rearrest, and the effort to enforce this early judgment against him were made after 'the maximum possible term of his sentence' had expired. But by the provisions of the probation law when a defendant has fulfilled the conditions of his probation for the entire period thereof which cannot exceed the maximum possible term of such sentence, the power of the court to enforce its original judgment is at an end."

The court then cited Pen. Code, § 1203, subd. 5, which is identical with subdivision (e) of the same section as now in force.

In the Matter of the Application of Clark, 234 P. 109, this court recently had under consideration the validity of an order suspending execution of sentence, where it was claimed by petitioner that the order had been made under the probation law, and that because the period of suspension of execution as provided in the order had expired, the court was without authority to proceed further in execution of the judgment. Relying upon the decision of the Supreme Court in People v. Mendosa, 178 Cal. 509, 173 P. 998, we stated it as our opinion that the court below did not have authority to suspend execution of sentence without admitting the defendant to probation. We further found, however, that, under the record in the Clark Case, it affirmatively appeared that the court, in making its order, was not attempting to admit the defendant to probation, but was attempting to exercise, outside of the statutory authority, its assumed inherent power to make such order. But we held that the order itself, when considered in that light, was void, and that the judgment had not been satisfied by the expiration of a term of probation, or at all. This being so, there appeared to be no reason why the defendant might not be compelled to submit to imprisonment in satisfaction of the judgment. For that reason he was remanded to custody.

In People v. Mendosa, supra, it appeared that the superior court had sentenced the defendant to imprisonment in the state prison, but at the same time further ordered that the sentence be suspended, and the defendant remain in the county jail until further order of the court. The Supreme Court held that there was no authority in law for the action of the court in suspending the execution of the sentence and remanding the petitioner to the custody of the sheriff to be confined in the county jail; that if the court desired to suspend the execution of the sentence, the only way in which it could legally do so was by proceeding under section 1203 of the Penal Code, which contemplates that the defendant, while on probation and conforming to the terms thereof, shall be at large and not in confinement.

In its application to the present case, the effect of the law as thus declared is, that if the order suspending execution "for three days" was an attempted exercise of authority under the probation law, then on the facts shown by this record, the petitioner is entitled to his liberty. But if the order was merely an attempted exercise by the court of an assumed power to suspend execution of the judgment, separate and apart from any intention to admit the defendant to probation, then the judgment remains in force unsatisfied, and the imprisonment of defendant is lawful.

If it were not for the decision in Ex parte Slattery, supra, there would be less difficulty in deciding this question. The statement of facts, as contained in the decision of that case, merely shows that the court below stayed execution by an order withholding the issuance of the commitment, and that petitioner was allowed his liberty. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court held, in the language which we have quoted, that this was the equivalent of suspending the execution of the sentence, and interpreted the order as one made under the authority of the probation law.

But we are not satisfied to draw from the decision in the Slattery Case the inference that the Supreme Court intended to decide that in every case of unexplained suspension of sentence, and, for no matter how short a time, such order must be construed as an admission to probation. The discussion by the court is very brief, and it is not clear that this phase of the matter was thoroughly considered. We think that it would be a safer rule, and one entirely in accordance with the intention of the law, to hold that an order of suspension of execution for such a brief period as three days should not be presumed to be an attempted exercise of authority under the probation law. Common sense indicates that none of the purposes of probation would be advanced by an unexplained three-day order of this kind. We think that in such an order, thus briefly limited as to time, there should be something further on the face of the order to indicate that it was an exercise of authority under the probation law, before it can be construed as of that character. And it is not important to determine whether the order, as made by the justice, was made in the exercise of some remaining vestige of the authority which once was a part of the inherent power of a court, or whether it be regarded as a void order. Under either view, the judgment remains in force and unsatisfied, and there is no legal reason why it may not be enforced.

The prisoner is remanded to custody.

BAILEY TRADING CO. et al. v. LEVY. (Civ. 2807.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 17, 1925.)

1. Sales ⟸270—Buyer relying on statutory warranty cannot charge seller on ground that examination of article purchased will occupy time or is inconvenient.

A buyer, relying on an implied or statutory warranty that article purchased is in sound and merchantable condition when purchase was made, cannot relieve himself and charge seller on ground that examination will occupy time, and is or may be attended with inconvenience and labor.

2. Pleading ⟸63—Complaint in action founded on statutory right must bring case clearly within terms thereof.

Where an action is founded on a statutory right, plaintiff must, by his complaint, bring himself squarely within terms of such statute.

3. Sales ⟸434—Complaint by buyer held not to state cause of action for breach of statutory warranty; "ready for shipment;" "immediately."

In action by buyer for breach of warranty as to sound and merchantable condition of milo, based on Civ. Code, § 1771, on ground that it was inaccessible to examination, complaint alleging that milo was on board a freight car "ready for shipment," and that it was "immediately" forwarded to market, held not to state a cause of action for breach of statutory warranty, as term "ready for shipment" does not necessarily mean that carrier had been given or taken possession and control of milo immediately on completion of work of loading, nor does word "immediately" necessarily mean without intervention of such interval of time as would have enabled buyer to make inspection (citing Words and Phrases, Second Series, "Immediate").

4. Appeal and error ⟸1040(2)—Denial of leave to amend complaint for second time not reviewable in absence of affirmative showing of abuse of discretion, or of application for leave after demurrer sustained.

Order, on sustaining demurrer, denying leave to amend complaint for second time cannot be reviewed, where it is not affirmatively shown that court abused its discretion, or that plaintiffs made application for leave to amend after demurrer was sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by the Bailey Trading Company and another against J. T. Levy for damages for breach of warranty. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

M. J. Cheatham, of Red Bluff, for appellants.

L. W. Hughes, of Corning, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is for damages for the breach of a general warranty, as provided by section 1771 of the Civil Code, that a certain quantity of milo purchased by plaintiffs from defendant was, at the time of said sale, in a sound and merchantable condition.

The defendant demurred to the first amended complaint on both general and special grounds, and the court sustained the demurrer, without leave to amend, and thereupon rendered judgment dismissing the action. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from said judgment. The complaint, as amended, alleges:

"That at the city of Corning, in the county of Tehama, state of California, on or about the 30th day of October, 1923, plaintiffs purchased from defendant, 491 bags of milo and paid defendant then and there and therefor the sum of $990.89, lawful money of the United States. That at the time plaintiffs purchased said milo the same was loaded on board a freight car of the Southern Pacific Company at its railroad yards at Gerber railroad station, in said county of Tehama, state of California, about 12 miles from the said city of Corning, and was ready for shipment by freight, in a railroad train of said Southern Pacific Company, to market at San Francisco, Cal., and was inaccessible to the examination of plaintiffs at the time of the purchase thereof, and the same was immediately forwarded by freight in said Southern Pacific Company's train to market at said city and county of San Francisco, state of California. That plaintiffs purchased said milo to be marketed and sold in said city of San Francisco, all of which was well known to defendant at the time he sold the same to plaintiffs. That said milo was harvested in an unripe condition, and was sacked and prepared for shipment while the same was wet and damp, and at the time plaintiffs purchased the same was wet and damp in the sacks aboard said freight car, and was unmerchantable, and continued to be unmerchantable until the same arrived in the said city of San Francisco by the usual and customary mode of transportation by said Southern Pacific freight train. That by reason of the said milo being sacked while damp and moist, the same heated and greatly depreciated in value, and was unmerchantable. That had said milo been in merchantable condition at the time same was purchased and sold the same would have been of the value of $1160.75, but on account of the unmerchantable condition thereof at the time the same was purchased and sold it was of the value of only $613.34. That plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $547.41 by reason of defendant's having sold them the said milo in said unmerchantable condition."

As indicated above, the plaintiffs ground their action on section 1771 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

"One who sells or agrees to sell merchandise inaccessible to the examination of the buyer, thereby warrants that it is sound and merchantable."

In sustaining the demurrer the learned trial judge said:

"The court is of the opinion that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to show that the goods sold were inaccessible to the examination of the buyer. They were only 12 miles away, and he could have examined them had he taken the trouble to make a trip to Gerber."

[1] It is to be assumed from the foregoing observations of the court on sustaining the demurrer, the court conceived that the ground upon which the plaintiffs relied, in attempting to invoke the warranty provided by section 1771 of the Civil Code, was that the alleged inaccessibility to the examination of the milo by the plaintiffs lay in the fact that, at the time the contract of sale was made and completed, the milo was situated at a point 12 miles from the point where the sale was effected. It may likewise be assumed that the argument of the demurrer in the court below was confined, in its scope, to the same restricted view of the pleading. If that was all that there was to the complaint—that is to say, if the alleged "inaccessibility to examination" was grounded entirely on the fact of the distance between the two points referred to—then there would be no reason for the least hesitation in agreeing with the trial court's conclusion that such fact was not such as to make section 1771 of the Civil Code applicable here. It has always been held that the buyer of a commodity, when relying upon an implied or a statutory warranty that the article purchased is in a sound and merchantable condition when the purchase was made, cannot relieve himself and charge the seller on the ground that the examination will occupy time, and is or may be attended with inconvenience and labor. Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall. 383, 19 L. Ed. 987, 989. See, also, Hyatt v. Boyle, 5 Gill & J. (Md.) 110, 25 Am. Dec. 276, 281; 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1312. Mr. Mechem says:

"The rule is not altered by the fact that the examination or inspection will consume time or is attended with labor or inconvenience. No exception to it can be admitted, to use the language of a leading case (referring to Hyatt v. Boyle, supra), except 'where the examination at the time of the sale is, morally speaking, impracticable, as where goods are sold before their arrival or landing. The mere fact of the inspection being attended with inconvenience or labor is not equivalent to its impracticability. If the purchaser desire to avoid it and yet obtain the protection it would afford him, he must do so by exacting from the vendor an express warranty of quality.'"

But the plaintiffs here, in attempting to introduce into the contract of sale the provisions of section 1771 of the Civil Code, go further than merely relying on the fact of the distance between the point where the contract was made and the point where the milo was situated at the time of the consummation of the sale, and the inconvenience and labor which would be entailed by reason of that fact in inspecting the milo. It will be seen that, immediately preceding and in immediate connection with the statement that there was a distance of 12 miles between Corning, where the sale was effected, and Gerber, where the milo was situated, at the time of the making of the contract, the complaint alleges that the milo was, at the time the sale was consummated, "loaded on board a freight car of the Southern Pacific Company at its railroad yards at Gerber railroad station, * * * and was ready for shipment by freight in a railroad train of said Southern Pacific Company, * * * and the same was immediately forwarded by freight in said Southern Pacific Company's train to market at said city and county of San Francisco," etc. Further, in alleging that at the time the sale was made the milo was in an unsound and unmerchantable condition, the complaint (paragraph 3) adds that, at the time mentioned, the milo "was wet and damp in the sacks aboard said freight car." By all these averments, we may conjecture, it was the intention and purpose of the pleader to make it appear that, at the very time the contract of sale was consummated, the milo had not only been loaded on a freight car of the railroad company, but had been delivered into the possession and the control of the carrier. If such fact were clearly shown by the complaint, there would then be presented here an entirely different situation from that with which we are confronted. If, to be more explicit, the milo, at the time the sale thereof was made, was in the possession and under the control of the carrier, there would then exist, by reason of that fact, very strong ground for holding that the article was, when purchased, inaccessible to the examination of the plaintiffs, since such possession and control would be exclusive (subject, of course, to the right in the consignor of stoppage in transit) until the carrier's contract to transport and deliver the milo to the consignee at the place of consignment had been fulfilled. But it may be set down as a sound hypothesis, deduced from common knowledge, that if the milo was not, at the time the sale was made, in the possession and control of the carrier, it would not have been impracticable, "morally speaking," for the purchaser to have subjected it to a satisfactory examination before completing the purchase notwithstanding that the commodity was, at said time loaded, in sacks, in a freight car standing in the railroad yards of the carrier. By employing the method commonly practiced by buyers of cereals already in sacks to test the qualities of such commodities, there would be no more impracticability in the work of inspecting grain or corn in sacks loaded on a freight car than is ordinarily experienced in like examinations where the corn or grain is in sacks and the sacks stacked in the usual way on the ground or in a warehouse. So it is manifest that the primary question here is whether the complaint, with requisite certainty, discloses that the milo, at the time of the sale, was or was not in the possession and under the control of the carrier, and therefore not subject to be interfered with until the carrier's bailment had been terminated by any of the means by which that result may properly be accomplished.

[2] In construing the complaint to determine what the answer to that question should be, we must keep in mind the proposition that the relief sought herein is one which is alone afforded or authorized by statute—that is to say, the plaintiffs are relying upon a right given solely by statute, and that the rule is that where an action is founded on a statutory right or a right deducible wholly from statute, the plaintiff must, by his complaint, bring himself squarely and clearly within the terms or provisions of the statute upon which he relies or must rely to state a cause of action. "When a pleader wishes to avail himself of a statutory privilege or right given by particular facts, he must show the facts, and those facts which the statute requires as a foundation of the action must be stated in the complaint. * * * In remedial actions founded on a statute such averments must be made as are necessary to prove the case within the statute." Sutherland on Code Pleading and Practice, § 5630. See, also Dye v. Dye, 11 Cal. 163, 167, 168; Himmelman v. Danos, 35 Cal. 441, 448; County of San Luis Obispo v. Hendricks, 71 Cal. 242, 246, 11 P. 682. In other words, where a party relies upon a general or a statutory warranty for a recovery, the terms thereof and the facts from which damages for its breach are to be inferred must be set forth with reasonable certainty. 35 Cyc. 446.

[3] The complaint here, in our opinion, does not measure up to the requirements of the rules above stated. Undeniably, an attempt is thus made to state a cause of action founded upon section 1771 of the Civil Code, but it is nothing more than an attempt. It will be seen that, while the complaint states that the corn, at the time the sale was made, "was on board" a freight car of the carrier named "and was ready for shipment" it is not stated that the carrier had accepted possession and control thereof for the purpose of transporting it to the destination to which it was the intention to consign it. The phrase "ready for shipment," as used in the complaint, is susceptible of different interpretations or applications, each being fairly and reasonably within the signification thereof. When one engaged in the business of selling and shipping articles of merchandise or farm products, and which are required to be packed in boxes, kegs, barrels or in bales, and such articles are packed for the purpose of their shipment to some other point, even before being taken by truck or other means from the place where packed to a railroad station or steamboat landing to be put on board a car or a vessel, they are then "ready for shipment"—that is, they are fully prepared for that purpose. If, in this case, the milo had been sacked with a view of shipping it to market or to a particular consignee, and in that condition was still in a warehouse on the land from which it was harvested, it would then, in a general sense, be "ready for shipment," and for sufficient reasons might, while so situated, thus remain "ready for shipment" for several days or even weeks. The same might be true in the case of the loading of agricultural products on a freight car of a carrier of frieght standing in the railroad yards of the latter. Hence, it is to be seen that it does not necessarily follow from the fact that the milo in question was loaded on a car of the carrier, and that such car was standing in the railroad yards of the latter, the carrier has been given or has taken possession and control of the freight immediately upon the completion of the work of loading particularly in view of the fact that it is commonly known to be true that the loading of farm products on railroad cars is generally the work of the seller or shipper himself. Thus sufficiently is it made apparent that the complaint here is not clear or certain as to the meaning of the averment we are now considering. It may be suggested, though, that if it had been directly alleged that, at the time the sale was effected, the milo was loaded in the freight car of the carrier, and that the car, if not an open one, had been sealed after such loading, or that the carrier had accepted the milo as freight, issuing and delivering to the shipper a receipt or bill of lading therefor, or something of similar import had been alleged in the complaint, then the pleading would make a strong showing that it was impracticable for the plaintiffs to inspect or examine the milo, and thus a cause of action would probably under the statute be stated.

Nor does the averment that the milo was "immediately forwarded by freight in said Southern Pacific Company's train to market at said city and county of San Francisco," make the complaint any clearer upon the question whether the milo was, at the time the sale was completed, in the possession and under the control of the carrier, and therefore in a condition in which it was "morally" impracticable for plaintiffs to examine or inspect it.

The word "immediately" is a relative term; that is to say, the real scope of its signification, like the phrase, "ready for shipment," is to be measured and determined by the circumstances or connection in which it is used. Like many other words, it possesses the quality of elasticity. When used in a pleading or legal documents or transactions involving obligations and duties springing from contract, it must be interpreted and understood according to the circumstances peculiar to the act or thing to be done. The lexicographers, it is true, define the word (as it is commonly understood) as meaning something "not to be deferred by an interval of time; at once, instantly," etc. But common sense tells us that there are things and acts which it may be provided shall be done "immediately" which cannot, in the very nature of the case, be done without the intervention of "an interval of time," or at the very instant of time the order or direction to do the thing is given. A party may order a building to be removed from his land "immediately." He may make a contract to that effect. The building, however, as is obvious, could not be removed until the necessary preparation therefor had been made, and then a number a days or even weeks might be required to do the work; yet the contract calling for immediate removal would be performed, if no more time than was necessary to accomplish the task was consumed. Thus, it is apparent, the word "immediately" would not and could not, under some circumstances, mean "at the very instant of time," or without the intervention of such an interval of time after the order or directions are given as would be necessary to render it practicable to do the thing or act, and that, as above stated, the signification of the word must be determined according to the circumstances in connection with which it is used. The decisions express similar views.

In Inhabitants of Robbinston v. Inhabitants of Lisbon, 40 Me. 287, 288, it is held that the word "immediate" means within such convenient time as is required for doing the thing. In Guthrie v. Carney, 19 Cal. App. 144, 124 P. 1045, it is, in effect, said: "Immediate delivery," as used in a statute requiring immediate delivery and change of possession, while not requiring a delivery instanter, requires delivery within a reasonable time according to the character of the property, its situation, and all the attending circumstances. See, also, 2 Words and Phrases, Second Series, p. 942.

In Feeley v. Boyd, 143 Cal. 282, 76 P. 1029, 65 L. R. A. 943, the court said:

"We think the words 'immediate delivery' must be given a reasonable construction. The words do not mean a delivery instanter. The word 'immediate' is defined in Bouvier's Law Dictionary (Rawle Revision), where it is said: 'Strictly it implies not deferred by any lapse of time, but as usually employed, it is rather within reasonable time having due regard to the nature and circumstances of the case. This word and "immediately" are of no very definite signification, and are much subject to the context. In legal proceedings they do not impart the exclusion of any interval of time."

There are many other cases in which it is shown that the signification or meaning of the word "immediate" or "immediately" must often be accepted, not in the sense in which it may commonly be understood to imply, but according to the circumstances or the connection in which or the purpose to subserve which it is employed.

Thus we have referred to the definitions variously given in the judicial decisions of the word "immediate," and its adverbial derivative "immediately," merely to illustrate the proposition that neither word bears a set or definitely fixed signification which is indiscriminately appropriate to all the varying conditions and circumstances in which it may be used.

From the foregoing considerations it will be seen that it is not possible to determine from the words "immediately forwarded" or the phrase "ready for shipment" the particular point of time with respect to the time the sale was made at which the milo was delivered into the possession and control of the carrier. It is certainly true that those phrases, as they are employed in the plaintiffs' pleading, are no less subject to the interpretation that the corn was ready for shipment and was forwarded or started on its way, and so under the control of the carrier at some time subsequent to the consummation of the contract of sale, than to the interpretation that the corn was or had been forwarded at the time of the sale. In other words, so far as it may be determined from the phrases referred to, as they are used in the complaint, the milo might not have been in the possession of the carrier or forwarded or started on the way to its destination until after such an interval of time following the sale as would have afforded the plaintiffs ample opportunity to subject it to an examination by the method commonly resorted to in examining cereals already in sacks, and this proposition is no less true when both phrases are considered in connection with each other or when the complaint is examined in its entirety. Therefore, whether the act of forwarding the corn by freight or the fact of its being "ready for shipment" occurred and existed on the same day the milo was sold, or on some succeeding day, is a matter which cannot be ascertained or determined with certainty from the complaint. Hence, it must be held that the averments of the complaint are so uncertain as to the time when the milo was delivered, pro re nata, into the exclusive possession and control of the carrier, so that it was impracticable for the plaintiffs to examine or inspect before buying it, that that pleading fails to state a cause of action for the breach of the statutory warranty upon which the plaintiffs rely for a recovery. In other terms, the complaint is uncertain as to whether, at the time of the sale, or when negotiations for the purchase of the milo were still pending, an opportunity was afforded the plaintiffs to examine the article or, stating it in another form, it is not made to appear by the complaint with the requisite degree of certainty that such opportunity was denied the plaintiffs, and therefore the objection to the complaint, because of such uncertainty, does not go merely to the question of the insufficiency of the statement of the facts set forth therein, but to that of the insufficiency of the facts stated to disclose a cause of action. Thus it is clear that the plaintiffs have not by their complaint brought themselves clearly within the terms of the statute by which the right upon which they declare is alone given.

[4] Whether it was within the ability of the plaintiffs to amend the complaint so that it would state a cause of action, under section 1771 of the Civil Code, is a matter as to which, of course, we can venture no opinion or even conjecture. But, conceding that they could, still, the order of the court, on sustaining the demurrer, denying leave to amend the complaint for the second time, cannot be reviewed, since it is not made affirmatively to appear that the trial court, in making such order, abused its discretion, and, further, because it is not shown by the record that the plaintiffs made application for leave to amend after the demurrer was sustained, or indicated in any manner how the complaint could be amended so as to meet the objections raised by the demurrer. Stewart v. Douglass, 148 Cal. 511, 83 P. 699; Varni v. Devoto, 10 Cal. App. 304, 101 P. 934; Carley v. Vallecita Min. Co., 16 Cal. App. 781, 117 P. 1037; Durrell v. Dooner, 119 Cal. 411, 51 P. 628; Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 120, 60 P. 689; Williamson v. Joyce, 140 Cal. 669, 74 P. 290; Murphy v. Murphy, 57 Cal. App. 182, 186, 207 P. 43; Whyte v. For the reasons stated, the judgment is affirmed.

1. Constitutional law ⊂=87 — Enjoyment of property cannot be interfered with or limited arbitrarily.

Although use of property may be restricted or regulated, in exercise of police power, so far as necessary to protect others from injury from such use, enjoyment of property cannot be interfered with or limited arbitrarily.

2. Municipal corporations ⊂=601—Zoning ordinances must not be arbitrary.

Although municipalities may by zoning ordinances regulate use of property within delineated areas and districts as reasonably necessary to health, safety, morals, and general welfare, zoning ordinances must not impose an unwarranted and arbitrary interference on right to carry on lawful business, make contracts, or use and enjoy property, under guise of police regulations; reasonableness being subject to investigation in courts.

3. Municipal corporations ⊂=63(1)—Ordinances will be upheld, unless clearly unreasonable.

Every intendment will be made in favor of lawful exercise of municipal power in passing zoning ordinances, and power will be interfered with only when clearly unreasonable.

4. Municipal corporations ⊂=626—Zoning ordinance may be unreasonable and discriminatory interference with constitutional rights.

Ordinance prohibiting property owner from installing machinery and operating oil well on its property while in other districts of city more thickly populated and densely settled, and devoted to residence purposes, conduct of like operations is permitted, may be unreasonable and discriminatory, and amount to arbitrary interference with constitutional rights.

5. Statutes ⊂=255—Ordinarily, enactments become operative upon passage.

Ordinarily, legislative enactments become operative upon passage, unless otherwise provided in act itself, and are therefore construed as effective from time of passage through all forms required.

6. Municipal corporations ⊂=107(2)—Approval is condition precedent to enforcement of ordinance.

Where municipal officer has right of veto, his signing ordinance is for purpose of registering approval, and is condition precedent to enforcement.

7. Municipal corporations ⊂=107(2)—Ministerial act of president of city of sixth class in signing ordinance not condition precedent to enforcement.

Signature of ordinance, as required by General Corporation Bill, § 863, by president of municipal corporation of sixth class, under Henning's Gen. Laws 1920, p. 1961, being a mere ministerial act to authenticate action of board, held not a condition precedent to enforcement of ordinance.

8. Municipal corporations ⊂=107(2) — Ordinance held effective on publication.

Zoning ordinance of Huntington Beach, a city of sixth class, under Henning's Gen. Laws 1920, p. 1961, in which board provided for publication, and directed that it take effect immediately thereafter, held to become effective as provided.

9. Mandamus ⊂=71—Will lie to compel absolute ministerial duty.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, writ of mandamus will issue to compel performance of duty which is purely ministerial, though not where act requires exercise of judgment or discretion.

Lewis W. Blodget, City Atty., and Rush M. Blodget, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, J. Plaintiff brought an action seeking to enjoin the city of Huntington Beach and its city marshal from attempting to enforce the provisions of an ordinance prohibiting plaintiff from erecting derricks, installing machinery, and drilling oil wells on its own lands within the city limits. The trial court sustained the general demurrer to the complaint, interposed by the defendants, and plaintiff declined to amend. Judgment was entered for the defendants, from which judgment plaintiff appeals.

The appellant is the owner of 13 acres of land located within the boundaries of that portion of the city of Huntington Beach designated and set apart as a residence district in two ordinances to be hereinafter referred to. This land, it is alleged, is of great value for the purpose of producing oil and kindred substances, and of a much less value for residential purposes. The predecessor in interest of appellant was about to enter into leases of the land to persons or corporations who agreed to drill oil wells thereon, and did enter into one lease whereby the lessee agreed to drill four wells, and by the terms of which the owner of the property would reasonably expect to receive a sum in excess of $1,500 per day royalty from the production of oil therefrom. Just prior to the making of this lease, the board of trustees of Huntington Beach adopted an emergency ordinance, subsequently amending same, establishing a business and a residence district in the city, and making it unlawful, among other things, for any person, firm, or corporation to erect, establish, carry on, or maintain within the residence or business districts an oil well or derrick, or the business of drilling or operating for the discovery or production of oil, gas, hydrocarbon, or other kindred substances. The lessee of appellant is ready, willing, and able to proceed with the drilling of wells and the production of oil on the lands of appellant, but he and appellant are prevented from proceeding with their plans by reason of the ordinances referred to; the city threatening to prosecute appellant and imprison its officers, agents, or employees or any persons attempting to proceed with the production of oil under the terms of the lease.

It is alleged that the respondent city arbitrarily and without reason adopted the ordinance prohibiting the drilling of oil on appellant's land, and that its action is unreasonable, arbitrary, and discriminatory. In support of these general averments it is alleged that the property of appellant is proven oil land, and is situate upon the principal oil-bearing district of the city of Huntington Beach. Within 500 feet of appellant's easterly line there are now producing wells, and within 900 feet of its property there are no less than 20 completed wells. Some of these wells are in operation and produce large quantities of oil. Thirty-six blocks of Huntington Beach, lying north and east of appellant's premises, and within the purported residence district, are sparsely populated. The larger part of this territory is vacant and unoccupied by residences; there being not more than 20 houses in that section of the city when the first ordinance was passed. Just east of the eastern boundary line of the established residence district, and not included therein, is the most costly elementary school building in the city of Huntington Beach, and a number of residences. Near the schoolhouse and the residences numerous oil wells have been drilled since the adoption of the ordinances, and derricks and engine houses have been erected and oil-producing machinery installed. In another direction, within 10 blocks of the lands of appellant, there is a section of the city more densely populated than the restricted area, the greater portion of which is occupied by residences, and in which the city has permitted the drilling of oil wells and the production of oil. The erection of oil derricks and engine houses and the drilling of oil wells on its premises will not, appellant alleges, in any way endanger the safety, health, or welfare of the people of Huntington Beach.

[1-3] We are of opinion that the appellant has stated a cause of action. The business of boring for and producing oil is a lawful enterprise. The effect of the ordinance, absolutely prohibiting the maintenance or operation of oil wells within certain designated limits of the city of Huntington Beach, is to deprive the owners of real property within such limits of a valuable right incident to their ownership. While the use to which one may put his property may be restricted or regulated by the state, in the exercise of its police power, so far as it may be necessary to protect others from injury from such use, it is elementary that the enjoyment of the property cannot be interfered with or limited arbitrarily. In re Kelso, 147 Cal. 609, 611, 82 P. 241, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 796, 109 Am. St. Rep. 178. It must be taken as very definitely settled in this state that the right to zone may be resorted to by municipalities upon a proper invocation of the police power. Miller v. Board of Public Works (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 381; Zahn v. Board of Public Works (Cal.) 234 P. 388. But such zoning must be reasonably necessary and reasonably related to the health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the community. A municipality is not permitted, under the guise of regulating business and segregating it to a particular district, to grant a monopoly to business establishments and enterprises already situated in unrestricted districts. In re White (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 396. The city of Huntington Beach has the unquestioned right to regulate the business of operating oil wells within its city limits, and to prohibit their operation within delineated areas and districts, if reason appears for so doing. Ex parte Hadacheck, 165 Cal. 416, 420, 132 P. 584, L. R. A. 1916B, 1248. Ordinances having that effect must be reasonable, and must be for the purpose of protecting the public health, comfort, safety, or welfare. Every intendment is to be made in favor of the lawful exercise of municipal power making such regulations, and it is not the province of courts, except in clear cases, to interfere with the exercise of that authority. But, as was recently said by the Supreme Court of the United States, "while property may be regulated to a certain extent, if regulation goes too far it will be recognized as a taking." Penn. Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U. S. 393, 415, 43 S. Ct. 158, 67 L. Ed. 322, 28 A. L. R. 1321. Therefore, notwithstanding this general grant of power, it is a thoroughly well-settled doctrine that municipal by-laws and ordinances undertaking to regulate useful business enterprises are subject to investigation in the courts, with a view to determining whether the law or ordinance is a lawful exercise of the police power; or whether, under the guise of enforcing police regulations, there has been an unwarranted and arbitrary interference with the right to carry on a lawful business, to make contracts, or to use and enjoy property. Dobbins v. Los Anegeles, 195 U. S. 223, 23 S. Ct. 18, 49 L. Ed. 169; In re Application of Throop, 169 Cal. 93, 99, 145 P. 1029; Curtis v. City of Los Angeles, 172 Cal. 230, 234, 156 P. 462.

[4] It is apparent from the averments of the complaint that appellant has attempted to plead a situation analogous to those considered in the two decisions of this court last cited. It has been fairly successful, and presents a case in which a property owner is prohibited by the municipality from installing machinery and operating an oil well on its property, while in other districts of the city, more thickly populated and densely settled, and devoted to residence purposes, the conduct of like operations is permitted. In re Application of Throop, supra, and Curtis v. Los Angeles, supra. For these reasons appellant should be accorded the opportunity to establish, if it can, the unreasonableness and discriminatory character of the ordinance, which, it alleges, amounts to an unwarranted and arbitrary interference with its constitutional rights. The outcome of the controversy will, of course, depend upon the findings of the trial court when the issues have been finally submitted and determined. The demurrer should have been overruled.

[5-8] When the ordinance establishing residence and business districts in Huntington Beach, and regulating business therein, was adopted, it contained a section directing the city clerk to certify to its passage and cause it to be published, the ordinance to take "effect immediately from and after publication." It is alleged in the complaint that the president of the board of trustees did not append his signature thereto, as required by the provision of the General Corporation Bill (St. 1883, p. 270), section 863 of which provides that every ordinance of the city must be signed by the president of the board of trustees and attested by the clerk, and must be published by the board at least once in a newspaper of general circulation published and circulated in the city. Because of this omission, appellant contends that the ordinance restricting its use of its property is null and of no effect. The trial court sustained the contention of the respondent that the signing by the president constituted only a ministerial act, and that the validity of the ordinance did not depend upon his signature.

Huntington Beach is a city of the sixth class, formed under the general act providing for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal corporations. Henning's General Laws, 1920, p. 1961. In cities of the fifth and sixth classes, formed under the provisions of that act, the legislative power is vested in a board of five trustees. There is no mayor, and there is nothing in the organic act requiring or permitting the submission of ordinances to any executive or other officer for his approval before they become effective. The board is required to elect one of its members president, but his sole power in legislative matters is confined to his one vote as a member of the board. No veto power is given to him as president of the board. Ordinances are not required to be submitted to him for his approval before becoming effective. His act in signing, therefore, is only the performance of a ministerial duty for the sole purpose of authenticating the action of the board. The ordinary rule is that legislative enactments become operative upon their passage, unless there is some express provision of law or a provision in the act itself to the contrary. Gay v. Engebretsen, 158 Cal. 21, 26, 109 P. 876, 139 Am. St. Rep. 67. This rule has usually been construed to make the enactment effective from the time it has passed through all the forms required by law to give it force and validity. 36 Cyc. 1196, cited in Dorr v. Marsh, 184 Cal. 588, 589, 194 P. 1002. It is not contended in this case that the ordinance was not duly published; it bears the corporate seal, and has the attestation of the city clerk and his certificate of its due passage by the board of trustees. The sole question to be determined, therefore, is whether or not the failure of the president of the board to sign the ordinance before it was published renders it an illegal enactment.

The signing of ordinances by the mayor, or other designated officer of a municipality, is for one of two purposes. If, by virtue of the right of veto, such officer is invested with some of the law-making power of the municipality, his signing is for the purpose of registering his approval of the measure. Without such signature and approval the ordinance is of no effect. But, if the signing is merely for the purpose of authenticating by his signature an ordinance legally passed, the act is purely ministerial, and may be enforced by writ of mandate. San Buenaventura v. McGuire, 8 Cal. App. 497, 501, 97 P. 526, 528; State v. Taylor, 36 Wash. 607, 79 P. 286. There is therefore a broad distinction between a requirement of the approval of a mayor, or other executive officer, in order to give effect to ordinances, and a mere requirement that he shall sign all ordinances; for, while his signature may be, and usually is, the means adopted to designate his approval when his approval is required, if his signature alone is required the element of approval is absent. 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, pp. 964, 965; McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, par. 691. In such cases, where the signing is required for the purpose of verification, rather than approval, the requirement is held to be directory, rather than mandatory, and lack of signature does not vitiate the measure. 28 Cyc. pp. 356, 357, and cases cited. Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) vol. 2, par. 607, adopts the rule that acts of attestation are directory only in their nature, and a failure to observe them will not invalidate an ordinance or prevent its taking effect.

Appellant relies on the case of City of San Buenaventura v McGuire, 8 Cal. App. 497, 97 P 526, 528, for substantial support of its contention. We find little in the decision to help it. The court was there construing an act requiring ordinances and resolutions passed by the city council, or other legislative body of any municipality, to be presented to the mayor, or other chief officer of such municipality, for his approval. Stats. 1897, p. 190. The act provided (section 1) that the provisions should not apply to cities in which the mayor is a member of the city council, or other governing body. Assuming to act under that statute, the president of the board of trustees of the city of San Buenaventura, a city of the fifth class, organized under the general municipal corporation bill, refused to sign an ordinance duly passed by the board of trustees, and which the president had voted against. On petition for a writ of mandate to compel the president of the board to affix his signature to the ordinance, the court held that, as no veto power is given to the president of the board, and there being nothing in the act under which the city of San Buenaventura was formed requiring the president of the board to perform the duties of a mayor, the act of 1897 did not apply. This proceeding in mandamus was instituted to determine the question whether or not the statute of 1897 had any application to cities of the fifth class formed under the general municipal corporations act. It appears to have been conceded in the case that the duty of the president of the board in signing and authenticating the ordinances of the city of San Buenaventura was a ministerial act, subject to enforcement by writ of mandate, if the special statute did not apply. From the facts in the case, and from such portions of the record as we have been able to examine, we are unable to discover anything that makes the decision authority for holding that the ordinance there under consideration would have been invalid if it had been attested by the city clerk and published as required by the general act.

There is nothing in the statute under which Huntington Beach was incorporated either expressly declaring or indirectly indicating that ordinances duly passed by the board of trustees of cities of the sixth class shall not become effective on their passage. There is not to be found in it any provision that signing by the president, attestation by the clerk, or publication of ordinances are conditions precedent to their becoming valid enactments. These ministerial acts are merely for the purpose of authenticating the action of the board and giving notice of the contents of the ordinances passed by it. Consequently, the signing by the president is not a condition precedent to the validity of an ordinance duly passed by the board of trustees. Commonwealth v. Davis, 140 Mass. 485, 486, 4 N. E. 577; Commonwealth v. Williams, 120 Ky. 314, 86 S. W. 553; People v. Cole, 70 Cal. 59, 60, 11 P. 481. If the board in the instant case had not by its order, declared that the ordinance should become effective only from and after its publication, it would have taken effect, under the general rule, immediately on its passage, and publication thereafter would have been merely a ministerial act to give the people of Huntington Beach notice of its requirements. City of Sacramento v. Dillman, 102 Cal. 107, 111, 36 P. 385. The board having suspended the operation of the ordinance until it was published, we are satisfied that it became effective from and after the date when that was accomplished.

[9] The suggestion is advanced that, because in the instances cited (San Buenaventura v. McGuire, supra, and State v. Taylor, supra), and in other states courts have issued writs of mandate in similar cases to compel the signing of ordinances, the courts must have concluded that the performance of such ministerial acts was essential to the validity of the enactments under consideration. Otherwise, proceeds the argument, the courts violated the rule that "a court does not do the vain and foolish think in ordering an inferior tribunal to do that which accomplishes nothing; it exercises power to issue the writ only when some useful purpose may be accomplished thereby." 16 Cal. Jur. p. 776. In the San Buenaventura Case it was conceded that mandamus would lie, and it does not appear from the decision in the Washington case that the point was there made. While we are not now concerned with the question, we are not prepared to say that a useful purpose may not be accomplished by compelling the performance of a plain statutory duty, even though it may be ministerial and directory only. The writ of mandamus may be issued to compel the performance of an act which the law specifically enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust or station. Code Civ. Proc. § 1085. It is well settled, of course, that, if the duty an officer is called upon to perform requires the exercise of an act of judgment on his part, his decision is not subject to be reviewed by a proceeding for a writ of mandamus. But, where the discretion ceases, and the act to be done is purely ministerial, the duty becomes absolute, and can be compelled through the application of the writ. Keller v. Hewitt, 109 Cal. 146, 149, 150, 41 P. 871; Dufton v. Daniels, 190 Cal. 577, 582, 213 P. 949.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the lower court, with directions to overrule the demurrer interposed to the plaintiff's complaint.

ENGLAND v. WINSLOW. (S. F. 10803.)

1. Executors and administrators ⊜96—Agreement between prospective executrix and another, whereby latter became voluntary trustee of money of estate, held valid as between them individually.

An agreement between prospective executrix of estate and defendant, whereby defendant was to collect certain moneys belonging to estate, and to hold it in trust, and to pay it over to whoever became legal representative of estate, thus making defendant voluntary trustee, irrespective of whether authorized, under Civ. Code § 1373, held a lawful contract, under Civ. Code, §§ 1549, 1550, between the parties as individuals.

2. Trusts ⊜35(1)—Defendant, collecting, receiving, and holding moneys due estate from others, held a "trustee."

Defendant, undertaking, pursuant to valid agreement with prospective executrix, to collect, receive, and hold certain moneys due to estate from other parties, thereby assumed relation of "trustee," within Civ. Code, § 2219.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Trustee.]

3. Trusts ⊜55—One undertaking to act as trustee, and thereby acquiring possession of property of another, cannot deny validity of trusts.

One undertaking to act in capacity of trustee, and thereby coming into possession of money of another, cannot deny validity of trust under which he has admittedly acted and benefits of which he has received and holds.

4. Trusts ⊜345—Defendant held to have become voluntary trustee as to moneys received by him in course of execution of estate.

Where defendant, pursuant to valid agreement with prospective executrix, voluntarily assumed relation of trustee as to moneys owing to estate by others, held that as to such moneys defendant became voluntary trustee of estate, and estate as beneficiary of trust had right to enforce such trust.

5. Trusts ⊜362—That estate not bound by portion of agreement to compensate voluntary trustee of its moneys held not to render trust unenforceable.

Where defendant, pursuant to agreement with prospective executrix, assumed relation of voluntary trustee as to moneys of estate, which he collected, fact that estate was not bound as to portion of agreement as to compensation, did not render a suit by estate against him unenforceable, as defendant's remedy for value of services would be against prospective executrix.

6. Trusts ⊜372(1)—Voluntary trustee of moneys of estate presumed to know that he could not recover compensation from estate.

That portion of agreement between defendant and prospective executrix whereby defendant was to be compensated for acting as voluntary trustee of moneys of estate was unenforceable against estate did not render trust unenforceable, as defendant is presumed to have entered agreement with knowledge that he could not recover from estate.

7. Limitation of actions ⊜103(2)—Limitation does not begin to run in favor of voluntary trustee until repudiation of trust.

Where defendant, as trustee of a voluntary trust, received and held moneys of estate, statute of limitations does not begin to run in his favor until there has been repudiation of his trust.

8. Limitation of actions ⊜103(3)—Voluntary trustee cannot contend that failure to account for moneys received rendered trust wrongful, setting in motion statute of limitations in his favor.

Defendant, receiving moneys of an estate as voluntary trustee, cannot, in suit against him by estate, successfully assert that his mere failure to perform his duty to turn over money to estate rendered trust wrongful so as to set in motion statute of limitations in his favor, as it would serve to defeat provisions of Civ. Code, § 2228 et seq., and section 3517.

9. Limitation of actions ⊜103(3)—Distinct act of repudiation necessary to set statute in operation in favor of voluntary trustee.

Only by the distinct act of repudiation can a trustee of a voluntary trust set statute of limitations operating in his favor, and mere failure to perform his duty is insufficient.

10. Trusts ⟸362—Portion of agreement permitting voluntary trustee to hold moneys of estate until demanded, if void, held not to effect trustee's duty to account and deliver up money.

Assuming that portion of agreement, whereby defendant, as voluntary trustee of moneys of estate, was to hold such moneys until demanded by legal representative of estate, is void, it would not effect trustee's legal duty to account for and deliver up money, which is subject of his voluntary trust.

11. Trusts ⟸362—Delay of executrix in demanding accounting from voluntary trustee of moneys of estate held not to render trust wrongful.

Delay of executrix of estate in requiring voluntary trustee of moneys of estate to account therefor, even if breach of her duty, would not render trust wrongful as to voluntary trustee, nor could trustee urge such contention so long as he did not repudiate trust.

12. Limitation of actions ⟸102(4)—Repose doctrine of statute of limitations held inapplicable to voluntary trusts.

Rule that plea of statute of limitations is to be favored as a statute of repose is inapplicable to voluntary trusts.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Mary D. England, as executrix of the last will and testament of Sophia R. Winslow, deceased, against G. B. Winslow. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hoefler, Cook & Lingenfelter, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Gerald C. Halsey and Frederic T. Leo, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is prosecuted by the plaintiff from a judgment of the superior court in favor of the defendant after entry of an order sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint. The facts upon which the plaintiff's alleged right of action is founded as set forth in said amended complaint are briefly these: Sophia R. Winslow died testate on May 1, 1919. In her last will and testament Harry D. Skellinger and Mary D. England were named as executor and executrix respectively thereof. Said Skellinger failed to apply for letters testamentary, but Mary D. England did so apply, presenting said will and petitioning for its probate and the appointment of herself as executrix thereof. The court duly admitted said will to probate, and appointed said Mary D. England the executrix thereof on June 17, 1919, and she thereafter duly qualified as such executrix, and has since been acting as such. Belonging to said decedent at the time of her death was certain real estate in the city and county of San Francisco, occupied by six family apartments or flats, and which was the separate property of the decedent, in which the defendant herein, who was the husband and surviving spouse of the decedent, had no interest, and was given no share by the terms of said will. The amended complaint proceeds to allege that the defendant, "during the month of May, 1919, and after the death of Sophia R. Winslow, knowing that plaintiff was one of the persons named in said will to execute the same, agreed with plaintiff that he would collect rents due from tenants occupying said premises during such time as plaintiff desired him to do so, pay the water rates and other expenses necessary to be paid on account of the use and occupancy of said premises, and to hold in trust the net proceeds of such collections until said will should be admitted to probate and plaintiff or some other person be appointed to execute said will, and thereafter in trust until such time as plaintiff or such other person so appointed, should demand of said defendant that he pay over to plaintiff or said other person all of said net proceeds, less a compensation to be paid to defendant for his said services as such collector and trustee, amounting to the sum of 50 cents for each monthly installment of rent collected by defendant from each of said tenants; that pursuant to said agreement defendant, after the death of said Sophia R. Winslow, collected from persons occupying said premises during the months of May, June, July, August, and September of said year 1919, various sums of money which were paid to said defendant by said occupants as rent for the use and occupation of said premises during said months; that the exact amount of moneys so collected and held in trust by defendant is unknown to plaintiff, but plaintiff alleges that the aggregate amount thereof is in excess of the sum of $300; that plaintiff made no demand upon defendant for said accounting and payment over by defendant until the year 1922, but during said year, and prior to the commencement of this action, plaintiff demanded of the defendant that he account for and pay over to plaintiff the moneys so collected by him as rents for the use and occupation of said premises, in accordance with said agreement, but said defendant has at all times refused and still refuses so to do, and has not done so; that the rents so collected by defendant are the rentals of said premises earned and accrued during said months and constitute the only rentals paid for the use and occupation of said premises during such period. Wherefore plaintiff prays that defendant be required by the order of this honorable court to account for and pay over to plaintiff all moneys collected by him from tenants and persons having the use and occupation of the properties herein described since the death of said Sophia R. Winslow, in accordance with the terms of said agreement; that plaintiff have judgment against the defendant for the amount of said moneys so collected by him, less said expenses and compensation, together with her costs and disbursements herein incurred, and that she have such other and further relief as to the court shall seem just and proper."

To the plaintiff's said amended complaint the defendant interposed a demurrer upon several grounds, but the two grounds upon which the respondent's reliance is placed upon this appeal are that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that said action is barred by several designated sections of the Code of Civil Procedure. The trial court sustained the defendant's demurrer, and ordered judgment accordingly, and the correctness of its ruling in so doing is the sole issue presented upon this appeal.

The plaintiff's amended complaint is upon the face thereof one wherein the plaintiff as executrix of the estate of Sophia R. Winslow, deceased, seeks to have established a trust created for the benefit of said estate in certain money originally and at all times the property of said estate, and of which the defendant became by virtue of the agreement above set forth the voluntary trustee; and to have an accounting as to the proceeds of such trust and general relief. It is the estate of Winslow and not Mary D. England individually which is a party plaintiff in this action. Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 492, 51 P. 695.

[1, 2] The first question presented is as to the validity of the agreement between Mary D. England and the defendant out of which it is the plaintiff's claim that such trust relation arises. It is admittedly the fact that said agreement was entered into between said parties subsequent to the time when Mary D. England had been named in the decedent's will as an executrix thereof and also subsequent to the death of the deceased, but prior to the time when the said will of the decedent had been admitted to probate. It may be questioned, therefore, whether said Mary D. England, in her capacity of prospective executrix of said estate, had any authority to enter into such an agreement, unless it could be held that she was entitled to do so under the provisions of section 1373 of the Civil Code, which empowers executors before their appointment and qualification to "pay funeral charges and take necessary measures for the preservation of the estate." With this phase of the question we do not deem it necessary to deal, since we are of the opinion that without respect to the ability of said prospective executrix as such to enter into it, or of its binding force upon the estate of Winslow, it was such an agreement as the parties thereto as individuals were under no disqualification to make, and that as between such individuals it meets every requirement to render it a lawful contract under the provisions of sections 1549 and 1550 of the Civil Code. The parties thereto as individuals were capable of contracting, and consented so to do. There was a lawful object, viz., the conservation of the properties of an estate; there was sufficient consideration; and finally, there was an actual agreement by the terms of which the defendant was to proceed to collect certain moneys belonging to the estate of Sophia R. Winslow, deceased, and to hold the same for the use and benefit of and in trust for said estate; and to pay over the same to whoever was to become the legal representative of said estate upon demand. This is, we think, a fair interpretation of the agreement entered into as aforesaid between the defendant and Mary D. England under the terms of which the defendant herein acted in collecting and receiving and thereafter holding the moneys of said estate for which an accounting and recovery is sought by said estate in the present action. It was a good and valid contract in so far as the individual parties to it were concerned. It was, in fact, such an agreement as the executors and administrators of estates are, as a matter of common knowledge, constantly and almost universally making with respect to the affairs and details of estates to which they cannot personally give their attention; as, for example, they employ lawyers to attend to the probate of estates, to bring suits for the recovery or preservation of the property of estates, to collect, hold, and pay over the moneys due estates; they employ servants to perform the manual or clerical labor necessary for the benefit of estates; they contract with real estate and other agents to manage the properties of estates, to collect rents, make repairs, pay charges, and attend generally to those details of administration which are within the line of their special business adaptation, all of which are done and performed, not for the individual benefit of the executor or administrator, but for the use and benefit of the estate. It may be conceded that the estate is not a party to such agreements and is not primarily bound by them, but that fact does not militate against the validity or binding effect of such agreements as between the immediate parties to them. It is not infrequent that by the terms or in the course of such agreements trust relations are created in the course of the execution of which the moneys or properties of the estate come into the possession and under the control of the party to the agreement who has engaged to act as such trustee. We are of the opinion that this is precisely such a case. The defendant herein, by a perfectly valid agreement between himself and Mary D. England, undertook to act in the capacity of a trustee in collecting, receiving, and holding certain moneys at all times belonging to the estate of Winslow, but due to it from other parties; and agreed to do so in such capacity for the benefit of said estate. As a result of such agreement and of his execution thereof there came into his possession and under his control certain money belonging to said estate. To such a situation it would seem that section 2219 of the Civil Code has direct application. Said section reads as follows:

"Every one who voluntarily assumes a relation of personal confidence with another is deemed a trustee, within the meaning of this chapter, not only as to the person who reposes such confidence, but also as to all persons of whose affairs he thus acquires information which was given to such person in the like confidence, or over whose affairs he, by such confidence, obtains any control."

[3] There is another reason why the defendant herein must respond to the estate of Winslow for this money which he has received and holds in the admitted relation of trustee. One who has assumed the relation and undertaken to act in the capacity of a trustee and who has thereby come into the possession and control of the money or property of another cannot be heard to deny the validity of the trust under which he has admittedly acted and the benefits of which he has received and holds. 1 Perry on Trusts, § 433. "Under no circumstances," says this author, "can a trustee claim or set up a claim to the trust property adverse to the cestui que trust, nor can he deny his title." This author further states (section 245) that a person may become a trustee by construction by intermeddling with and assuming the management of property without authority, and that during the possession and management thereof by such constructive trustees they are subject to the same rules and remedies as other trustees, and cannot avoid their liability as such by showing that they were not in fact trustees, nor can they set up the statutes of limitations. The same learned author declares (section 265) that, if a person by mistake or otherwise assumes the character of trustee, and acts as such when the office does not belong to him, he thereby becomes a trustee de son tort, and he may be called upon to account by the cestui que trust for the assets received under color of the trust. The cases cited in support of these doctrines under the various sections referred to fully sustain the text. In the case of Easterly v. Barber et al., 65 N. Y. 252, 259, the doctrine is thus stated:

"It is a well settled rule in the law of trusts that if a person not being in fact a trustee acts as such by mistake or intentionally, he thereby becomes a trustee de son tort. The rule is thus laid down by a recent writer: 'A person may become a trustee by construction, by intermeddling with and assuming the management of property without authority. Such persons are trustees de son tort as persons who assume to deal with a deceased person's estate without authority are administrators de son tort. * * * During the possession and management by such constructive trustees they are subject to the same rules and remedies as other trustees.' Perry on Trusts, §§ 245, 265, 288; Lewin on Trusts, 244; Hill on Trustees, 173. So if a person, without authority, enters upon an infant's land and takes the rents and profits he may be charged as a guardian or trustee, and so if he takes personal property. Wyllie v. Ellice, 6 Hare, 506; Drury v. Conner, 1 Har. & G. (Md.) 220; Blomfield v. Eyre, 8 Beav., 250. It is plain that this branch of the law does not rest on the strict ground of estoppel as usually expounded in the law books. It rather depends upon a principle of public policy connected with the right administration of justice. 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 210. The principle to be extracted from the cases is that the party acting as trustee shall not be allowed, in a court of justice, to set up, as against parties interested in the administration of the trust, a state of things inconsistent with his assumed character."

In the case of Damouth v. Klock, 29 Mich. 289, it is held that defendants who have assumed without authority to administer an estate, and have done so, are estopped, when called upon either in a probate court or in a court of equity for an accounting, from denying their representative character or their liability to account accordingly. In the case of Saunders v. Richard, 35 Fla. 28, 43, 16 So. 679, 684, the court said:

"The principle has already been stated, that a trustee who has accepted the trust, entered upon the discharge of his duty as trustee, and taken possession of the trust property, cannot in an action brought by his cestui que trust for an accounting for the trust property received by him allege the invalidity of his appointment as trustee."

In the case of People v. Norton, 9 N. Y. 176, 178, it appears that one of the defendants had been acting as trustee under an appointment by a court, and that the other defendant was the surety on his bond. In an action by the cestui que trust for an accounting the defendant undertook to allege the invalidity of the order of appointment on the ground that the cestui que trust had not been parties to or had notice of the proceedings. The court said:

"The true point of the objection to the validity of the change of the trustee seems to be this: That it does not appear by the recital in the bond that the cestuis que trust were parties to or had notice of the proceeding. But this is an objection which neither the trustee nor his surety can be allowed to make. Lynch got possession of the trust estate under the proceeding by color of which he claimed to be trustee, and Norton voluntarily undertook as his surety that he should faithfully administer the trust. If the proceeding was irregular for want of notice to the children of Mrs. Lynch, they might object to it in a proper manner, for that cause; but Lynch, after having obtained the property upon the pretense of being a trustee, cannot be permitted to deny his liability to account as such. The defendant, who voluntarily became his surety in order that he might take the trust property, is for a like reason precluded from denying his liability as surety."

In the case of Lehmann v. Rothbarth, 111 Ill. 185, the husband of the administratrix of an estate and guardian of minor heirs assumed to act without authority for his wife in collecting and handling the funds of the estate. In an action brought against him by the heirs of the estate for an accounting, it was held that, the defendant having assumed to act as the agent of the administratrix and guardian, and having thereby come into possession of the property of the estate and of the heirs thereof, he was liable to an accounting thereof as a trustee, and could not be heard to allege his want of authority to act in his assumed capacity. In the case of Shearman v. Morrison, 149 Pa. 386, 24 A. 313, it was held that money received by an attorney in fact and trustee for others which was not within the letter of his appointment but which was received by virtue thereof must be accounted for by him to his cestui que trust as a trustee. notwithstanding the irregularity of his appointment as such trustee. The cases might be multiplied indefinitely to the same effect, and it must be regarded as settled law that one who assumes voluntarily to act in the capacity of a trustee and receives and holds the funds of another by virtue of such assumed relation, cannot be heard to allege the irregularity or invalidity of his appointment as such trustee in an action brought by the cestui que trust for an accounting for the proceeds of his trust. In Chaplin on Trusts, 78–192, the same doctrine is laid down; the author declaring that trustees are estopped to deny the regularity of proceedings under which they secured possession of the trust property, citing in support thereof People v. Norton, supra; Johnston v. Smith, 25 Hun, 175, 177; Dodge v. St. John, 96 N. Y. 260; People v. Chalmers, 60 N. Y. 154.

[4] It follows irresistibly that the defendant, by virtue of his said agreement whereby he voluntarily assumed the relation of trustee with relation to the moneys to presently come into his hands in the course of its execution, became as to such moneys the voluntary trustee of the estate of Winslow with respect to such moneys which were at all times the property of the estate; and hence that the said estate as the beneficiary of said trustee had a right to establish and enforce the same in this form of action.

[5, 6] It is however, the contention of the defendant that the trust which the estate is by this action seeking to enforce as a result of said agreement between himself and Mary D. England is unenforceable against him at the suit of the estate, for the reason that the estate is not bound by the portion of said agreement relating to his compensation, and hence he cannot be bound to respond to the estate for the moneys belonging to it which he has collected and received by virtue of the other terms of said agreement. There are two answers to this contention. The first is that as between the defendant and Mary D. England the agreement is good and is enforceable as to all its parts, and, if the defendant has performed any services thereunder, he has his remedy against the latter for the value of such services according to the terms of said agreement; and the other answer is that parties entering into contracts of this character do so with knowledge of the law, and that the parties to this agreement therefore knew that the defendant could have primarily no recourse thereunder to the estate of Winslow for his compensation for services performed for the use and benefit of the estate, but must look to the prospective or actual executrix of said estate in her individual capacity for his reward; and hence that he agreed and undertook to act as a trustee for the benefit of said estate without the right or expectation of compensation directly from it. Having received its property as such trustee and under such understanding, he cannot refuse to render an accounting for such property and to pay the same over to its legal representative on demand and upon the ground stated. In this respect he is in no better or worse position than an attorney for the estate would be who had collected some of its money or property upon an agreement with a prospective or appointive executrix as to the amount of his attorney's fees. In either case the agent or attorney is acting as a trustee of the estate with relation to any of its moneys which may come into his hands as such, and must pay the same over to it, looking for his compensation to the executrix individually with whom the agreement was made.

[7] The next question presented for consideration is that of the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations. But, if our foregoing conclusions are correct to the extent of holding that the defendant is the trustee of a voluntary trust, and that he received and held the moneys of the said estate in that capacity and not otherwise, the authorities are uniform in holding that the statute of limitations does not begin to run in favor of such a trustee until there has been a repudiation of this trust. Schroeder v. Jahns, 27 Cal. 274; MacMullan v. Kelly, 19 Cal.

App. 700, 127 P. 819; Cohn v. Goodday, 191 Cal. 615, 217 P. 756, and cases cited. No repudiation of said trust appears upon the face of the amended complaint herein, at least prior to the alleged demand and refusal of the defendant thereupon to turn over said moneys to said estate or to render an accounting therefor. The present action was commenced shortly after the date of such demand and refusal. The respondent herein, however, insists that this action is not an action for the enforcement of a trust, but is to be deemed an action by said estate for moneys had and received by the defendant for its use and benefit; and that in such form of action his plea of the statute of limitations is available. The amended complaint herein is not, as we have seen, in form an action for moneys had and received, but, even if it could be construed to be such, it affirmatively appears that the defendant received such moneys in the capacity of a voluntary trustee for the benefit of said estate, and, this being so, the uniform current of authority is that, regardless of the form of action, the defense of the statute of limitations cannot be availed of until there has been a repudiation of the trust, and until the statutory period thereafter has expired. 1 Perry on Trusts, § 246; Putnam v. Lincoln Safe Deposit Co., 191 N. Y. 166, 183, 83 N. E. 789; Soar v. Ashwell, 2 Queen's Bench, 390; Goodhue v. Barnwell, Rice, Eq. (S. C.) 198.

[8, 9] The defendant, however, makes the further contention that, conceding that he came lawfully into the possession of the said moneys of the estate, it was his duty to turn the same over to the estate or to the legal representative thereof as soon as the latter was appointed and qualified, and that his possession of such moneys became wrongful immediately upon his violation of his duty and trust in that regard; and hence that the statute of limitations immediately commenced to run. To admit the soundness of this contention would be, not only to violate a cardinal maxim of jurisprudence which forbids any person from taking advantage of his own wrong (Civ. Code, § 3517), but would also be to violate that equally essential rule of equity embodied in section 2228 et seq. of the Civil Code, which requires trustees to exercise the highest good faith with respect to the properties and beneficiaries of the trust, and which forbid trustees to obtain any personal advantage whatever in the course of its administration. To permit this trustee of a voluntarily assumed trust to assert successfully that his mere failure or neglect to perform his duty to account for and turn over the money of the estate in his possession as such trustee rendered his trust wrongful so as to set in motion the statute of limitations in his favor would not only serve to defeat these statutory provisions of the Code, but would have the effect of imperiling every other express or voluntarily assumed trust, no matter how extensive or how sacred, by the mere failure of an erring or neglectful trustee to perform his duty in promptly accounting for or paying over the proceeds of his trust. The only way in which the trustee of an express or voluntary trust can set the statute of limitations in operation in his favor with respect to it or its properties in his hands is by a distinct act of repudiation amounting to a denial of its existence, and no mere tacit failure of the trustee to perform his duty in respect to such trust could or should be held to amount to a repudiation of it so as to set the statute of limitations in motion in his favor and as a result of his own neglect of duty. Janes v. Throckmorton, 57 Cal. 368; Zuck v. Culp, 59 Cal. 142; McClure v. Colyear, 80 Cal. 378, 29 P. 175; Roach v Caraffa, 85 Cal. 436, 25 P. 22; Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 575, 26 P. 1108; Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 405, 18 P. 866, 27 P. 1082. See Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 P. 555.

[10, 11] Again, it is urged by the respondent herein that under the terms of the agreement out of which or of the execution of which this trust arose, the trustee was entitled to hold the moneys in question until such time as they should be demanded by the legal representative of the estate, and that such an agreement would be void as beyond the power of either the prospective or appointive executrix to make it, and hence that the entire agreement is void. We do not concede that the terms of the agreement contemplated any such prolonged retention of these moneys by the trustee after the appointment and qualification of a legal representative of the estate as would subject the agreement to this criticism, but, even if it were to be so construed and, if so interpreted, this portion of said agreement could be held void, it would not follow that the entire agreement would thereby be violated and the trustee be relieved of all duty to pay over to the estate the moneys belonging to it and which he has come into the possession of under the other portions of said agreement. The clause in said agreement relating to the duty of the trustee to account and pay over to said estate the moneys which he has collected and holds as such trustee upon demand is easily separable from the provisions of said agreement which empower and have enabled him to collect such money, and, even if the said clause in said agreement should be held void, it would not affect the legal duty of the trustee to account for and deliver up the money which is the subject of his voluntary trust. It is, however, urged that it was the duty of the executrix to have immediately upon her appointment and qualification required of said trustee that he account for and pay over said moneys, and that the failure to perform such duty would render the further holding of such moneys wrongful on the part of the trustee, and thus start the running of the statute of limitations. There is no merit in this contention, for, even if it were conceded that the delay of the executrix would be a breach of her duty to the estate, it would not render the trust wrongful as to the voluntary holding of its funds in that capacity by the trustee, nor could the trustee who was thus holding such funds and benefiting by the delay be heard to urged such contention so long as there had been on his part no repudiation of his trust.

[12] Finally, it is urged that the plea of the statute of limitations is to be favored as a statute of repose. While this is a true doctrine as to those persons who are standing at arm's length in their dealings with each other, it has never been given application to voluntary trusts, since to do so would be to render such statute not a beneficent statute of repose, but a vile instrument of wrong in relation to those who are standing and continuing in voluntarily assumed confidential relations to each other. It has therefore no application to the facts of the instant case.

The judgment is reversed.

HOFFMAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 11652.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1925. Rehearing Denied July 16, 1925.)

Mandamus ⊂=3(11) — On failure to show that plain, speedy, and adequate remedy is not available by intervention, mandamus to compel entering order substituting petitioner as trustee in bankruptcy may be denied.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1086, where petition for writ of mandate to compel entry of order substituting petitioner as trustee in bankruptcy makes no showing that plain, speedy, and adequate remedy is not available by intervention, under section 387, petition will be denied.

In Bank.

Mandamus by William Hoffman, as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of J. Charles King, against the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and Frank J. Murasky, judge, to compel entry of order substituting petitioner as defendant in certain action. Writ denied.

Wallace & Ames, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the respondents to enter an order substituting petitioner, as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of J. Charles King, a bankrupt, in place of said King, as defendant, in an action now pending in the respondent court. No showing is presented from which it appears to us that a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy (Code Civ. Proc. § 1086) is not available to petitioner in the premises by intervention (Code Civ. Proc. § 387).

The petition is denied.

CITY COUNCIL OF SAN JOSE v. GOODWIN, City Manager. (S. F. 11622.)

Municipal corporations ⊂=956(4) — Primary election held not "general election" within charter as to submission of tax rate ordinance.

Under San Jose charter, § 61, providing that tax rate of $1 per $100 may be exceeded only pursuant to an ordinance submitted and adopted at a general or special election, a first or primary election was not a "general" election in view of sections 9, 10, 13, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, distinguishing between "general" and "primary" elections.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, General Election.]

In Bank.

Application by the City Council of the City of San Jose for writ of mandate directed to Clarence B. Goodwin, as City Manager of the city of San Jose. Writ denied.

Archer Bowden, of San Jose, for petitioner.

H. G. Hill and Bohnett, Hill & Campbell, all of San Jose, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an application on behalf of the city of San Jose for a writ of mandate to compel its city manager to include in his estimate of revenue and expenditures for the fiscal year commencing December 1, 1925, an amount based on a tax rate of $1.30.

At an election, held on May 1, 1922, there was submitted to the electors of said city an ordinance providing that the maximum tax rate for the fiscal year commencing December 1, 1922, December 1, 1923, December 1, 1924, and December 1, 1925, should be fixed at $1.30. The proposed ordinance received a vote sufficient for its adoption, if it was lawfully submitted at said election. The authority for the submission and adoption of such an ordinance is found in section 61 of the city charter, which provides:

"The tax levy authorized by the council shall not exceed one dollar upon each one hundred dollars ($100.00) of the assessed valuation of all real and personal property within the city, exclusive of the amount necessary to pay the principal of and interest on the bonded indebtedness of the city, except by ordinance approved, or adopted by the affirmative vote of the majority of the people voting at a general or special election." Stats. 1915, p. 1891.

The ordinance in question was submitted and voted on at a first or primary election especially provided for in the charter. It is conceded that such a primary election is not a special election as contemplated by said section 61. The sole question for determination is whether the first or primary election, at which the ordinance was submitted, was a general election within the meaning of said section 61.

The tax levied by the city council must be based on the estimated revenue and expenditures included within a budget submitted by the city manager, and he has refused to submit such a budget based on a tax rate of $1.30. His contention is that the said ordinance is invalid for the reason that it was not submitted to a vote of the people at a general or a special election as required by the charter. On behalf of the city it is contended that as the primary election under the charter is held at stated intervals, and that as all electors of the city were privileged to vote at said election on the question of the approval or rejection of said ordinance, the said primary election was to all intents and purposes a general election as contemplated by said section 61. An examination of other provisions of the charter must be resorted to in order to determine whether a primary election may be deemed a general election for the purpose of the submission of said ordinance.

Section 9 of the charter provides that candidates to be voted for at general municipal elections shall be nominated as therein provided. "The first, or primary, election shall be held on the first Monday in May," etc. Every person desiring to become a candidate for an elective office must, at least 30 days prior to a primary election, file with the city clerk a statement declaring, among other things, that he is a candidate for nomination to the designated office at the forthcoming primary election and requesting that his name be printed on the official primary ballot for nomination at such primary election. In section 10 the petition for nomination of candidates is required to refer to the primary election. In section 13 it is provided that a petition for nomination must be presented to the clerk, within a designated time before the primary election. Sections 18 and 19 provide for a printing of the official primary ballot. Section 20 provides generally for the conduct of the primary election, and that under certain conditions a candidate may, upon receiving a required number of votes at such primary election, be declared elected. Section 21 is headed "General Election" and contains the following provisions:

"If at any election held as above provided there be any office to which the required number of persons was not elected, then as to such office the said first or primary election shall be considered to have been a primary election for the nomination of candidates, and a general election on the second Monday succeeding said first election shall be held to fill said office or offices. The candidates not elected at such first election equal in number to twice the number to be elected to all such offices, who have received the highest number of votes for the respective offices at such first or primary election, shall be the only candidates at such general election; * * * The candidates equal in number to the number of persons to be elected, who shall receive the highest number of votes at such general election, shall be declared elected to such office."

Section 22, under the heading "Rules Governing General Election," provides that all provisions theretofore set forth as to the conduct of an election so far as applicable shall govern the general election. Section 24, relating to elections for short terms, provides, "that on the ballots at the first or primary and general municipal elections, the candidates for such short term shall be listed as for a separate office."

It is apparent that, under the several charter provisions above referred to, the framers of the charter were at pains to distinguish between a primary and a general election. The terms are not interchangeable in any sense. Nor do we think that the fact that all of the officers of the city may be elected at the first primary election would have the effect of converting such primary election into a general election, as contemplated by the charter. The city relies on the case of Bigelow v. Board of Supervisors, 18 Cal. App. 715, 124 P. 554, where it was held that the presidential primary election was not a general election at which a local option question might be submitted under the terms of the local option law. It may be assumed that the essential elements of a general election, as defined in that case may be attached to a primary election under consideration here, but it would not follow that such primary election could, by judicial definition, be transformed into a general election, when the charter by unmistakable terminology clearly distinguishes such elections. A consideration of all of the terms of the charter would seem to make it apparent to the point of demonstration that, under that instrument, a primary election is not a general election as contemplated by said section 61. The organic law of the city authorizes the council to exceed the one-dollar tax rate only pursuant to an ordinance submitted and adopted at a general or special election. As the ordinance in question was not so submitted or adopted, it lacks the sanction of the charter to give it validity.

The peremptory writ is denied, and the alternative writ is discharged.

MEYER v. MOORE. (Civ. 2808.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹1170(3)—Judgment not reversed, in absence of prejudice from overruling of demurrer.

In action on guaranty of dividends on stock, error, if, any, in overruling demurrer to complaint not stating with technical accuracy that dividends had not been paid, held not ground for reversal, in absence of any claim that sum had ever been paid, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting reversal, in absence of showing that alleged error was prejudicial.

2. Corporations ⟹82—Written contract as to dividends presumptive evidence of consideration.

Under Civ. Code, § 1614, written contract guaranteeing dividends on corporate stock is presumptive evidence of consideration.

3. Corporations ⟹82—Burden of proving want of consideration of written contract is on defendant.

In action on written contract guaranteeing dividends on corporate stock, burden of proving want of consideration is on party seeking to avoid it, in view of Civ. Code, § 1615.

4. Guaranty ⟹4—Guaranty of certain dividends held not collateral undertaking.

Written guaranty by promoter of 8 per cent. dividends on stock, given as inducement for purchase thereof, held an independent contract, and not collateral and dependent on any promise of corporation issuing stock, as "guaranty," or "guarantee," does not necessarily import contract of guaranty, but may import an original obligation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by H. C. Meyer against W. J. Moore. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for appellant.

Alvin Weis, of Marysville, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment for the sum of $400. From this judgment the defendant appeals. It appears from the transcript:

That the defendant, during the time covered by the proceeding referred to herein, was a stockholder and president of the Ellamoore Candy Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Nevada, and having its principal place of business at the city of Reno, therein. That prior to the 9th day of April, 1921, the defendant had solicited the plaintiff a number of times to invest the sum of $5,000 in the capital stock of the said Ellamoore Candy Company. That the plaintiff was loath to invest in the capital stock of that company, and finally stated to the defendant that he would do so if he had some security. That the defendant at that time was promoting said company and selling the stock thereof. That, after the making of such statement by the plaintiff to the defendant, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff an instrument in writing, in the following words and figures, to wit:

"Marysville, Cal., April 9th, 1921.

"I, W. J. Moore, guarantee 8 per cent. interest on $5,000 investment in Ellamoore candy co payable anualy

"Yours truly W. J. Moore."

That thereupon the plaintiff invested the sum of $5,000 in the capital stock of said candy company, and received therefor two certificates, each representing 250 shares—one issued in the name of himself and one in the name of plaintiff's wife. Nothing having been paid in the way dividends on the capital stock of said corporation, the plaintiff began this action, based upon the written instrument just set forth. The complaint sets forth the plaintiff's cause of action in the following manner:

"II. That on the 9th day of April, 1921, at Sutter, in the county of Sutter, state of California, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, would invest $5,000 in stock of said Ellamoore Candy Company, the defendant guaranteed by a memorandum in writing, made and subscribed by said defendant, a return and profit of 8 per cent. on said investment, payable annually, and promised to be answerable to plaintiff for the payment thereof.

"III. That plaintiff herein thereupon, and acting on his faith in said guaranty, invested the sum of $5,000 in the stock of said Ellamoore Candy Company, and paid over said sum of $5,000 to the agent of the said company, and received in return therefor his certificate for 500 shares of the stock of said company, of all of which the defendant herein had due notice.

"IV. That said Ellamoore Candy Company has never to this date paid any dividends whatever on said stock, and plaintiff herein has received no return or profit therefrom, either from said Ellamoore Candy Company or from defendant herein. That before the commencement of this action plaintiff demanded of defendant the payment to him of $800, being 2 years' interest on said investment, as guaranteed by defendant, but that defendant refused to pay the same, and has ever since neglected and refused to pay the same or any part thereof."

To this complaint the defendant assigned two grounds of demurrer: (1) That said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (2) that said complaint is uncertain, in that it does not appear therefrom what, if any, consideration the defendant received for the execution of the written instrument referred to in the second paragraph of plaintiff's complaint. This demurrer being overruled, the defendant answered, denying the allegations contained in the second and third paragraphs of the plaintiff's complaint, and admitted the allegations contained in the fourth paragraph of plaintiff's complaint.

[1] The appellant insists that his demurrer should have been sustained, and sets forth, among other things, that there is no sufficient allegation of nonpayment of the 8 per cent. referred to by the Ellamoore Candy Company, and no sufficient allegation that the defendant had not paid said sum to the plaintiff. As we have stated, the defendant answered, admitting the allegations set forth in the fourth paragraph of the plaintiff's complaint, and, even though it be admitted that the allegations contained in said paragraph are not technically sufficient, as measured by the strict rules of pleading, yet it satisfactorily appears therefrom to the ordinary understanding that no return has been paid to the plaintiff, by reason of said investment, either by the candy company or by the defendant. There is no claim appearing anywhere in the record that such sum has ever been paid by either the candy company or the defendant, and under such circumstances we think that the error of the trial court, if any, in ruling upon the defendant's demurrer upon this ground, falls within the saving provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution, where it is provided:

"No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of misdirection of the jury, or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence, or for any error as to any matter of pleading, or for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

The error here is only a matter of technical pleading, and could not, even in the remotest degree, have affected the substantial rights of any of the parties to this proceeding. The general allegation that nothing had been paid, as set forth in the complaint, is admitted, and it cannot be claimed that any injustice was done the defendant, where there is not a scintilla of evidence to indicate anything to the contrary, and no pleading on the part of the defendant, other than the admission to which we have just referred.

[2, 3] As to the second ground of demurrer, the answer is found in section 1614 of the Civil Code, "a written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration." We may also add that section 1615 of the same Code places the burden of showing want of consideration to support a written instrument upon the party who seeks to invalidate it or to avoid it.

[4] The appellant next argues that the instrument sued on is a collateral undertaking, and that the guarantor or defendant becomes liable only on the default of the principal. The complaint in this case, as we have said, alleges that the Ellamoore Candy Company had not paid any dividends upon the stock in question, that the plaintiff had not received any profit therefrom, and that the defendant had not paid said guaranteed income, though demand had been made therefor. Considerable learning is exhibited in the argument of counsel, going to show that the liability of a guarantor is secondary, and his contract is collateral to that of his principal; that the principal in this case, the Ellamoore Candy Company, had not promised to pay any profits or dividends whatever to the plaintiff; that all the Ellamoore Candy Company could promise, and the promise that would be implied by law, would be that the directors of the company would conduct the business thereof in a legal manner, and to the best possible interests of the stockholders; and therefore that, as the obligation of a guarantor must be no larger in amount, nor in other respects more burdensome than that of the principal, the defendant in this case assumed no liability whatever by reason of the execution and delivery of the written instrument hereinbefore set forth, as an inducement to the plaintiff to invest the sum of $5,000 in the stock of said candy company. Numerous authorities are cited to support the contentions made by the appellant, but, for the reasons to be hereinafter stated, we think they are inapplicable. We think that the writing set forth in the transcript in this case, taken in connection with the circumstances under which it was delivered, constitutes an independent contract, and is not collateral to any promise on the part of the Ellamoore Candy Company to pay to the plaintiff annually any sum of money whatever. In the case of Hill v. Smith, 21 How. 283, 16 L. Ed. 113, the Supreme Court of the United States had before it the identical question presented here. In that case the defendants executed and delivered an instrument in writing as an inducement to the plaintiff to subscribe for certain shares of stock in the Cincinnati, Newcastle & Michigan Railroad Company, in payment for a right of way through his land, instead of cash upon an agreement, which, after reciting what we have said, read:

"Now, we, the undersigned, in consideration of the premises, hereby guaranty to the said

Henry Hill, that the said stock shall be worth par in three years from the date of this instrument; and if at the expiration of that date said stock shall not be worth par, we guaranty the said Henry Hill that the said Cincinnati, Newcastle, & Michigan Railroad Company shall make up to him or pay him whatever sum the said stock shall be worth less than par, so as to make the said stock worth par to said Henry Hill at that date."

The stock became worthless. It was held by the court that this was not a collateral agreement of guaranty, though the word "guaranty" was used, but was an original covenant on the part of the defendants to induce the plaintiff to accept stock in the railroad company, as payment for his lands, that no suit was required to be first instituted against the corporation, but that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain said action against the defendants upon said written promise, as being an original agreement.

In Moorehouse v. Crangle, 36 Ohio St. 130, 38 Am. Rep. 564, a stockholder and president of a corporation orally promised the plaintiff that, if he would subscribe and pay $500 for shares of the capital stock of the corporation, he should receive 15 per cent. of that amount in a year. It was held that such promise did not amount to a covenant to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, but was an original obligation. This case quotes with approval the case of Hill v. Smith, supra, and comments upon the use of the word "guaranty" as follows:

"In noticing the word 'guaranty,' which was used in that contract, and which was relied on as importing a collateral contract, it is said this term is usually applied to a collateral undertaking, yet, when taken in connection with the other terms of the instrument, the contract is clearly an original, independent one."

A number of authorities are also there cited in support of the holding in that case. In Kilbride v. Moss, 113 Cal. 432, 45 P. 812, 54 Am. St. Rep. 361, a purchase of the capital stock of a corporation was made at the request of a large stockholder, who, in order to induce the purchase, verbally promised the purchaser to return the money paid by him for the stock should it become worthless. It was held in that case that the promise was an original one and not a guaranty, and the distinction is drawn between a promise which is original and one which is only collateral to the undertaking of a third party. It is there said:

"A contract of guaranty is a collateral undertaking, and cannot exist without the presence of a main or substantive liability to which it is collateral."

There, as here, there is no primary liability on the part of any third person. The candy company, as we have stated, entered into no such contract as is here sued upon, and made no promises such as were made by the defendant in order to induce the plaintiff to purchase shares in the capital stock of the corporation.

The words "guaranty" or "guarantee" do not always import a contract of guaranty. These words are often used in the sense of promise or agree, etc., importing an original obligation on the part of the person executing such contract. 13 Cal. Jur. 87, § 3.

The trial court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $400, being 8 per cent. upon the par value of the certificate issued in the name of the plaintiff. We think the cases which we have cited are controlling here, and that the various decisions cited by appellant, relating to instances where the contract is not original, have no application.

The judgment of the trial court is hereby affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 20, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 17, 1925.)

1. Frauds, statute of ⊂⊃23(4)—Nonsuit properly granted, where cause was based on oral promise to pay for services of physician already employed.

Where, in action to recover for medical services rendered to daughter, the mother and her husband were joined as defendants because former had promised to pay for such services, and it appeared the agreement was not in writing, and was made subsequent to employing physician, held nonsuit on such cause was properly granted; agreement under Civ. Code, § 1624, being void.

2. Account stated ⊂⊃3—Frauds, statute of ⊂⊃23(4)—Failure to reply, on receipt by mother of bills for medical services to daughter, held to create no liability, since her promise was not in writing; attempted account stated can create no liability, where none theretofore existed.

Where medical services were rendered to daughter, and her mother by oral agreement promised to pay therefor, held that failure of mother to reply, upon receipt of two or three bills for the services, created no liability as an account stated, since her promise, not being in writing, was void, and an attempted account stated could not create a liability where there was no legal, existing obligation upon which the account could be stated.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Meurice Swim against Ethel Raye Juhl and others. From an order granting a nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Meurice Swim and Russell P. Tyler, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

David E. Marchus, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued on an assigned claim for medical services alleged to have been rendered the defendant Dorothy E. Bradley. The defendants Ethel Raye Juhl and her husband, Jesse Peter Juhl, were joined, on the theory that the former, who was the mother of Dorothy Bradley, promised to pay for the services rendered her daughter. The Juhls answered, and went to trial before the court sitting without a jury. At the close of plaintiff's case, the court, on motion of these two defendants, granted a nonsuit. The appeal is taken from this order, and is presented on a transcript prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The complaint was framed on two causes of action—one for the reasonable value of the medical services rendered, the other upon an account stated. On this appeal the appellant concedes the correctness of the ruling as to the first cause of action, because, the employment of the physician having been made by the daughter, and the alleged agreement of the mother to pay in case of the daughter's default not having been in writing, and having been made subsequent to the employment, the mother's contract was void because of the provisions of section 1624, Civil Code, commonly referred to as our statute of frauds.

As to the second cause of action, the evidence is that, after the services had been rendered, and after the daughter had been released from the hospital, appellant's assignor sent a bill for his services to Mrs. Bradley, and, receiving no reply from her, sent two or three bills for the same account to Mrs. Juhl. No reply was received from her and upon this fact the appellant bases his claim of an account stated. The appellant's theory is that, conceding the original contract of the mother to answer for her daughter's default to be void because not in writing, her failure to object to the bills when rendered created a new contract, which was not controlled by the statute of frauds. The answer of the respondent is that an account can be stated only when based upon an existing legal obligation, and, the promise of the mother being void because of the statute of frauds, no valid contract could be created by the purported statement of account. The respondents also argue that the question of the reasonableness of the time within which the mother failed to object to the bill was a question of law for the court and that on this appeal we must assume that the court held that a reasonable time had not elapsed.

Appellant relies on Converse v. Scott, 137 Cal. 239, 70 P. 13, and Bennett v. Potter, 180 Cal. 736, 183 P. 156, holding that an account stated may rest in parol when based on an executed contract. Other cases are cited to the point that an account stated becomes a new contract upon which suit may be based without proof of the original contract. But none of these cases holds that the mere failure to object to a bill rendered can ripen into an account stated, where no legal indebtedness existed at the time. We had occasion to consider this same question in Dawson Terminals Co. v. Rosenberg, etc., Co., 63 Cal. App. 489, 491, 218 P. 782. On this subject we adopted the following language from 1 Ruling Case Law, page 215:

"The rule that an account which has been rendered, and to which no objection has been made within a reasonable time, is to be regarded as admitted by the party charged as prima facie correct, assumes that there was some indebtedness between the parties, for there can no liability on an account stated if no liability in fact exists, and the mere presentation of a claim, although not objected to, cannot of itself create a liability."

In Stimson Mill Co. v. Hughes Mfg. Co., 8 Cal. App. 559, 561, 97 P. 322, 323, it was said:

"An account stated must be founded on previous transactions of a monetary character. * * * It cannot be made the instrument to create a liability where none before existed."

In Auzerais v. Naglee, 74 Cal. 60, 67, 15 P. 371, 373, the Supreme Court said:

"An open account already barred by the statute of limitations cannot be relieved from the bar of such statute by an oral statement of such account, for the reason that under our Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 360) no acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract by which to take the case out of the operation of the statute, unless the same is contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby."

[1] There is no essential difference in its application to the question at hand between an obligation barred by the statute of limitations and one void under the statute of frauds. The absence of a writing to answer for the daughter's default rendered the mother's original agreement void, so that there was no legal existing obligation upon which the account could be stated. Though the contract with the daughter for the performance of the services was executed, the contract of the mother to answer for the daughter's default was unexecuted.

[2] As an account stated cannot create a liability where none has theretofore existed (Bennett v. Potter, 180 Cal. 736, 747, 183 P. 156), and as the oral promise of the mother to answer for the default of her daughter was void because not in writing, it follows that the attempt to state an account without any writing on the part of the party sought to be charged did not create any liability enforceable against her.

Order affirmed.

STONE v. CORDUA IRR. DIST.

(Civ. 2881.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 17, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 15, 1925.)

1. Constitutional law ⊜82—Constitutional rights of citizen not abridged unless welfare of public is really and substantially involved.

Constitutional rights of a citizen ought not to be abridged on ground of public policy unless welfare of public is really and substantially involved.

2. Eminent domain ⊜74—Owner of land taken for drainage ditch held entitled to have just compensation made before land taken.

Owner, through whose land drainage ditch had been constructed by irrigation district organized under Irrigation District Act, and amendments thereto without his knowledge or consent and put to public use, held entitled to have just compensation made before his land was taken, in view of Const. art. 1, § 14, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1243, that district might bring an action to condemn a right of way for ditch through his land, and take immediate possession thereof, without any substantial interference with public service in which it is engaged.

3. Eminent domain ⊜308—Injunction decree should have gone no further than to restrain irrigation district from using that part of drainage ditch on owner's land.

Injunction decree should have gone no further than to restrain irrigation district from using that part of drainage ditch on owner's land, where part of judgment from which no appeal was taken restrained district from causing water to overflow owner's lands and no damage thereto would result from use of ditch for such length of time as might be reasonably necessary to enable district to acquire right of way by condemnation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Suit by W. P. Stone against the Cordua Irrigation District for damages caused by overflow of drainage ditch and for an injunction. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant.

Crofton & Wetmore and Frank A. Duryea, all of Marysville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff owns the southwest quarter of section 29, township 16 north, range 4 east, in Yuba county; the land being outside the boundary lines of the defendant district. The defendant is an irrigation district organized under the California Irrigation District Act (Stats. 1897, p. 254, and amendments thereto). Within the district, in section 19 and the sections northerly thereof, rice is raised on 700 acres of land for the irrigation of which water is furnished by defendant. The Southern Pacific Railroad runs in a northeasterly direction and touches the southeast corner of section 19. The natural drainage of the 700 acres of rice land and certain other lands in the district is in a southwesterly direction through a slough which is west of the railroad. Nigger Jack slough runs in a southwesterly direction in a course nearly parallel with and approximately a quarter of a mile east of the railroad. It enters plaintiff's land near the middle of the north boundary thereof, and a short distance southwesterly from the point of entrance it divides into two branches; the east branch crossing plaintiff's south boundary, and the west branch running westerly to a point near the west boundary and thence southerly to about the middle of the west boundary, where it turns again and crosses the west boundary in a southwesterly direction. The two branches unite again below plaintiff's land. His land was leased to tenants, and he resided in the city of Oakland, Cal.

The defendant endeavored to obtain a right of way for a drainage ditch through lands lying south of section 19, but failing to reach an agreement with the owners of such lands, it was determined to construct a drainage ditch along the south boundary line of section 19 to the southeast corner of that section and thence south to Nigger Jack slough. It caused a letter to be mailed to the plaintiff, addressed to Oakland, requesting a right of way through his land; but for some reason it was not delivered to him and was later returned to defendant. In the month of May, 1920, the defendant constructed the proposed drainage ditch, referred to in the judgment as a "drag-line" ditch along the south boundary line of section 19 and through the embankment of the railroad, thence south to the northwest corner of the plaintiff's land, and thence, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, in a southeasterly direction through his land for a distance of about 500 feet to the west branch of Nigger Jack slough. The ditch through plaintiff's land was excavated to a depth of several feet and to a width of about eight feet on the bottom. It followed the course of a smaller ditch which theretofore had drained a county road. During the irrigating seasons of 1920 and 1921 such quantities of water were turned into the ditch as to cause the slough to overflow and damage the crops growing on plaintiff's land. It does not appear when the plaintiff first learned that the ditch had been constructed through his land. It appears, however, that in December, 1921, the plaintiff and the officers of the defendant discussed the question of damages to the land from the overflow and the matter of securing a right of way through it for drainage purposes. The record does not show when this action was commenced, but the amended complaint was filed July 10, 1922.

The judgment awards plaintiff damages for the flooding of his land and enjoins defendant from discharging "any foreign waters" into Nigger Jack slough "so as to cause said Nigger Jack slough, or any of its branches, at or on plaintiff's land to overflow any of the natural and unleveed banks thereof." The defendant has not appealed from the foregoing parts of the judgment, but has appealed from the following provisions thereof:

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant do within thirty days after date of service of a certified copy hereof upon said defendant, effectually and permanently close up that certain opening or siphon constructed by defendant in 1920 through the embankment of the Southern Pacific Railroad, which said opening is a part of the drag-line ditch excavated by defendant along the south line of section 19 * * * to and under said railroad and thence easterly and southerly to the lands of plaintiff hereinafter described, so that no drainage, seepage, or overflow waters shall thereafter be permitted or allowed to flow from the lands west of said railroad through said opening and drag-line ditch to the lands east of said railroad, and so that no drainage, seepage or overflow waters shall thereafter be permitted or allowed to flow from the lands east of said railroad into and through said drag-line ditch to and upon the lands of plaintiff hereinafter described.

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said defendant, its agents, attorneys, servants, and employees, and any and all other persons acting in behalf or aid of said defendant, be and they are and each of them is permanently and forever restrained and enjoined from bringing any drainage, seepage, or overflow waters through or under the embankment of the Southern Pacific Railroad and down the drag-line ditch herein referred to and into Nigger Jack slough or on the lands of the plaintiff hereinafter described."

Appellant contends that respondent "did not prevent the work from being done," and that therefore after the completion of the drainage ditch and its use for the public benefit, "injunction will not be permitted, but respondent will be relegated to his action for damages," citing Crescent Canal Co. v. Montgomery, 143 Cal. 248, 76 P. 1032, 65 L. R. A. 940; Fresno, etc., Co. v. Southern Pac., etc., Co., 135 Cal. 202, 67 P. 773; Southern Cal. R. Co. v. Slauson, 138 Cal. 342, 71 P. 352, 94 Am. St. Rep. 58; Barton v. Riverside Water Co., 155 Cal. 509, 101 P. 790, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331; and Southern Pac. Co. v. Los Angeles Milling Co., 177 Cal. 395, 170 P. 829. In Gurnsey v. Northern Cal. Power Co., 160 Cal. 699, 711, 117 P. 906, 911 (36 L. R. A. [N. S.] 185), it is said:

"The Constitution provides that private property may not be taken for public use unless compensation is first paid to the owner. But this condition of compensation to be first paid is solely for the benefit of the owner of the land and, like any other personal right, may be insisted on by him, or waived at his pleasure. He might, when the defendant corporation commenced the construction of its electric power system over his land, have stood upon his constitutional rights and enjoined its entry until he had been first paid for it, or he could have permitted the defendant to enter thereon and perfect the construction of its system for the public benefit. But when he has thus permitted by inaction expenditures to be made and public interests to intervene, he will be deemed to have waived all other remedies which he might have invoked save that of an action for compensation. This rule is not based so much upon the application of the doctrine of estoppel, * * * so that all remedies save one for compensation will be denied him. It is based mainly on the great principle of public policy under which the rights of the citizen are sometimes abridged in the interest of the public welfare. It is applied in a case such as this, when the plaintiff has stood by, without asserting a right which he might have invoked, until the corporation charged with a service, public in its nature, has completed its electric line over his land, and is actually engaged in discharging a public duty, advantageous and important alike to the social and business interests of the community."

In all the foregoing cases the owners had knowingly stood by while expenditures were being made and their lands appropriated to public uses. The inference from the evidence in the instant case is, not that the plaintiff knowingly stood by and permitted the construction of the ditch through his land, but that he had no knowledge thereof until after the ditch was completed. The question then is whether, in a case such as this, an owner through whose land a ditch has been constructed without his knowledge or consent and put to a public use is to be relegated to an action for damages. It has been said that under such circumstances the landowner may be precluded from maintaining an action of ejectment. Jones on Telegraph and Telephone Companies (2d Ed.) § 53. In Lewis on Eminent Domain (3d Ed.) § 929, it is said:

"Where works have been constructed and are in use, the public interest is sometimes urged as a reason why ejectment should not be sustained. But the individual cannot be deprived of his property for the public convenience, and in any case execution can be stayed to enable the defendant to condemn."

In Winslow v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., 188 U. S. 646, 23 S. Ct. 443, 47 L. Ed. 635, the company had maintained and operated a railroad, performing a public service, over a right of way held by the company from testamentary trustees who had control of the land. After the expiration of the lease, the trustees refused to renew it, and a few years later commenced an action at law to recover possession of the land. The company then brought suit to enjoin the trustees from further prosecuting the action brought by them. A temporary injunction was issued, but was dissolved and the action dismissed. The Supreme Court said:

"The court ought to keep in force for a reasonable time, say six months, that portion of the injunction prohibiting the trustees from continuing their proceeding to dispossess the company from the land, in order to enable it to condemn such land in proper proceedings for that purpose, which cannot be taken in the present suit. If more time is needed, the trial court may upon application, after notice, extend the time as to it may seem reasonably necessary. If no proceedings to condemn are taken within six months from the issuing of the mandate from this court to the court below, then the injunction should be wholly dissolved."

[1, 2] The only ground that can be urged in support of appellant's contention there being no estoppel against or waiver by respondent, is that of public policy. But the constitutional rights of a citizen ought not to be abridged on the ground of public policy unless the welfare of the public is really and substantially involved. The rule of law announced in Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway Co. v. Voigt, 176 U. S. 498, 20 S. Ct. 385, 44 L. Ed. 560, is applicable in principle to the facts of this case. It is there said:

"It must not be forgotten that the right of private contract is no small part of the liberty of the citizen, and that the usual and most important function of courts of justice is rather to maintain and enforce contracts, than to enable parties thereto to escape from their obligation on the pretext of public policy, unless it clearly appear that they contravene public right or the public welfare."

Article 1, § 14, of the Constitution provides:

"Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made to, or paid into court for, the owner, * * * provided, that in an action in eminent domain brought by the state, or a county, or a municipal corporation, or a drainage, irrigation, levee, or reclamation district, the aforesaid state or political subdivision thereof or district may take immediate possession and use of any right of way required for a public use whether the fee thereof or an easement therefor be sought upon first commencing eminent domain proceedings according to law in a court of competent jurisdiction and thereupon giving such security in the way of money deposits as the court in which such proceedings are pending may direct, and in such amounts as the court may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner of the property sought to be taken immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and any damage incident thereto."

It has been held that the foregoing provision authorizing the taking of immediate possession is not in conflict with the federal Constitution. Marblehead Land Co. v. Superior Court, 62 Cal. App. 408, 217 P. 536. See, also, Los Angeles County v. Rindge Co. (Cal. App.) 230 P. 468; Crozier v. Fried. Krupp Aktiengesellschaft, 224 U. S. 290, 32 S. Ct. 488, 56 L. Ed. 771; Adirondack R. Co. v. People of the State of New York, 176 U. S. 335, 20 S. Ct. 460, 44 L. Ed. 492; Sweet v. Rechel, 159 U. S. 380, 16 S. Ct. 43, 40 L. Ed. 188. An action in eminent domain is "commenced by filing a complaint and issuing a summons." Code Civ. Proc. § 1243. It thus appears that the defendant may bring an action to condemn a right of way through the plaintiff's land and take immediate possession thereof, without any substantial interference with the public service in which it is engaged. Under such circumstances, public policy does not require the plaintiff to submit to the abridgment of his constitutional right to have just compensation made or paid into court before his land is taken. For obvious reasons, his right to recover damages for the wrongful taking of his property is less valuable than his constitutional right to have compensation therefor first paid into court.

[3] The injunction, however, is too broad in its terms. It enjoins the defendant from taking water through the embankment of the railroad and thence down the drag-line ditch to Nigger Jack slough. This ditch, without going through the plaintiff's land, could be extended southerly to the west branch of the slough through the lands of other owners lying further west. Also, the defendant may condemn a right of way through the plaintiff's land. In either event it would have the right, as against plaintiff, to discharge drainage water through the opening in the railroad embankment and down the drag-line ditch. The injunction should have gone no further than to restrain the defendant from using that part of the drainage ditch which is upon plaintiff's land. That part of the judgment from which no appeal has been taken restrains the defendant from causing water to overflow upon plaintiff's land. No damage, therefore, to crops growing upon the land will result from the use of the drainage ditch through the land for such length of time as may be reasonably necessary to enable the defendant to acquire a right of way by condemnation.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the parts from which the defendant has appealed, except the description of plaintiff's land contained therein, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said defendant, its agents, attorneys, servants, and employees, and any and all other persons acting in behalf or aid of said defendant, be and they are and each of them is permanently and forever restrained and enjoined from discharging, or causing to flow, any drainage, seepage, or overflow waters into or through that part of defendant's drainage ditch which is upon plaintiff's land, at any time later than 60 days after this judgment shall become final; provided, that nothing herein contained shall preclude the defendant from at any time prosecuting an action to condemn a right of way through plaintiff's land for a drainage ditch."

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed; the respondent to recover his costs on appeal.

1. Trial ⟹397(1)—Failure to find on issue raised both by pleadings and evidence held error.

Where both by pleadings and evidence an issue as to the ownership and removability of certain mechanical appliances was submitted to court, whole question being one of intention, held that parties were entitled to a direct finding on such issue, and failure to so find was error.

2. Trial ⟹395(1)—Findings should be framed so as to enable vanquished party to specify particulars in which findings not supported by evidence.

Trial court's findings should be so framed as to enable vanquished party in litigation to specify intelligibly particulars in which findings are not supported by evidence, where such point is made.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by the Murphy-Cantrell Company, Inc., against James Mulcahy for money had and received, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and against defendant on his cross-complaint, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

John R. Cronin and Clarence A. Grant, both of Stockton, for respondent.

HART, J. This controversy grows out of an agreement of lease between the defendant, as lessor, and George W. Breaw and C. P. Hamm, as lessees, whereby the former leased to the latter certain real property situated in the city of Stockton, and described as the "south half of lots one and three, block east of Center street," of said city. The lease was executed by the parties on the 7th day of January, 1918, and provided that its force should be operative for a term of five years from January 7, 1918, the date of the execution of the agreement. At the time of the execution of the agreement of lease there was no building on the land, but the lease provided that the lessor should erect one thereon according to plans and specifications approved by both the lessor and lessees, the same to be occupied and used as a garage by the latter. The monthly rental to be paid was $160 for the first two years; $165 for the third year; $170 for the fourth; and $175 for the fifth year. Other provisions of the lease were: That the lessees should not assign the lease, nor let or underlet the premises, or allow any alterations therein, without the written consent of the lessor; that the lessees should (and they did) deposit with the lessor the sum of $350, "as security for the performance of the covenants contained in this lease, and in the event that all the covenants on the part of the parties of the second part contained in this lease are performed, then the said sum of $350 shall be applied in payment of the rent due for the last two months under this lease. The party of the first part shall pay to said parties of the second part four per cent. per annum as interest on said sum of $350 at the end of the 58th month of this lease. If any rent shall be due or unpaid, or if default shall be made in any of the covenants herein contained, then it shall be lawful for the party of the first part to re-enter upon said premises and remove all parties therefrom."

Said lease and all the rights of the lessees were, shortly after the execution of the agreement, transferred and assigned by them to the plaintiff.

The object of this action is to recover from the defendant the sum of $350, deposited by the original lessees with the defendant, as above explained, and to recover the further sum of $80, representing one-half of the rental paid defendant by plaintiff for the use and occupation of the premises for and during the month of May, 1919.

The complaint is in two counts. In the first it is alleged that the original lessees, at the time they transferred and assigned the lease to the plaintiff, also assigned, for and in consideration of the payment by the latter of the sum of $350 to them, the said sum of $350 deposited with the defendant upon the execution of the lease upon the conditions above indicated. It is alleged in said count that the assignment of the lease was with the express consent of the defendant. In the second count it is further alleged that, on the 1st day of May, 1919, while in possession of the premises under said lease, plaintiff paid to defendant, as rent for said month, the sum of $160, upon the following understanding and agreement with defendant:

That "if plaintiff did not occupy said premises during the whole of said month, he, the defendant, would refund to plaintiff a sum proportionate to that part of said month that plaintiff did not occupy said premises, and for which plaintiff had been paid; that plaintiff, with the consent of defendant, terminated said lease on the 15th day of May, 1919, and did not occupy the premises after said 15th day of May, 1919; that according to the aforesaid agreement there became due plaintiff at said time a refund of $80 upon said month's rent; that plaintiff has demanded said sum of $80 from defendant, but defendant still refuses to pay said sum to plaintiff."

The answer denies all the material averments of both counts of the complaint, and alleges that the lease was assigned to plaintiff by Breaw and Hamm without the written or any consent of defendant; that said Breaw and Hamm, on or about the 14th day of October, 1918, wrongfully and without defendant's knowledge or consent removed from said premises, and "thereafter refused to pay defendant the rental of said premises for the balance of their said term of lease ending on the 7th day of January, 1923, * * *" and "forfeited all moneys theretofore paid by them thereunder, including said $350 mentioned in plaintiff's amended complaint, and that defendant thereupon, as soon as he discovered such breach on the part of said Breaw and Hamm, declared said lease forfeited on the part of said lessees, together with the said sum of $350, which had been deposited with him as security for the full performance of said lease on their part"; that plaintiff entered into the possession of said premises without the knowledge or consent of defendant, and any lease or right to such possession, and that, upon learning that plaintiff had taken such possession, defendant demanded that it remove from said premises forthwith, "or execute a written lease to defendant for a period equal to the balance of time which the said forfeited lease to Breaw and Hamm called for; that plaintiff then and there evaded giving defendant a direct answer to his demand, and replied that the managers of said corporation would see their attorneys, and then give defendant a final answer in a short time; and that, after a delay of about eight months, said managers notified defendant that plaintiff would take no lease of said premises from him, and that defendant thereupon ordered plaintiff to remove from said premises at the expiration of the current month for which rent was paid." It was denied that on the 15th day of May, 1919, "or before the expiration of said lease or at any other or different time, the plaintiff, with consent of defendant, or otherwise, terminated said lease between him and the said Breaw and Hamm," but, as to this, the answer alleged that plaintiff was without right, power, or authority to terminate said lease, "as it was not a party thereto," etc.

By cross-complaint defendant alleged that he was damaged in the sum of $2,195 by reason of the alleged wrongful removal by plaintiff from the building of certain machinery, fixtures, and appliances, "which formed part of said garage building, and which were rigidly attached thereto by bolts, nails, and screws," and also by causing to be destroyed the enamel on the walls of the showroom, and by soaking the floor thereof and the walls of the entire building with grease and oil.

The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, denying all the allegations thereof, except those as to defendant's ownership of the premises referred to in the lease, the execution of the lease, and the taking from the premises the machinery, all of which were admitted, alleging, however, that it was the owner of said machinery, fixtures, etc.

The court found in favor of the plaintiff on its first cause of action for the sum of $175; found against the plaintiff on its second cause of action; and against defendant on his cross-complaint.

Judgment passed accordingly, and the defendant appeals, contending: That certain material findings are without evidentiary support; that certain findings "are contradictory to the admissions in the pleadings"; and that there was a failure to find on a material issue.

[1] There is a failure to find upon the issue made by the cross-complaint and answer thereto as to the ownership of the fixtures or mechanical appliances installed in the building while it was in the course of erection, or, in other words, upon the question whether the intention of the parties, at the time the said mechanical appliances were installed, was or was not that they were to become a permanent part of the building, or, more accurately speaking, a part of the freehold. The machinery and other appliances referred to constituted those articles of machinery and other appliances which are necessary to the prosecution of a garage and an auto repair business. This was the business for the carrying on of which the original lessees leased the building. The building was, in fact, erected for that special purpose. The fixtures consisted of a small motor, an air pump, drills, shafting, apparatus for electric lights, and many other pieces of mechanical contrivances which, as before stated, are commonly and necessarily used in the carrying on of such a business as the building was designed for, as indicated above.

The defendant testified that, while the original lessees furnished, at their own expense, said machinery and appliances, he performed the work of installing them in the building, and this he did as the building was in course of construction. He also testified that, at the very time the mechanical and other appliances were being installed, he stated to the original lessees that he desired that it should be understood between them that said fixtures should not be removed, but should remain as a permanent part of the building, and that to this proposition said lessees agreed by saying, "All right." He further testified that the appliances, or the greater part of them, were rigidly or firmly affixed to the building by means of bolts, nails, and screws. The plaintiff's manager, L. B. Murphy, testified that there was but one of the several different pieces of the mechanical appliances attached to the building, and that was the shafting. Thus there arose and exists a conflict in the testimony on the question whether the fixtures were or were not affixed to the building. The fact, however, that the fixtures might have been attached to the building by means of nails, or bolts, or screws, or wire, does not necessarily force the conclusion that it was the intention of the parties that they should become a part of the freehold, but is important because it may well be considered as some evidence of such intention, while the fact that they were not so attached might be considered as some evidence that such was not the intention. In either case, its weight would be determined by the light of other facts or circumstances tending to support either conclusion. Thus it is not only clear that the pleadings present an issue upon the question whether it was or was not the intention of the parties that the fixtures or appliances should become a permanent part of the building and consequently a part of the freehold, but equally clear that evidence, pro and con, was introduced upon that issue. In other words, and briefly, both by the pleadings and the evidence an issue as to the ownership of said mechanical appliances was submitted to the court for decision, and a clear, unequivocal and direct finding upon that issue should have been made.

The only reference to be found in the findings to that issue is the following:

"It is not true that the plaintiff wrongfully and unlawfully removed from said premises, or removed at all, any machinery, fixtures, appliances, or anything else from said garage that it did not have a legal right to do."

[2] The foregoing is rather a conclusion of law than a finding of fact; but, treating it as an attempt to find upon the question whether the parties intended the fixtures to become a permanent part of the building, it wholly fails to reach the mark. No fact was found which supports the conclusion, as thus declared, that the plaintiff "removed any machinery, fixtures, appliances, or anything else from said garage that it did not have a legal right to remove." If, as the testimony of defendant tends to show, there was an agreement between him and the original lessees, that said fixtures were to become a part of and so not to be removed from the building at the expiration of the term of the lease by said lessees or any one succeeding to their rights under the lease, then, obviously, the plaintiff had no right to remove the fixtures. As stated above, however, the whole question was one as to the intention of the parties, and, as also stated, the defendant was entitled to a direct and specific finding upon the question of such intention. This is true, because findings should be so framed as to enable the vanquished party in the litigation to specify intelligibly the particulars in which such findings are not supported by the evidence, where such point is made. The purported finding here, if a finding at all, does not measure up to this test.

The judgment is reversed.

NASON et al. v. SHINJO et al. (Civ. 2958.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 6, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 2, 1925.)

Appeal and error ⇐110—Order granting motion for new trial not appealable, where case was tried by court without jury.

Order granting motion for new trial is not appealable, where case was tried by court without jury, Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2, providing that an appeal lies from an order granting new trial only "in an action or proceeding tried by a jury where such trial by jury is matter of right," and section 663a is inapplicable, providing only for appeal, from orders granting motions authorized by section 663, to set aside or vacate judgments.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by W. R. Nason and another against Harry M. Shinjo and another. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, and from order granting defendants new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Appeal dismissed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellants.

LaFayette J. Smallpage, of Stockton, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal herein. The case was tried before the court without a jury and judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for a sum alleged to be due under a lease. On motion of one of the defendants the court ordered a new trial. From this order the plaintiff has appealed. The motion to dismiss is made upon the ground that the order is not appealable. An appeal lies from an order granting a new trial only "in an action or proceeding tried by a jury where such trial by jury is a matter of right." Code Civ. Proc., § 963, subd. 2; Estate of Waters, 181 Cal. 584, 586, 185 P. 951; In re Baird's Estate (Cal. Sup.) 231 P. 744; McGoldrick v. Visalia Midway Oil Co., 58 Cal. App. 280, 208 P. 334.

Appellant relies upon section 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides for an appeal from an order granting a motion, authorized by section 663, to set aside and vacate a judgment "based upon findings of fact made by the court, or the special verdict of a jury" and to enter "another and different judgment." The motion here in question was not of the character mentioned in that section, but it was a motion for a new trial.

The appeal is dismissed.

FRESNO COUNTY v. SHAW, Recorder of the City of Coalinga. (Civ. 5158.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 20, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 19, 1925.)

Fines ⊂=20—Fines collected by city recorder in proceedings for violations of state law to be paid to county treasurer; "justice's court."

City recorder of city of sixth class, when exercising jurisdiction in proceedings based on violations of state laws, is acting as justice of peace presiding in "justice's court," and not as a city justice's court, which, under Code Civ. Proc. § 103, is restricted to cities of first to fourth classes, and under Pen. Code, §§ 1457 and 1570, all fines collected must be paid to county treasurer; there being nothing in Pen. Code, § 1461, to the contrary.

KNIGHT, J. This proceeding in mandamus was commenced by the county of Fresno to compel the defendant, A. J. Shaw, as the former city recorder of the city of Coalinga, to pay over to the treasury of said county certain fines imposed and collected by him for violations of state statutes.

The city of Coalinga, in Fresno county, is a municipal corporation of the sixth class organized under the Municipal Corporation Act. It maintains a city recorder's court. It is conceded that the entire salary of this office is paid by the city of Coalinga. By statute this court has concurrent jurisdiction with the justice's court of all actions and proceedings, civil and criminal, arising within the corporate limits of said city. The defendant, A. J. Shaw, formerly held the position of city recorder, and as such has collected fines for violations of the state law. Although no longer occupying the position, he still retains in his custody a certain aggregate sum collected by him as fines for violations of state law. He has refused to pay this sum into the treasury of the county of Fresno, and threatens to pay the same into the treasury of the city of Coalinga. This proceeding was instituted to require him to pay said sum to the county

The solution of the questions presented involves the proper construction to be given to sections 1457 and 1570 of the Penal Code. Those sections, in connection with section 1461 of the same Code, were interpreted by the Supreme Court in the case of Prince v. City of Fresno, 88 Cal. 407, 26 P. 606, and the precise question raised here was decided there. Since the decision in that case was rendered, however, certain statutory changes have been made which it is claimed overcome the effect of that decision so that it no longer controls.

At the time of the rendition of said decision section 1457 of said Code provided:

"Upon payment of the fine, the officer must discharge the defendant, if he is not detained for any other legal cause, and apply the money to the payment of the expenses of the prosecution, and pay over the residue, if any, within ten days, to the county or city treasurer, according as the offense is prosecuted in a justice's or police court. If a fine is imposed, and paid before commitment, it must be applied as prescribed in this section."

Section 1461 provided:

"The term 'police courts,' as used in this and the succeeding chapter, includes police judges' courts, police courts, and all courts held by mayors or recorders in incorporated cities or towns."

Likewise, at the same time, section 1570 provided:

"All fines and forfeitures collected in any court, except police courts, must be applied to the payment of the costs of the case in which the fine is imposed, or the forfeiture incurred; and after such costs are paid, the residue must be paid to the county treasurer of the county in which the court is held."

The case above referred to was one brought by the recorder of the city of Fresno; that city being then one of the fifth class. The plaintiff, Prince, presented to the city of Fresno a bill for his fees in cases where fines were collected for violations of a state law. The city refused to pay, and this action followed. The county of Fresno intervened, setting up that, if it were determined that the city was not liable, then the county would be, and that the fines collected by the recorder for violations of the state laws should be paid to the county treasury. The county accordingly prayed that all of the questions raised by the facts which were stipulated be determined by the court. After trial, the court gave judgment that the plaintiff, Prince, pay over to the treasurer of the county of Fresno the fines collected for violations of state laws, and, further, that the county of Fresno pay to the plaintiff for services rendered in cases of violation of state law the same fees and compensation as are allowed by law to justices of the peace in like cases.

The Supreme Court, after noting the provisions of sections 806 and 807 of the Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 93), and that concurrent jurisdiction of the recorder's court with justice's court and certain powers of the recorder's court, stated that the main question for determination was whether as to all criminal matters under the Penal Code the action of the recorder is that of a justice of the peace or not. The court then declared that a recorder of a city may have a dual jurisdiction and functions, and may be a justice of the peace as to certain matters and a recorder as to others; that the law under consideration conferred this jurisdiction; and that as to such matters as are given him in charge as a justice of the peace the recorder is such an officer, and not a police judge. The court further declared that, if the recorder imposed fines as a justice of the peace, and not as police judge, such fines by law were subject to be paid over to the county treasurer under section 1570 of the Penal Code, after payment of costs, etc.; and he was entitled to charge and receive from the county for his services such fees as were allowed by law to justices of the peace for like services; and the fines imposed by him were subject to the same disposition as if he had imposed them as such justice of the peace. The judgment was thereupon affirmed.

Since that case was decided, section 1461 of the Penal Code defining police courts has not been changed. Nor has there been any substantial change in those provisions of the Municipal Corporation Act which conferred concurrent jurisdiction upon the recorder's court and under which it was held in the Prince Case that the recorder, when sitting in a criminal prosecution for a violation of a state law, was acting as a justice of the peace and not as a police judge, and that his court was not in such cases a police court.

In 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 88) section 1457 of the Penal Code was amended to provide that the fine should be paid "to the county or city treasurer, according as the offense is prosecuted for the violation of a state law or a city ordinance, whether in the justice's court or police court." Likewise at the same time and by the same statute section 1570 of the Penal Code was amended to add a proviso thereto requiring "all forfeitures and fines collected in any court for the violation of any city ordinance shall be paid to the city treasurer of the city in which such ordinance is in force."

It is evident that neither of these changes in any way affected the question, and that the fines would continue to be paid as required by the decision in the Prince Case.

In 1905 (Stats. 1905, pp. 176 and 177) sections 1457 and 1570 of the Penal Code were amended to their present reading, as follows:

"1457. Upon payment of the fine, the officer must discharge the defendant, if he is not detained for any other legal cause, and pay over the fine within ten days to county treasurer if the offense is prosecuted for the violation of a state law in a justice's court; provided that all fines and forfeitures collected in any police court or city justice's court that is maintained, and the salaries of the officers thereof paid by the city, whether prosecuted for a violation of a state law or a city ordinance shall be paid to the city treasurer of the city in which such court is located; and further provided that all fines and forfeitures collected for the violation of a city or town ordinance, in a justice's court shall be paid over to the city or town treasurer of the city or town in which such ordinance is in force, subject, however, to the provisions of chapter I of title XV of part I of this Code."

"1570. All fines and forfeitures collected in any court, except police courts and city justice's courts, must be paid to the county treasurer of the county in which the court is held; provided, that all forfeitures and fines collected in any court, for the violation of any city or town ordinance shall be paid to the city or town treasurer of the city or town in which such ordinance is in force; and further provided, that all fines and forfeitures collected in any police court or city justice's court that is maintained, and the salaries of the officers

It will be noted that, notwithstanding said amendments, section 1457 still plainly provides that fines shall be paid to the county treasurer, "if the offense is prosecuted for a violation of a state law in a justice's court"; and that section 1570 still declares with equal clearness that all fines collected "in any court, except police courts and city justice's courts, must be paid to the county treasurer." Inasmuch as the recorder, when exercising jurisdiction in proceedings based upon violations of state law, is, under the Prince Case, acting as justice of the peace, and not as recorder or police judge, it would necessarily follow that the forum in which he is then presiding must be regarded as a justice's court and not as either a recorder's or a police court. Consequently, applying the portions of section 1457 above quoted, all fines collected while so presiding must be paid to the county treasurer, as "the offense is prosecuted for a violation of a state law in a justice's court." The tribunal in which he presides when acting in state cases cannot be regarded as a "city justice's court," as that term is employed in said section 1570, for the reason that "city justice's courts" do not exist in cities of the fifth and sixth classes; the establishment of those courts being restricted to cities of the first to the fourth classes exclusively. Code Civ. Proc. § 103. And defendant's position is not strengthened by the provisos added to said sections 1457 and 1570, by the amendments of 1905, to the effect "that all fines and forfeitures collected in any police court or city justice's court that is maintained, and the salaries of the officers thereof paid, by the city, whether presecuted for a violation of a state law or a city ordinance shall be paid to the city treasurer of the city in which said court is located," for the reason that the language employed in said provisos, designating the court which may retain fines and forfeitures for the use of the municipality, is no broader in its terms than the language used in the fore part of those sections, which, as we have seen, specify only "police courts or city justice's courts"; and, according to the Prince Case, the recorder's court is neither, when dealing with state cases.

True, all violations of state laws must, of necessity, under the ruling in the Prince Case, be had before one sitting as justice of the peace and not as police judge; but such fact does not totally destroy the usefulness of the provisos added by the amendments of 1905, for the reason that the said provisos are still operative in cities of higher classifications; the law having made distinct provision for police courts and city justice's courts in cities of such higher classifications. Neither can it be said that the construction herein placed upon said sections ignores the provisions of section 1461 of the Penal Code, which declares that the term " police courts" includes courts held by recorders in incorporated cities and towns, because this section, in its present form, was also under consideration in the Prince Case, and it was there held, as already stated, that the term "police courts" applied to courts held by recorders only when prosecutions are had for offenses over which the recorder has jurisdiction as recorder, and not when the offense is one in reference to which the recorder would act as justice of the peace.

For the reasons stated, we think it obvious that, even though, as defendant contends, the purpose of said amendments was to avoid the objections pointed out in the Prince Case, said amendments were couched in terms which wholly failed to accomplish the object sought. We are therefore of the opinion that the law of the Prince Case, in the present situation, is still controlling.

Let the writ issue as prayed.

KNIGHT, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus, instituted by the city of Coalinga, to require the defendant, former recorder of said city, to pay over to the city treasury certain fines for violations of state laws, collected by defendant while acting in his official capacity. The county of Fresno, which includes the city of Coalinga, also made claim to said fines, and instituted a similar proceeding against the defendant herein to require him to pay said fines into the county treasury. County of Fresno v. Shaw (No. 5158) 237 P. 560. We have this day decided the latter proceeding in favor of said county of Fresno, and have therein discussed and decided all of the questions involved in the instant proceeding. For the reasons stated in the opinion rendered in that case, the petition for the writ in this proceeding must be denied, and it is so ordered.

Estoppel ⊂⊃90(1)—Conduct of son, after father's gift to son of interest in business, held to warrant finding that son was estopped from securing accounting.

Conduct of son, to whom father made gift of two-thirds interest in his business, in acquiescing in father's continued control and management thereof for more than two years thereafter, held to warrant finding that son was estopped from securing accounting from date of gift until receiver took possession, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Charles Fauda against C. O. Fauda. Judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Crook, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CABANISS, Justice pro tem. Appellant brought action for an accounting. Judgment having gone against him, he moved for a new trial, and appealed from an order denying the motion.

A somewhat extended history of the general business dealings between the parties must be given to make clear the issue involved, and later to be determined.

For many years prior to February 2, 1917, respondent owned and operated a drug store known as the C. O. Fauda Pharmacy, and appellant (respondent's son) and Eugenio Fauda (respondent's brother) were employed therein as salaried clerks and pharmacists under respondent's direction. During this period the general conduct and management of the business, including the purchase of store stock, banking of moneys received from sales, and drawing of checks against the bank funds, was in the respondent.

On the date mentioned (February 2, 1917) respondent executed to appellant a bill of sale transferring a two-thirds interest in the drug store and business, good will, business name, leasehold interest, and stock in trade; and at the same time, and in like manner, transferred to Eugenio Fauda the remaining one-third interest. Notwithstanding the form of these instruments, it is admitted that they were without valuable consideration, and that the transferees acquired their respective interests as gifts. The gift to appellant was absolute and unconditioned, and that to the brother, Eugenio, to become operative only upon respondent's death.

The circumstances attending the execution of the bills of sale and deeds to appellant make it apparent that the impending second marriage of respondent and his desire to safeguard appellant's financial interests in the event of respondent's death were the immediately inducing motives impelling the making of these instruments—a fact within appellant's knowledge from the very outset. It is here also noted that the making of the partnership agreement between appellant and Eugenio Fauda, and herein later to be mentioned, was suggested by respondent.

Immediately upon the execution of the bills of sale appellant and Eugenio Fauda executed an agreement, by the terms of which they became copartners in the business and property given them by respondent; appellant contributing to the partnership his two-thirds interest and Eugenio Fauda his one-third interest. The agreement also provided that during the partnership period books be kept, showing money received, paid, and expended, and goods bought and sold by the partners, and "all other matters and things whatsoever to the said business and management thereof in any wise belonging." The agreement further provided that annually or oftener, if desired by either partner, an inventory and accounting be made, showing the state of the business, etc.

For more than two years immediately following execution of the bills of sale and partnership agreement respondent, exactly as theretofore, retained the management and control of the store, in a proprietary way, with the tacit sanction of appellant and Eugenio Fauda, both of whom continued to serve in the place as clerks and pharmacists. For these services they were paid salaries slightly in excess of those received prior to the making of the bills of sale. Respondent, contemporaneously with the bills of sale transaction, also executed to appellant a gift deed to several parcels of land; the donor, however, reserving (dehors the deed) a revocatory right, exercisable at his pleasure. The land thus transferred was mortgaged to secure a bank loan made to respondent, and from time to time following the bills of sale and deed transactions respondent, with appellant's knowledge, drew money from the store funds with which to make payment upon the debts secured by the mortgage, and in several instances appellant received these payments directly from respondent, and personally made them to the bank. At all times prior to February 2, 1917, respondent, then the absolute owner of the store, kept its books, and continued to do so until his retirement from the place. Respondent's system of bookkeeping, if "system" it may be called, was most informal, and from the entries recorded it would be quite impossible for any one, with the possible exception of the bookkeeper, to get a clear or at all satisfactory understanding of the state of the business, profit, or loss resulting from its operation, etc. This comment applies to the books as kept both before and following the signing of the bills of sale, as no change of bookkeeping methods was made during the latter period. The books were available to appellant and Eugenio Fauda, and were inspected by them, nor did either ever suggest to respondent a change in the bookkeeping system. The relation of the parties to this action and Eugenio Fauda toward themselves and the business remained uninterruptedly as before stated, until on or about June 20, 1919. Shortly before that date serious differences arose between the wife of plaintiff and appellant's stepmother (respondent's second wife), which incidentally marred the affectionate family relations previously existing between father and son.

At the time last mentioned respondent revoked the deeds to appellant, who then for the first time asserted his right under the bill of sale by demanding the immediate possession and control of the store as against respondent. The respondent thereupon brought suit against appellant, alleging in his complaint that it was the purpose and intention of the parties to the bill of sale that it be made revocable at respondent's will, and the prayer was for judgment accordingly. By way of defense of said action appellant alleged that the bill of sale became effective upon its execution, and transferred absolute title to him and the court so found, but appellant did not therein seek an accounting. In the action last mentioned a receiver was appointed by both parties. The respondent surrendered possession to the receiver on or about June 1, 1919, and the instant action seeks an accounting as to moneys received by respondent from the date of execution of bills of sale, March 2, 1917, until the receiver entered into possession of the store.

The trial court, basing its action upon the facts above presented, found that appellant was estopped from securing an accounting, and the action of the court in this behalf is urged by appellant as error.

If upon receiving bill of sale and real property deed appellant had actually said in effect to respondent, "Father, as you have shown your paternal solicitude by protecting me against the possible loss of my patrimony, I therefore suggest that you practically retain management and ownership of the store during your lifetime or until such time as I may avail myself of my rights of ownership," and this invitation had been accepted by respondent, surely in such case appellant would be estopped from maintaining an action for accounting. It may well be that the learned trial judge was of the opinion, as well he may have been, that appellant by his acts, conduct, and omissions as above shown had to all intents and purposes spoken the equivalent of the words quoted. In view of the close blood tie between the parties, and under all the circumstances, respondent may well have taken for granted that his possession and management of the store and right to retain store money as his own had been conceded to him by appellant. All the more would he seem to have been warranted in acting upon this assumption because of the omission of the son to exercise acts of ownership or otherwise demean himself as he would have done had it been his purpose to claim the proceeds of the business. In this connection may be instanced appellant's absolute noninterference with the management of the business, his omission to install a bookkeeping system which would show the state of the business and make possible a determination of the profits to be periodically ascertained and paid over to himself and Eugenio Fauda, pursuant to the provisions of their partnership arrangement.

Inasmuch as appellant in his brief stresses the making of the partnership agreement between appellant and Eugenio Fauda as a circumstance tending to support appellant's contention, our only comment is that the execution of the document in the light of all the facts and circumstances does not make against respondent's estoppel contention, but, on the contrary, tends to support it. The partnership agreement, though executed in the sense of having been formally drafted and signed, was to all intents merely executory, in that neither party to the agreement performed or sought to do so under it as they would have done, and especially in the matter of determining profits or losses, had it been their purpose to exercise their rights conferred by the bills of sale. In brief, by reason of the conduct of appellant, respondent was caused to believe, as appellant must well have known he would be, that he (respondent) was to continue to stand for the time being, and until appellant asserted ownership, in the same relation to the store and profits arising therefrom as prior to the bill of sale transfer. This, we think, warranted the trial court in supporting respondent's estoppel plea. The facts of this case bring it clearly within the estoppel rule announced in subdivision 3, section 1962, Code of Civil Procedure, which is as follows:

"The following presumptions, and no others, are deemed conclusive: * * * 3. Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it."

In the few lines of this citation we find the quintessence of an ethical rule old as civilized man's conception of fair dealing and natural equity, and applied in innumerable cases.

As what has been said herein is determinative of this appeal, we will but mention another defense interposed by defendant, namely, that the parties hereto had adjusted all accounts and their business differences generally; and further say in this connection that the finding of the lower court supporting this defense is sustained by the evidence. We forbear discussing this phase of the matter at length only because the point already determined herein seems to us absolutely decisive of this appeal.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment and order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. Appellant's petition to have the above-entitled cause heard and determined by this court after judgment in the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 2, is denied.

We are not satisfied that the evidence in this case is sufficient to sustain the defense of estoppel, but, upon an examination of the record, we are of the opinion that the evidence is not legally insufficient to sustain the finding that prior to the commencement of this action the parties hereto had adjusted their accounts and differences.

LIBBY v. DUNSTON. (Civ. 4373.)

Trial ⊜260(1) — Requested instructions on propositions covered by instructions already given will be refused.

Requested instructions, though applicable to evidence, on propositions covered by instructions already given, will be refused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by W. R. Libby against John Dunston. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edgar L. Martin and E. B. Drake, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained in an automobile collision, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in said action. The appellant requested the trial court to instruct the jury as follows:

"You are instructed that, if you shall find from the testimony that prior to the time of the collision the defendant had been driving and operating his automobile in an ordinarily careful and prudent manner, and with due regard to the regulations governing speed and care in the operation of an automobile, and that prior to the collision, and without fault or negligence on his part, a stranger, driving by, crowded him off the pavement, and that it was necessary, or apparently necessary, for him to leave the pavement in order to protect himself, and that, after having left the pavement he continued to operate his automobile in a careful and prudent manner, but that, because of having been crowded off the pavement, if you should find he had been so crowded, and because of mud on his tires, if you should find there was mud on his tires, he was caused to skid, then I instruct you that the defendant would not be guilty of negligence, and you should so find by your verdict, and, if he was not thus guilty of negligence, then your verdict should be for the defendant."

The court refused to give this instruction, and the sole point made by appellant on this appeal is that the court erred in so refusing to instruct the jury and that such error was so prejudicial of appellant's rights that he is entitled to a new trial.

We will assume for the sake of argument, but without deciding, that the foregoing proposed instruction was justified by evidence properly admitted in the case and that it is free from all other legal objections. The instructions given by the court in the action appear to have fully and correctly covered all essential elements and issues in the case. Appellant has not indicated any issue of law raised either by the pleadings or the testimony upon which the court failed to instruct the jury fully. His sole contention is that he had the right to have an instruction given to the jury, based upon his own theory of the case, provided there was any evidence to support it. With this contention we agree, but this right has been accorded to him, in our opinion, when the court instructed the jury upon all questions of law arising at the trial. Appellant has cited in support of his contention the following cases from the Supreme Court of California: Carpenter v. Ewing, 76 Cal. 487, 18 P. 432; Hunt v. Elliott, 77 Cal. 589, 20 P. 132; Goodwin v. Mc-

Cabe, 75 Cal. 584, 17 P. 705; Buckley v. Silverberg, 113 Cal. 673, 45 P. 804. We think from an examination of these cases that they do not support the position of appellant. The following excerpt from the decision of Swensen v. Bender, 114 F. 1, 9, 51 C. C. A. 627, 635, states in apt language the true rule:

"The general rule with respect to this matter is well settled that instructions on points which have been sufficiently covered by other instructions may properly be refused, although they are correctly drawn and applicable to the evidence. This is so, whether the instructions requested are covered by the general charge, or whether the mode of expression is the same or different. The duty of the court is fully discharged if the instructions embrace all the points of the law arising in the case, in the court's own language."

Judgment affirmed.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.

NAY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF NAPA COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2993.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 27, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 22, 1925.)

Justices of the peace ⇐155(1)—Right to notice of judgment waived by giving notice of appeal, and second notice of appeal ineffectual.

In view of Civ. Code, § 3513, as to waiver of advantage of law, right, under Code Civ. Proc. § 893, of party to action in justice court to written notice of rendition of judgment, was waived by his giving notice of appeal, which section 974 requires within 30 days after notice of judgment, so that his second notice of appeal, given more than 30 days thereafter, was ineffective, and this though first appeal was dismissed by superior court.

Application by H. L. Nay for writ of mandate to the Superior Court of Napa county and another. Writ denied.

W. F. Cowan and A. W. Hollingsworth, both of Santa Rosa, for petitioner.

Wallace Rutherford, of Napa, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This matter is before the court upon petitioner's application for a writ of mandate, commanding the superior court of Napa county and Hon. Percy S. King, as judge thereof, to vacate an order dismissing an appeal by the petitioner, taken by him from a judgment entered in the justice's court of Hot Springs township, in the county of Napa, wherein L. S. Mitchell was plaintiff and N. R. Fowler and the petitioner, H. L. Nay, were defendants.

The facts, as they appear in the pleadings, so far as necessary to be considered in the determination of petitioner's application, are as follows: On the 2d day of December, 1924, after a trial had been had in the above-entitled justice's court, in the foregoing entitled action pending therein, judgment was rendered and entered against the petitioner; thereafter, and on the said 2d day of December, 1924, the petitioner, H. L. Nay, defendant in said action, filed in said justice's court, with the justice of the peace thereof, a notice of appeal to the superior court of the county of Napa, from the judgment then and there rendered and entered against him. Said notice of appeal is in the following words and figures, to-wit:

"[Title of Court and Cause.] Take notice that the defendant H. L. Nay in the above-entitled action hereby appeals to the superior court of the county of Napa from the judgment therein made and entered in the said justice's court, on the 2d day of December, 1924, in favor of said defendant and against said and from the whole of said judgment. This appeal is taken on questions of law and fact both law and fact.

"Yours, etc., A. W. Hollingsworth,
"Attorney for Appellant.

"To the Justice of said Justice's Court, and ——, Esq., Attorney for Respondent.

"Dated December 2, 1924."

On the same day an undertaking was filed in the sum of $100 to cover costs of such appeal. Within due time thereafter, all the records, papers, and files in said action were transmitted by the justice of the peace of said justice's court to the clerk of the superior court of the county of Napa, and were filed by him as records of said superior court. Thereafter, and on the 16th day of February, 1925, upon motion of the plaintiff in said action, upon good and sufficient grounds which we need not consider, the superior court of the county of Napa entered its order dismissing said appeal. That thereafter, and on the 16th day of February, 1925, the petitioner in this case filed a second notice of appeal in the justice's court of Hot Springs township, in the county of Napa, in said action, which notice of appeal is as follows:

"[Title of Court and Cause.] To the Justice of said Justice's Court and said Plaintiff and his Attorney:

"You will please take notice that the defendant H. L. Nay in the above-entitled action, hereby appeals to the superior court of the county of Napa from the judgment therein made and entered in the said justice's court on the 2d day of December, 1924, in favor of said plaintiff and against said defendant, and from the whole of said judgment.

"This appeal is taken on both questions of law and fact.

"Dated February 16th, 1925.

"A. W. Hollingsworth,
"Attorney for Appellant."

And at the same time filed an undertaking to cover costs of appeal. That thereafter, and within five days, all the records and files of said cause were again transmitted by the justice of the peace of said justice court to the clerk of the superior court of Napa county, which attempted appeal was, after motion duly made therefor on the 16th day of March, 1925, dismissed by the said superior court of the county of Napa.

No question is made herein as to the order of the superior court, in relation to the dismissal of petitioner's appeal dated February 16, 1925. The attack is directed as to the second order of dismissal. In the consideration of this order, only one question is involved, to wit: The fact that the justice of the peace of Hot Springs township did not execute and deliver to or serve upon the petitioner a written notice of the judgment made and entered by him in the case of Mitchell v. Fowler and the petitioner herein, and therefore that the petitioner was within the time allowed by law in filing his second notice of appeal.

The petitioner relies upon section 893 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, so far as this matter is concerned, reads:

"Notice of the rendition of judgment must be given to the parties to the action in writing signed by the justice. * * * Said notice shall be served by mail or personally, and shall be substantially in the form of the abstract of judgment required in section eight hundred and ninety-seven of this Code," —and also upon section 974 of the same Code, which gives to any party dissatisfied with a judgment rendered in a civil action in the justice's court 30 days after notice of the rendition of judgment within which to appeal. The answer to this contention is found in the action of the petitioner, which, we think, conclusively shows a waiver of the right to be notified in writing by the justice of the peace of the judgment entered against him. Section 3513 of the Civil Code reads:

"Any one may waive the advantage of a law intended solely for his benefit. But a law established for a public reason cannot be contravened by a private agreement."

We do not think it necessary to go into an extended discussion of why the Legislature provided for the giving of written notice further than to say that it was evidently for the purpose of preventing any one from being deprived of the rights given him by the Codes, which might be exercised by the dissatisfied party, after the entry of the judgment, and that there should be a definite record that the dissatisfied party had notice of the entry of such judgment, and that it was incumbent upon him to exercise the rights given him by the Codes within a definite period thereafter.

The filing of a notice of appeal constitutes a written acknowledgment on the part of the appellant that he has notice of the judgment entered against him. In this case the petitioner, immediately after the rendition of the judgment referred to, filed his notice of appeal, which certainly obviated and waived the necessity of the justice of the peace thereafter, and within five days, serving written notice upon him of the entry of the judgment from which he had already appealed.

This very question has been recently decided by the Supreme Court of this state in Hughes v. DeMund, 233 P. 94. The court was there considering the question of the running of time for the performance of a certain act, and used the following language:

"No notice of the entry of judgment is shown to have been given, but the filing by defendant of a notice of appeal on April 2, was the equivalent thereof for the purpose of starting this time running. Fighiera v. Dewhirst, 32 Cal. App. 245, 162 P. 655; Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 356, 359, 61 P. 1123; Timmons v. Coonley, 39 Cal. App. 35, 179 P. 429."

It has been decided a number of times that, where the statute requires written notice, actual notice is not sufficient, but these cases, and a number of authorities which might be cited, show that, where a party entitled to a written notice files a notice of appeal, or some paper necessitating further proceedings in the action, such proceeding constitutes a waiver on his part of the giving of the notice prescribed by the statute. In view of the authorities above cited, it must be held in this case that the petitioner, by filing his notice of appeal in the justice's court on the 2d day of December, 1924, waived the giving of notice to him by the justice of the peace, and therefore that his second notice of appeal was ineffective for any purpose. The fact that the first appeal taken by the petitioner, the defendant in the action referred to, was dismissed by the superior court, does not alter the situation.

We think the writ should be denied, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. CECIL. (Cr. 1239.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. May 9, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⟹829(9)—Requested instruction on presumption of innocence, covered by court's given instruction, properly refused.

Court's given instruction held to fully cover defendant's requested instruction on presumption of innocence, and refusal to give requested instruction was not prejudicial.

2. Criminal law ⟹829(18)—Requested instruction, that mere probabilities are not sufficient to warrant conviction, held covered by court's given instruction and properly refused.

Court's given instruction held to sufficiently cover defendant's requested instruction that mere probabilities are not sufficient to warrant conviction, but that it must rest on proof of guilt beyond reasonable doubt, and refusal of requested instruction was not error.

3. Criminal law ⟹1175—Incomplete form of verdict held not to require reversal, where no prejudice therefrom shown.

In prosecution for violation of Pen. Code, § 288, though verdict of "guilty of violating provision of section 288 of Penal Code" was not in proper form, because not containing words "charged in the information," held, that failure to include such words does not require reversal, where no prejudice is shown to have resulted therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Andrew Cecil was convicted of violating Pen. Code, § 288, and appeals. Affirmed.

Spencer G. Prime, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was tried and convicted upon an information charging him with a violation of the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code. On the day of arraignment the defendant orally moved for a new trial without assigning any grounds therefor. This motion was denied, and the defendant has appealed from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial upon a record prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

On these appeals but two grounds are urged by the appellant: First, that the trial court erred in refusing to give the jury certain instructions proposed by the appellant; and, second, that the verdict is void because not in proper form. Beyond the suggestion that the appellant was not properly identified by the witnesses for the prosecution, no attack is made upon the evidence. The direct testimony detailing the circumstances of the alleged assault as given by the prosecutrix was sufficient in itself, if believed by the jury, to sustain a verdict of guilty. The testimony of the witnesses who were called by the state to give evidence of corroborating circumstances was conflicting in some respects, particularly as to the methods used by each witness in identifying the accused. But these witnesses, most of whom were young children, gave their testimony in an apparently straightforward manner and all agreed in identifying the appellant as the party who had been in the place where the offense was committed at the time fixed by the prosecutrix. Though the appellant took the witness stand in his own behalf, he did not expressly deny the testimony of the prosecutrix covering the actual commission of the offense. On the other hand, his testimony, which was confined to the matter of identification and the effort to prove an alibi, was of such a nature that the jury must have treated it as an admission of guilt.

[1] The first assignment of error relates to the refusal of the trial court to give certain instructions requested by the appellant. The first of these instructions covered the presumption of innocence and directed the jury to view all the testimony in the light of that presumption throughout the trial of the case. It was refused upon the grounds that the same subject had been covered in instructions previously given by the court. In referring to the instructions which were given, we find the following:

"A defendant in a criminal action is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved. And in a case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown, he is entitled to an acquittal. * * * All the presumptions of law, independent of evidence, are in favor of innocence, and every person is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty."

This instruction fully covers the subject-matter of the one proposed by the appellant.

[2] The second proposed instruction was to the effect that mere probabilities are not sufficient to warrant a conviction, or that a conviction could not be had upon the weight of the testimony alone, but that it must rest upon proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The trial court refused to give this instruction upon the ground that the subject-matter had been covered in the instruction which was given and which, after defining reasonable doubt, advised the jury:

"It is not sufficient to establish a probability though a strong one arising from the doctrine of chances, that the fact charged is more likely to be true than the contrary; but the evidence must establish the truth of the fact to a reasonable and moral certainty; a certainty that convinces and directs the understanding and satisfies the reason and judgment of those who are bound to act conscientiously upon it."

We are satisfied that the instruction given to the jury on this subject sufficiently covered the matters contained in the second instruction proposed by the appellant and that no prejudice resulted to the appellant in the refusal to give either instruction.

[3] The second point urged by the appellant is that the verdict is void because the jury merely found the appellant guilty "of the crime of felony, to wit, violating the provisions of section 288, of the Penal Code." The argument is that as the information charged the appellant with the violation of specific acts, it was necessary to the validity of a verdict of guilty to find him guilty of the specific acts charged in the information, and that the verdict which merely found him guilty of violating the provisions of section 288, Penal Code, is not necessarily a finding of the truth of these specific acts. In the argument upon this point the appellant directs our attention to the rule of the cases holding that, when the statute does not define the crime except as the specially forbidden acts define it, a verdict is insufficient which neither refers to the information nor contains a recital of the inhibited acts. It is unnecessary to discuss the authorities which have been cited in support of this rule, as it is well settled, and as we understand it is not questioned by the respondent. In support of the verdict the respondent directs our attention to the fact that the information specifically charged the appellant with a violation of the provisions of section 288, Penal Code, and that the jury found him guilty of that offense. It is further said in argument that the specific acts which are detailed in the information are the same acts which are mentioned in section 288, Penal Code, as descriptive of the offense charged. From this it is argued that the rule applicable to the particular case is that found on page 404, vol. 8, of California Jurisprudence:

"Where the statute in a word specifies and defines the crime, it is sufficient for the verdict so to specify it. Thus, it is sufficient for the verdict to find the defendant guilty of 'forgery' or of 'manslaughter.'"

We are not prepared to follow the state to the extent that the verdict as rendered is free from legal objections. It has been pointed out in numerous cases that in the trial of cases of this nature the verdict should find the defendant guilty or not guilty of the offense "charged in the information or indictment." Though we entertain these views, it does not follow that the judgment should be reversed. At the time of the oral argument, we requested the appellant to point out to us what prejudice resulted to him from the form of the verdict, but he was unable to do so. We have examined the entire record with care and are satisfied from our examination that the appellant was fairly tried and fairly convicted of the offense charged in the information, and we are unable to perceive how any prejudice has resulted to him because the jury in rendering its verdict failed to include in its verdict the words "as charged in the information."

Without approving the form of the verdict, but because no prejudice is shown to have resulted therefrom, the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

LAWRENCE et al. v. BRAMSTON et al.

Wills ⇐123(5)—Will held invalid, where neither subscription nor acknowledgment of testator took place before two witnesses present at same time.

Civ. Code, § 1276, requires testator's subscription and acknowledgment of will to be before two witnesses present at same time, and will, which witnesses signed on different days and not in each other's presence, was invalid.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of James Lawrence, deceased. Petition by Thomas Bramston and others for probate of last will and testament of said deceased, contested by Ann Lawrence and another. From a judgment declaring the will invalid and refusing to admit it to probate, proponent Steinhofer appeals. Affirmed.

T. H. Selvage and Eugene S. Selvage, both of Eureka, for appellant.

Mahan & Mahan, of Eureka, for contestants and respondents.

SHENK, J. James Lawrence died in November, 1922, at Eureka, Humboldt county, leaving estate in California and Minnesota. In December, 1923, Thomas Bramston filed a petition for the probate of the last will and testament of the decedent. In due time Ann and Sarah Lawrence, sisters of the decedent, filed a contest, alleging that the will was invalid and not the will of the decedent for the reason that it had not been executed with the formality required by section 1276 of the Civil Code. The appellants answered. The contestants interposed a demurrer on the ground that the answer did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the contest. The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend. The matter was submitted to the court for decision on the contest and the answer thereto. Judgment was entered declaring the will invalid, and refusing to admit the same to probate. This is an appeal from that judgment by Mrs. Hannah Anderson Steinhofer, a beneficiary under the alleged will.

Maude Fulton and Mrs. Bertha Steinhofer were the subscribing witnesses. The will was signed by the decedent on the 18th day of June, 1921. It is alleged in the contest that at the time the will was signed by the decedent it was signed in the presence of Maude Fulton, who was the only person in whose presence the decedent signed the will, and the only person to whom the decedent at said time acknowledged said written document to be his will, and was the only person who at said time was requested by the decedent to sign the will as a witness; that Mrs. Bertha Steinhofer signed her name to the alleged will more than a week after the 18th day of June, 1921; and that when she signed her name thereto she did not sign the same in the presence of Maude Fulton. It is alleged in the answer:

"That on the 18th day of June, 1921, said Maude Fulton signed the said will at the end thereof, at said testator's request and in his presence, and that at the time of her so signing, said testator declared to said Maude Fulton that the said instrument was his will; that a few days subsequent thereto said Mrs. Bertha Steinhofer signed the said will as a witness thereto at the end thereof, at said testator's request and in his presence, and at the time of her so signing, said testator acknowledged to said Bertha Steinhofer that said will had been made by him and by his authority and declared to her that the said instrument was his will."

It therefore appears that neither the subscription nor the acknowledgment of the decedent took place before two witnesses present at the same time. The precise question was presented in Estate of Emart, 175 Cal. 238, 244, 165 P. 707, 710, L. R. A. 1917F, 866, where this court construed the language of section 1276 of the Civil Code, reviewed the history of the legislation on the subject and said:

"From the language of our statute and this review of its history, we regard the conclusion as unescapable that our law requires the subscription or the acknowledgment to be before the two witnesses present at the same time."

The appellant contends that in Estate of Dow, 181 Cal. 106, 183 P. 794, this court, in the opinion on rehearing, so far discredited the decision in Estate of Emart, supra, as to render the point involved herein an open one. Such was not the case. In Estate of Dow, supra, the will was subscribed and acknowledged in the presence of both witnesses, but the witnesses did not sign the document in the presence of each other. It was held that, under the statute, the witnesses need not sign in the presence of each other. The distinction is pointed out by the court in the opinion on rehearing in that case.

On the authority of Estate of Emart, supra, the judgment is affirmed.

In re SPITZER'S ESTATE. (L. A. 8222.)

1. Wills ⟸87—Construed to carry out testamentary intent shown by facts and circumstances surrounding execution.

While courts will not make will for decedent, law favors testacy, and instruments bearing character of wills will be given construction necessary to carry out testamentary intent, to discover which courts will examine facts and circumstances surrounding execution.

2. Wills ⟸93—Proponent's testimony held admissible to show testator's intent to make will.

In will contest, proponent's testimony as to decedent's request that proponent draw will, and statements as to disposition of property desired, held admissible, not to supply essential elements of will, but to show that matter was in testator's mind when paper offered as will was executed.

3. Wills ⊂⊃93—Testimony as to decedent's declaration concerning letter offered as will held admissible.

In will contest, testimony as to decedent's statements to witness, when asked if he had made his will, that he had written letter to proponent, that his wife would be taken care of, etc., held admissible as relating to identical paper sought to be established as will.

4. Wills ⊂⊃87—No fixed rule for determining testamentary intent.

There is no definite, fixed rule by which testamentary intent may be gauged, but each case must stand on its own peculiar facts.

5. Wills ⊂⊃87—Decedent's letter to brother held entitled to probate as will.

Letter from aged invalid to his brother, inclosing deed of property to daughter and her husband, stating that he deeded home place to wife, that she had his insurance, and that he owed her note for sum borrowed, all of which amounted to more than half of community estate, and that balance of estate should go to daughter, and suggesting contingency of death, held entitled to probate as will.

6. Wills ⊂⊃87—Rules for determining whether instrument was intended to be testamentary stated.

In determining whether instrument was intended to be testamentary, language will be construed in light of surrounding circumstances, parol evidence of which is admissible, and effect will be given to such intent, if consistent with language of instrument, though informally drawn, consisting of more than one paper, or containing no particular words showing testamentary intent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Perry Wood, Judge.

Proceeding by Sherman C. Spitzer to probate the will of A. J. Spitzer, deceased, contested by Sarah W. Spitzer. From a judgment rejecting probate and orders denying letters testamentary to proponent and appointing contestant as administratrix, proponent appeals. Orders and judgment reversed.

Edward R. Milliken, of Pasadena, for appellant.

Merriam, Rinehard & Merriam, of Pasadena, for contestant appellee.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal is from a judgment rejecting the probate of a paper, in form a letter, alleged to be testamentary in character, as the last will and testament of the decedent, A. J. Spitzer; also from an order denying letters testamentary to the decedent's brother, Sherman C. Spitzer, thereunder, and from an order appointing Sarah W. Spitzer the administratrix of the estate. The appellants are said Sherman C. Spitzer and Lulu M. Plane, a daughter of the decedent by a former marriage. Respondent, Sarah W. Spitzer, is his widow.

Upon the death of the decedent, his widow petitioned the court for letters of administration, claiming that the former had died intestate. An amended petition was thereafter filed. A contest and opposition to the probate of will was interposed by the wife, alleging three distinct and separate grounds of contest, to wit: That the will was not executed as a last will and testament; was not testamentary in character; that Sherman C. Spitzer, the proponent, is not an interested party in the estate, since he is not named in the will as devisee, legatee, or heir at law, and that he is a nonresident of California; third, that the said Sherman C. Spitzer failed to file the will within the time allowed by law. The answer specially and generally traverses the allegations of contest and opposition.

At the hearing, the court rejected the probate of the will on the preliminary hearing, holding that the proponent had not made out a prima facie case, inasmuch as the paper failed to show upon its face that it was intended to be testamentary in character. This was the sole issue presented and passed upon by the court. The paper in question reads as follows:

"Pasadena Cal—Aug 4 23

"Dear Bro Sherman

"As I am not able to sit up very long but am better than last week will write you a few lines and send you this Deed of Lewis and Lulu also to say that I deeded Sarah W. S. this homeplace 1661 N Raymond before I was sick worth 7000.00 and as she has my Insurance of 3000.00 also I owe her a note of 4000.00 borrowed and as the Bal is in Abingdon and Pasadena the above amount $\frac{7000}{3000}$ is more than

10000.00

½ have made since we were married. Bal of estate to go to Lulu M Plane. I guess that is California law as to her amt. You can fix things if anything happens All papers here are in State Bank of Pasadena.

"Yours truly A. J. Spitzer"

The facts and circumstances which bore upon the mind of the decedent at the time the letter offered as a will was written, and which show his relations to the parties before the court, may be thus briefly stated:

Sixteen years prior to his death decedent and the respondent widow intermarried. Shortly after their marriage they removed to Abingdon, Ill., where they resided for about 5 years, at the end of which period they returned to California and resided at Pasadena until the death of decedent, which occurred September 25, 1923. He was past 70 years of age. He left property, real and personal, both in Abingdon, Ill., and in California. It would seem that the estate consists of separate property owned by decedent, and also property of the community. The record indicates that the estate is of the value of about $35,000. Appellant Sherman C. Spitzer, who claims to be entitled to letters testamentary, was a lawyer residing in Chicago, Ill. He never resided in California. He visited his brother at Pasadena about a year before the latter died, at which time several conversations were had with reference to decedent disposing of his property by will. He informed his brother that he had in contemplation the making of his will by which he was to provide for his wife and his daughter, and that he wanted to so arrange his affairs that each should be taken care of. During the conversation, the decedent spoke generally of his property in Illinois and in California, and requested appellant to draw his will, but the latter replied that he was not sufficiently familiar with the community property law of California to undertake the task. He did, however, advise with an officer of a trust company in Los Angeles as to the community property rule in California, and subsequently, upon the advice thus received, informed decedent that, in the absence of a will, the wife would take one-half of the community property. Under the law as it stood on that day the advice was sound. Decedent further informed the appellant that he wanted his wife to have the home, valued at $7,000, and also the proceeds of a certain insurance policy on his life in the sum of $3,000, and it was his further desire that the balance of his estate should go to his daughter, Lulu M. Plane, whose husband was Lewis C. Plane, to whom reference is made in the paper offered for probate. Decedent stated to appellant Spitzer that his wife had considerable property in her own right.

Witness Jenson testified that he had been a close neighbor of the decedent, and had known him more than a year prior to his demise. He had performed service for him, and frequently visited him at his home. In conversations with Jenson, decedent told him that he had been ill for several years, and that he did not expect to recover from the illness from which he was suffering. Not less than 5 days nor more than 9 days from the day on which the paper offered for probate was written, Jenson called on decedent to bid him good-bye, as he was about to leave on a visit to an eastern state. In the course of the conversation, decedent said that he did not suppose he would ever see him (Jenson) again. Jenson asked him if he had made his will. It was admitted by counsel and assumed by the court that the reply of the decedent would have been as follows:

"Yes; everything is all fixed. I have written a letter to my brother, and my wife will be taken care of, and I want my daughter to be taken care of."

An objection was sustained to the introduction of this testimony on the ground that it was incompetent. The relevancy of this testimony and the correctness of the court's ruling will be hereafter considered.

The letter offered as a will is wholly in the handwriting of the decedent, dated and signed by him. It was received by the appellant on August 8, 1923, and placed by him in a chiffonier drawer, where it remained for some time. Appellant's testimony in explanation of his delay in forwarding the letter to the probate court of Los Angeles county is, in effect, that he was not aware that olographic wills were valid in California, and that he erroneously assumed that the California law was the same as the Illinois law, which as he understood it, did not recognize a paper as a will unless it had been formally witnessed and attested as such. He afterwards discovered his mistake, and forwarded the paper, which was denied probate, to Pasadena, to be filed as of record in the estate matter.

[1-4] While it is true that courts will not make a will for a decedent who has failed to do so for himself, it is also true that the law favors testacy rather than intestacy, and will give such construction to instruments bearing the character of wills as is necessary to carry out testamentary intent. They will also examine facts and circumstances surrounding its execution, to the end that the intent of the maker of the paper may be discovered. The testimony of appellant Spitzer was admissible as tending to show a plan or design and the prior intention of decedent. This evidence was not received as tending to supply the essential elements of a will which but faintly appear, but to show that the subject was in the mind of the testator at the time of the execution of the paper offered as a will. Wigmore on Evidence (2d Ed.) vol. 1, p. 352, § 112; Estate of Carson, 184 Cal. 437, 445, 194 P. 5, 17 A. L. R. 239; Whiteley v. King et al., 17 C. B. (N. S.) 756. As to the witness Jenson, the declaration made by decedent to him, and excluded by the court, was shown to relate to the identical paper sought to be established as a will. That would make it admissible. Smith v. Smith, 112 Va. 205, 70 S. E. 491, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018. There is no definite, fixed rule by which testamentary intention may be gauged. No two cases are alike upon the facts. Cases may be cited establishing as wills papers offered for probate in which the testamentary intent is, perhaps, less apparent than is the intent shown by the paper offered for probate in the instant case. No good purpose would be accomplished by citing them, as each case must stand upon its own peculiar facts.

[5] The opening sentences of the paper offered for probate are much after the fashion of an ordinary letter writer. That which follows, however, bears the impress of something more than the usual letter written by one brother to another. It will be remembered that decedent was then past 70 years of age, and had been an invalid for several years. His physical strength was waning, and he knew that permanent recovery was not to be expected. His entire thought was upon the disposition that he was about to make of his property. He inclosed a deed of the Illinois property, which was to form part of his estate to be administered upon thereafter. The passing of title to his property was contingent upon the happening of but one event, death. He knew that death alone was to make his acts effective. The paper makes a complete disposition of his estate, to take effect after death. It is very clear, considering his relation to his beneficiaries and the circumstances surrounding his act, that he intended, in the event of his death, that the letter of August the 4th would direct the distribution of his estate to those named in the paper. "Bal of Estate to go to Lulu M. Plane" constitutes a commonplace testamentary clause. "You can fix things if anything happens" suggests the contingency which he thought was very near at hand. In this he was correct, as he lived only about 7 weeks from the day he wrote the instrument. His anticipation of death would be a sufficient reason to prompt him to make his will. Buffington v. Thomas, 84 Miss. 157, 36 So. 1039, 105 Am. St. Rep. 423.

[6] We think the rule applicable to the facts of the instant case is well stated in Estate of Beffa, 54 Cal. App. 186, 201 P. 616, as follows:

"Appellant contends that the instrument is not testamentary in character. A will is a disposition of property to take effect at the death of the testator. 'It is well settled in this country and in England: First, that in determining whether the instrument propounded was intended to be testamentary, reference will be had to the surrounding circumstances, and the language will be construed in the light of these circumstances. Second, that if it shall appear under all the circumstances that the instrument was intended to be testamentary, the court will give effect to the intention, if it can be done consistently with the language of the instrument; and in such cases the particular form of the instrument is immaterial.' Clarke v. Ransom, 50 Cal. 600. 'A will may be informally drawn, and may consist of one or more papers. No particular words are necessary to show a testamentary intent. It must appear only that the maker intended by it to dispose of property after his death, and parol evidence as to the attending circumstances is admissible.' Mitchell v. Donohue, 100 Cal. 207 [34 P. 614, 38 Am. St. Rep. 279, 34 P. 615]. 'It is undoubtedly the general rule enunciated by the leading case of Habergham v. Vincent, 2 Ves. Jr. 231, and oft repeated, that the true test of the character of an instrument is not the testator's realization that it is a will, but his intention to create a revocable disposition of his property to accrue and take effect only upon his death and passing no present interest.' Nichols v. Emery, 109 Cal. 329 [41 P. 1089, 50 Am. St. Rep. 43].

[7] Counsel for both the respondent and the appellant indulge in extensive arguments as to the proper construction that should be placed upon certain clauses of the will. We are not interested in that question at this time. The question here is whether the paper offered is testamentary in character and for that reason is entitled to be admitted to probate. We are of the opinion that it is.

The orders and the judgment herein appealed from are reversed.

URRUTIA v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 11522.)

Mandamus ⇐154(4)—Petition held insufficient to warrant writ compelling trial judge to determine disposition of money in hands of receiver in advance of hearing on merits at settlement of receiver's account.

Petition for mandamus, alleging that, in an extrajudicial interview with judge, latter stated that in his opinion money in hands of receiver, arising from rents received from mortgaged property, should be applied to deficiency judgment, held insufficient to warrant granting of writ to compel trial judge to determine disposition of moneys in possession of receiver, in advance of hearing on merits at settlement of receiver's account.

In Bank.

Application by J. M. Urrutia for a writ of mandate, to be directed to the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Honorable Franklin A. Griffin, Judge thereof, to compel delivery to petitioner, after settlement of receiver's account, of all money remaining undisposed of in receiver's hands. Writ denied.

Goldman, Nye & Surr, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Bion S. Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel the superior court, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and Hon. Franklin A. Griffin, judge thereof, to deliver to petitioner, after a settlement of a receiver's account, all moneys remaining undisposed of in the possession of said receiver, instead of making an application of said moneys in partial satisfaction of a deficiency judgment; to compel the said court to discharge said receiver, and to direct the latter to refrain from further interference with any of the property (subject to a certain mortgage hereinafter referred to) which is claimed by petitioner as his property. The cause is submitted upon a demurrer and answer interposed by the judge of the superior court, in response to the issuance of an alternative writ.

The material facts are as follows: On the 15th day of January, 1921, A. F. Rousseau, owner of the Kenilworth apartments, situate in the city of San Francisco, leased the same to one Gorman for a period of 5 years, at a monthly rental of $1,325. As security for the faithful performance of all the covenants and conditions therein contained, including the covenant for the payment of rents, the lessee executed and delivered to the said Rousseau, lessor, a chattel mortgage on all the furniture contained in said building. On the 18th day of January, 1921, Rousseau mortgaged the apartments and hypothecated certain liberty bonds of the value of $30,000 to the Banca Popolare Fugazi, as security for a loan of $100,000 made by the bank to him. The note recited that it was secured by a mortgage of even date and a pledge of bonds. Rousseau sold the real property (Kenilworth apartments), the lease, and the chattel mortgage to one Frinchaboy, who assumed payment of the mortgage and signed the original note, but the Liberty bonds were not assigned. Frinchaboy immediately assigned the lease and the chattel mortgage, and also executed and delivered a second mortgage on the real property, in the sum of $50,615, to petitioner, as security for a pre-existing obligation owing by him to the latter. On August 22, 1922, Frinchaboy conveyed his interest in the property to one Kurkjian, but prior to this Banca Popolare Fugazi, the original mortgagee, assigned the mortgage and the note to one George H. McCarthy and his wife, Mabel E. McCarthy, who eventually assigned a part interest therein to the Bank of Alameda. On the 14th day of June, 1922, the McCarthys and the bank instituted a foreclosure proceeding, making petitioner, who was a second mortgagee and also the assignee of the lease and chattel mortgage, a party defendant. The action resulted in a judgment of foreclosure and sale of the property mortgaged, and, upon an appeal, perfected by petitioner, the judgment was, by the District Court of Appeal, affirmed. McCarthy v. Kurkjian, 65 Cal. App. 569, 224 P. 1016. Pending this appeal, the superior court, on the application of respondent mortgagee, ordered the appointment of a receiver to preserve the property. An application for a writ of supersedeas, attacking said order made by petitioner to this court, was denied on August 2, 1924. Thereafter the District Court of Appeal affirmed the order of the trial court appointing the receiver. McCarthy v. Kurkjian (Cal. App.) 232 P. 161. On the 28th day of May, 1924, after a commissioner's sale of the realty covered by the mortgage, a deficiency judgment in the sum of $9,995.23 was docketed. An application made to the superior court by petitioner, to vacate the said judgment for the alleged reason that it had been prematurely docketed, was denied. Thereafter the receiver filed his account with the superior court, and his prayer is that—

"The court make an order authorizing the undersigned as such receiver to pay the balance of the moneys in his hands to the plaintiffs herein, George H. McCarthy and Mabel E. McCarthy, to apply in partial satisfaction of the deficiency judgment, in their favor herein."

In order to prevent said moneys, consisting solely of rents collected by the receiver from the "Gorman" lease, from being applied to a partial satisfaction of the said deficiency judgment in accordance with the prayer of the receiver's account, and upon information that it was the intention of the mortgagee to continue said receiver in office to collect further rents and apply the same in partial satisfaction of the judgment, petitioner initiated the present proceeding.

It is the contention of the petitioner that the receiver has impounded and is impounding certain rents issuing from the "Gorman" lease, which he intends to apply in partial satisfaction of the deficiency judgment, but that said rents are not subject to the lien of the incumbrance of said mortgage, and, therefore, should not be applied to the satisfaction of the deficiency judgment; that, if the rents were at any time herein mentioned subject to the lien of said incumbrance, either petitioner, as the assignee of the lease and chattel mortgage, has a paramount right to apply the same in liquidation of his own obligation to the exclusion of the first mortgagee, or that the latter has waived the right of so applying the rents in partial satisfaction of the deficiency judgment, inasmuch as, on the 28th day of May, 1924, he voluntarily, and with full knowledge of the existence of said rents, docketed a deficiency judgment in the sum of $9,995.23, and thereby waived the lien or the security of any property which remained unexhausted at that time, citing In re Braun, 51 Cal. App. 202, 196 P. 499; that, unless said receiver is restrained by the intervention of the writ, he will continue in office after the settlement of his account, and will continue to collect and impound further accruing rents. On the other hand, it is insisted by respondent that the present case is not a proper one for the issuance of the writ of mandamus, inasmuch as petitioner has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law by way of an appeal from the order settling the account of the receiver; that the rents in the possession of the receiver are a part of the security covered by said mortgage, and are available for, and should be applied to, a partial satisfaction of the deficiency judgment by virtue of the "law of the case," as determined by the previous decisions of the cause in the District Court of Appeal, supra; that the mortgagee's right to apply the rents in satisfaction of his deficiency judgment is paramount to the right of petitioner, inasmuch as the mortgage was executed and recorded prior to the assignment of the lease to petitioner; and that he has not waived the privilege of so applying the rents as aforesaid, inasmuch as petitioner has precluded the application of said rents to the deficiency judgment by the perfection of an appeal from the order appointing the receiver and the execution of a stay bond.

In so far as the petition attempts to show any matter which would be material in an application for a writ of mandamus, it may be stated that it is insufficient to warrant the relief sought, inasmuch as it fails to allege such specific facts as would warrant this court in granting the extraordinary remedy of a writ of mandamus to compel the trial court to make a definite adjudication as to the disposition of the moneys in the possession of the receiver, at a time prior and in advance of a hearing of the matter on its merits at the settlement of the receiver's account. In the petition for the writ, counsel avers that he interviewed the judge before whom the proceedings are pending, and said judge "declared to him that he considered said moneys in said receiver's hands should be delivered to said McCarthy in partial extinction of said deficiency judgment." From this extrajudicial interview petitioner concludes "that said order will be made as prayed for unless restrained." If anticipated action of the court, founded upon a tentative opinion such as this situation presents, may be taken as a basis for the issuance of the extraordinary writ, it office would soon become very commonplace, and such practices would eventually have the effect of impeding rather than promoting the remedial procedure of courts. In this connection it will be noted that the answer—verification thereof having been waived—contains the following allegation in refutation of the averment of petitioner as to what the court's ruling upon the pending matter would have been:

"That, after said receiver so filed said petition, the respondent did state that, from the facts then before him, it was his opinion that the money now in the hands of the receiver, arising from rents received from the mortgaged property, should be applied to the deficiency due on the judgment in said action." (Italics ours.)

From what has been said, it sufficiently appears that the court has not finally passed upon the disputed issue, and we are not permitted to anticipate what its ruling would have been or will be when the question is finally submitted. Furthermore, counsel for petitioner is only advised by counsel for the McCarthys that it is the intention of the mortgagee to have said receiver continued in office, etc. It necessarily follows from what appears before us, that petitioner has failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a prima facie case for relief, and, for aught that any one may be able to foretell, the receiver may forthwith be discharged after the settlement of his preliminary account, or the court may make such further orders as may be agreeable to the justice of the case. The intention of counsel for respondent to press or request the retention of the receiver cannot be regarded as any indication that the court will yield to pressure or requests merely and continue the receiver in office if no substantial reason therefor exists.

From an examination of the record presented, we are of the opinion that it cannot be said that the court has prejudged the main issue to be finally submitted to it for decision. There appears to be no reason why the court cannot freely give that full, careful, and impartial consideration to the questions presented, or to be presented, that the importance of said issues would seem to require.

The application for a writ of mandamus is denied.

In re PARSONS' ESTATE.

WHITTEN et al. v. LA PLANTE.

(L. A. 7938.)

1. Wills ⟸427—Question of revocation by cancellation or obliteration must be presented and decided when will is offered for probate or by proceeding or contest within one year after will is admitted to probate.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1327, 1333, making probate of will not contested within one year conclusive except as to persons under disabilities, question of revocation by cancellation or obliteration of whole or part of will under Civ. Code, § 1292, must be presented and decided either when will is offered for probate or by proceeding or contest brought within one year thereafter.

⟸For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

2. Courts ⟸202(5)—Adjudication as to each step in administration not subject to review in subsequent stage.

Adjudication as to each step in series of different proceedings, contemplated in administration of estates of deceased persons, is final in nature, and not subject to review in subsequent stage of administration.

3. Wills ⟸421—Attack on order admitting will to probate, or contest of validity of will, is not direct attack because made in proceeding connected with administration.

Although order admitting will to probate may be appealed from or admission to probate may be contested and validity of will attacked within one year after admission to probate, attack on order, or contest of validity of whole or part of will, is not direct attack merely because made or instituted in some proceeding connected with administration of estate.

4. Wills ⟸423—On whom judgment admitting will to probate is binding stated.

Proceeding for probate of will is one in rem, and judgment admitting it to probate is binding on all persons interested in will who, being constructively notified to appear at probate, might have come in, and who, had they come in, would have been heard for or against its validity.

5. Wills ⟸423—After one year from admission to probate without contest, will is conclusive evidence as to intent of testator.

Where admission of will to probate was uncontested, and will was annexed to certificate required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1317, attack aimed at will in petition for partial distribution on ground that certain legacies bequeathed to petitioners had been canceled and revoked was collateral, and, such issue not having been raised upon proceeding to probate will where it could have properly been raised, after lapse of more than one year since order admitting will to probate, will is conclusive evidence as to intent of testator, in view of sections 1327, 1333.

6. Wills ⟸427—Denying petition for partial distribution after year from admission to probate held error.

Where question of revocation of legacies by cancellation was not raised in proceedings to probate will, denying petition for partial distribution after lapse of year from admission to probate on ground that legacies which had been marked out, but which could still be read, were canceled was error, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1327, 1333, making probate conclusive if it, or validity of will, is not contested within year after admission to probate.

7. Executors and administrators ⟸314(8)—Denial of petition for partial distribution held proper, in view of condition of estate.

In view of evidence tending to show insufficient cash in possession of executor to pay expenses of administration, claims presented and allowed against estate, and legacies payable under will, and that it would be necessary to prorate shares of general legatees, refusing petition of legatees for partial distribution was proper.

8. Executors and administrators ⟸314(12)—Decision, based upon judgment of court as to whether condition of estate justifies partial distribution, not reversed.

Decision refusing partial distribution to legatees, based on judgment of court as to whether condition of estate is such as to justify distribution, especially when application is denied by probate judge, will not be reversed on appeal.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Petition by Wilfred Whitten and others for partial distribution of the estate of William Parsons, deceased, opposed by William La Plante, executor. From an order denying the petition, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

James S. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Norman A. Bailie, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, J. This is an appeal from an order denying a petition for partial distribution. William Parsons died, leaving a last will and testament which was duly admitted to probate, without objection or contest, and letters testamentary thereon were issued. In due course Wilfred Whitten, Muriel Whitten, and Oliver Whitten filed a petition for partial distribution, alleging themselves to be legatees under the will, and each entitled to $1,000. The respondent executor denied the claims of the petitioners, and filed objections to the granting of the petition on the ground that the provisions of the will making the bequests to the petitioners had been revoked by cancellation or obliteration by the testator. On a trial of the issues thus presented, the court made and entered findings of fact to the effect that the three petitioners were not legatees under the will of Parsons, and denied their petition. From that order this appeal is prosecuted, presenting for determination the question whether the order admitting the will of Parsons to probate was final as to what constituted the testament, or whether certain provisions appearing in the will so admitted to probate may be excluded on petition for distribution.

The due execution of the will by the decedent Parsons is not questioned. The will admitted to probate contains some 14 dispositive provisions. The third, fourth and fifth paragraphs, respectively, provide $1,000 each for these appellants. Across these three paragraphs certain pencil lines or marks appear, which do not obliterate or render illegible any part of the will, and there is no notation or other indication from which the intent of the testator, in making the marks, may be inferred. Other provisions of the will, of no concern in the present controversy, are more nearly obliterated by heavier pencil markings. The petition for the probate of the will made no mention of these cancellations, if they were intended as such, but prayed for the admission of the document as filed. The testimony of the subscribing witnesses and of the proponents of the will, taken at the time of its admission to probate, is silent as to any changes or alterations made in the document after its execution, and the court made its order in the customary form, unqualifiedly admitting the entire instrument to probate. It was stipulated on the hearing of the petition for partial distribution that each and all of the lines and marks drawn through and across those portions of the will providing legacies in favor of appellants were so drawn by William Parsons subsequent to the execution of the will. Over the objection of appellants, the executor, La Plante, was then permitted to testify that Parsons had stated to him "that he drew lines and marks through certain of the legacies and bequests in said will for the purpose of canceling and revoking the same." On these facts the court below found that the third, fourth, and fifth provisions of the will had been obliterated, canceled, and revoked by the testator, and denied the petition for partial distribution.

[1] It appears from the bill of exceptions that the executors of the last will and testament of William Parsons, deceased, presented to the probate court a document purporting to be, and which they averred to be, the will of said deceased, and for which they sought admission to probate as the decedent's last will and testament. When presented and filed for probate, the document showed a number of erasures and interlineations attested by the initials of the decedent. A number of lines and marks appeared to have been drawn through certain paragraphs of the will, among them the third, fourth, and fifth—the provisions in favor of these appellants. These lines and marks were not attested or noted in any way, and did not obliterate or render illegible or uncertain the plain provisions of the will. Upon the hearing of the petition, which was duly noticed, the instrument was offered for probate in its entirety, and due proofs of its execution were made. No objection or contest of any kind being presented, the judge of the probate court made his findings in the form of the certificate required by law, to which the original will was annexed and made a part thereof, as the statute requires. Code Civ. Proc. § 1317. The testimony of the proponents and of the subscribing witnesses to the will is silent as to any effort or intention of the decedent to revoke or alter any of the provisions of the will. The order admitting it to probate reads:

"That the document heretofore filed purporting to be the last will of said deceased and so alleged to be in said petition be admitted to probate as the last will of said deceased."

The order was never appealed from, nor was any contest of the will after probate initiated within one year after its admission to probate or at all. The petition for partial distribution, upon which the present proceeding arose, was filed after the time for contesting the provisions of the will had fully expired.

[2-4] In seeking a reversal of the order denying their petition for partial distribution, appellants invoke the application of sections 1327 and 1333 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provide that, when a will has been admitted to probate, and no person, within one year after the probate, contests the same or the validity of the will, the probate of the instrument is conclusive (except as to those under certain disabilities). They do not question the rule that a portion of a will may be revoked by cancellation or obliteration, with the intent and for the purpose of revoking the same, by the testator himself, or by some person in his presence and by his direction (Civ. Code, § 1292), but contend that the question of revocation by cancellation, or obliteration of the whole or of a part of a will, must be presented and decided either when the will is offered for probate, or by a proceeding or contest brought within one year after the will is admitted. The contention of the appellants must be upheld. The probate procedure of this state contemplates in the administration of the estates of deceased persons a series of different proceedings, each of which is separate as to the matters embraced within its purview. An adjudication as to each step in this series is intended to be final in its nature, and not subject to review in a subsequent stage of the administration of the estate. An order admitting a will may be appealed from, or the admission of the instrument to probate may be contested, and the validity of the will attacked within one year after such probate, but an attack on the order, or a contest of the validity of the whole or of a part of the will, is not a direct attack merely because made or instituted in some proceeding connected with the administration of the same estate. Estate of Davis, 151 Cal. 318, 323, 86 P. 183, 90 P. 711, 121 Am. St. Rep. 105. The proceeding for the probate of the will is one in rem, instituted for the purpose of establishing the status of a written instrument. Estate of Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 585, 150 P. 989. The judgment admitting the instrument to probate is therefore binding upon all persons interested in the will who, being constructively notified to appear at the probate, might have come in, and who, had they come in, would have been heard for or against its validity. Estate of Allen, 176 Cal. 632, 633, 169 P. 364.

[5] The attack aimed at the will of the decedent Parsons by the respondent was made in response to a petition for partial distribution filed more than one year after the will was admitted to probate—an independent and wholly distinct proceeding from that for the probate of the document. It is therefore a collateral and not a direct attack. Estate of Davis, supra. The respondent resisted the granting of the petition on the ground that "subsequent to the execution of the last will and testament * * * William Parsons, with intent and purpose of canceling each and every provision in said will contained in favor of said petitioners * * * and each of them, did with his own hand draw lines through and across said provisions, and each of them, and did expressly cancel and revoke the same." The issue thus joined was one which could properly have been raised upon the proceeding for the probate of the will. Not having been so raised, and more than one year having elapsed since the order was made, the instrument admitted is now conclusive evidence as to the intent of the testator. In re Maxwell, 74 Cal. 384, 386, 16 P. 206. In the case cited a devise contained in the will was excepted to on petition for distribution, on the ground that it had been obtained by false and fraudulent representations made by the beneficiary to the testator. The court in probate held that the exceptions stated no ground for relief, and this court affirmed the ruling on the ground that such an objection to the devise could not be raised on petition for distribution of the estate.

[6] The cases cited and relied on by respondent deal with questions concerning the construction to be placed on wills, and not with matters which can only arise on application for probate in the first instance, or in properly instituted contests. We conclude, therefore, on this phase of the case, that the lower court was in error in denying the petition of the appellants for partial distribution on the ground that the provisions of the will making the bequests for them had been revoked.

[7, 8] Although the provisions in the will of the decedent, Parsons, in favor of these appellants have not been revoked, it does not follow that their petition for partial distribution must be granted at this time. Evidence was introduced, in opposition to the granting of the petition, that there was insufficient cash in the possession of the executor of the estate to pay the expenses of administration, the claims presented and allowed against the estate, and the legacies payable under the will, and that, after all the assets of the estate were reduced to cash, it would be necessary to prorate the shares of general legatees. On this evidence the probate court correctly held that the estate of the decedent was not in condition to be partially distributed at this time. Estate of Dunne, 65 Cal. 378, 380, 4 P. 379. We cannot well reverse a decision based upon the judgment of the court as to whether the condition of the estate is such as to justify the distribution, especially when the application is denied by the probate judge. Estate of Painter, 115 Cal. 635, 640, 47 P. 700. On this ground alone the order appealed from is affirmed.

RANSFORD v. AINSWORTH et ux. (S. F. 10783).

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃754(1)—On failure to dispute sufficiency of evidence to justify verdict that collision causing injuries was due to negligence of defendant's husband in driving defendant's automobile, such fact was admitted.

Where it was not disputed on appeal that there was sufficient evidence to justify verdict to effect that collision in which plaintiff sustained injuries was caused by negligence of defendant's husband in driving defendant's automobile, such fact was admitted.

2. Master and servant ⊂⊃330(3)—Inference husband was wife's agent in operating her automobile sufficient prima facie to support verdict against wife for injury.

Where husband operated wife's automobile, her separate property, with her consent, inference arises that he was her agent in operation of it, sufficient prima facie to support verdict in favor of person injured in collision therewith, in absence of substantial proof to contrary.

3. Master and servant ⊂⊃330(3)—Evidence husband operating wife's automobile was acting as her agent held sufficient to make wife liable for injuries.

In action against husband and wife for injuries sustained in collision with wife's automobile operated by husband, evidence that automobile was separate property of wife, and that husband was driving it to carry home family supplies purchased by wife, held sufficient to support verdict against wife for injuries sustained in collision therewith, regardless of Civ. Code, § 156, providing that husband is head of family.

4. Master and servant ⊂⊃330(1)—Presumption husband in purchasing and carrying home household supplies was acting for himself as head of family rebuttable.

In action against husband and wife for injuries sustained in collision with automobile, wife's separate property, operated by husband, presumption arising under Civ. Code, § 156, making husband head of family, that husband in purchasing and conveying home household supplies was acting for himself is disputable, and subject to be overthrown by evidence that wife was furnisher of home, and substantial, if not sole, supplier of household needs.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by William R. Ransford against A. G. Ainsworth and wife. Judgement for plaintiff, and defendant Minerva I. Ainsworth appeals. Affirmed.

Russell T. Ainsworth, of San Francisco, Thomas C. Anglim, of Napa, and Chas. S. Peery, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. [1, 2] This appeal is by the defendant Minerva I. Ainsworth from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against both defendants for the sum of $2,000, based upon the verdict of a jury in an action to recover damages for injuries received by the plaintiff in a collision between the automobile of the defendant and appellant M. I. Ainsworth while being driven and operated by her husband and codefendant A. G. Ainsworth on and along the streets of the city of Napa. The sole question presented upon this appeal is as to whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict and judgment against the appellant herein. In entering upon this inquiry there are certain admitted facts which should be stated so as to clear the way for the main contention of the appellant herein. It is an admitted fact that the defendants are husband and wife and were living together as such at the time of the injuries complained of and for many years prior thereto, upon a ranch near Trubody station, nine miles north of Napa, which was the separate property of the appellant herein. It is also an admitted fact that the automobile which the defendant A. G. Ainsworth was driving at the time of said collision, and of which he was the sole occupant, was owned by and was the separate property of the appellant herein, and was at the time of said collision being driven and operated by her said husband with her consent. It is admitted, because not disputed upon this appeal, that there was sufficient evidence to justify the verdict of the jury to the effect that the collision in which the plaintiff suffered his said injuries was caused by the negligence of said A. G. Ainsworth in the driving and operation of the appellant's said automobile. Based upon these admitted facts there is a proposition of law which is also conceded to be correct by the briefs and arguments of the appellant herein. It is that an inference arises from the foregoing facts that the husband was the agent of his wife in the driving and operation of her car at the time of said collision, and that such inference would be sufficient prima facie to support the verdict herein, in the absence of substantial proof sufficient to destroy such inference. The cases which support this admittedly correct rule of law are the following: McWhirter v. Fuller, 35 Cal. App. 288, 170 P. 417; Grantham v. Ordway, 40 Cal. App. 758, 182 P. 753; Maupin v. Solomon, 41 Cal. App. 323–326, 183 P. 198; Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 P. 358; Dierks v. Newsom, 49 Cal. App. 789, 194 P. 518; and Fahey v. Madden, 56 Cal. App. 593, 206 P. 128.

In the case first above cited this court in denying the petition for a hearing before it stated the rule to be as above set forth, and such statement of the rule was followed in the later cases. While the appellant herein concedes the foregoing to be the correct rule with relation to the inference and its effect arising from the foregoing admitted facts, she contends that such inference has been overthrown by positive and sufficient proof that her husband and codefendant was not acting as her agent in the driving, operation, and use of said car at the time of said collision, but that, on the contrary, he was engaged solely upon his own business and affairs in the use and operation of her car at said time; and hence that there was and is no room in this case for the doctrine and inference of agency to be given application. This contention requires a further examination into the facts of this case as disclosed by the record herein.

In addition to his reliance upon the foregoing inference as sufficient, prima facie, to support the verdict and judgment in his favor, the plaintiff herein offered certain evidence tending substantially to show, not only that said defendant A. G. Ainsworth was at the time of said collision operating and using the car of the appellant with her consent, but that in so doing he was engaged in doing things which were matters of her business and concern. The evidence of the plaintiff's witnesses tended to show that, while the appellant had owned the automobile in question for several years, she did not drive it herself, but that it was generally driven and operated by her husband, and that said automobile was used and generally was so driven and operated by her said husband in connection with the varied activities of the family household in which such vehicles are customarily used and operated; as, for example, the evidence showed that groceries purchased for the family use were not delivered at the ranch by the store where purchased, but were conveyed there by means of her automobile, which her husband generally used in making such deliveries. The evidence offered by the plaintiff further showed, without contradiction, not only that the ranch upon which the defendants resided was the separate property of the appellant, but that the store account for goods and provisions for the household were carried in the name of the appellant; that this arrangement had been made several years previously upon the insistence of the proprietors of the store and upon the appellant's express direction expressed in a letter which was introduced in evidence, and in which she directed that all goods ordered by her husband, A. G. Ainsworth, should be charged to her account; that such family supplies were usually ordered by A. G. Ainsworth, and charged to the account of his wife; that bills therefor were annually presented and paid by her checks; that the ranch upon which the defendants resided had formerly been conducted as to its productive activities by the appellant as her separate property, but that for some years past its lands had been rented to Chinese, who operated the same under a lease. It does not clearly appear as to whether or not these lessees paid cash rent, but it does appear that the proceeds of the ranch in the form of crops were handled by the Napa Fruit Company, whose manager testified that the accounts for such proceeds were carried by his company in the name of Mrs. Ainsworth: that all of the checks were payable to her; and that all instruments in relation thereto were made out in and signed by her name. It was thereupon stipulated by respective counsel to be a fact "that A. G. Ainsworth acted for his wife in business transactions and in the handling of the business; that he handled the proceeds of the crop, collected the proceeds, and did everything with reference to the crop as though he were the owner; * * * that her share of the proceeds has been collected by A. G. Ainsworth in the name of Minerva I. Ainsworth, deposited to her name in the bank; and that he has acted for her in his dealings with the fruit company and his dealings with the bank have been likewise." It was also, and in this same connection, stipulated by the parties that Mrs. Ainsworth paid Mr. Landen (the proprietor of the store) from the proceeds of these checks which came from the ranch, and that Mr. Ainsworth acted for her in so doing. The plaintiff then called a witness, Mr. Landen, the proprietor of the store in question, who produced the store books, showing that certain goods and merchandise had been purchased on the date on which the collision occurred, consisting of a quantity of groceries, chiefly canned goods, and two loaves of bread, and which had been charged to the account of M. I. Ainsworth, and the bill made out therefor in her name, and sent to her, and that the same had been paid. This witness further testified that nearly all of the purchases of goods for the household were made by Mr. Ainsworth in this manner, and that, since the store did not deliver goods at that distance, the goods were usually taken out by Mr. Ainsworth in the machine. This witness also testified that on several occasions goods had been so ordered and charged and shipped to the defendants' daughter in Oakland. Following his testimony the plaintiff produced three witnesses who testified that immediately after the collision they had looked into the back of the car Mr. Ainsworth was driving and had seen there certain articles of merchandise. These three witnesses were in agreement in testifying that they saw there two loaves of bread. Two of them testified to seeing there other articles in wrapped-up packages having the appearance of canned goods, while one of them testified to seeing some vegetables there. With this evidence the plaintiff rested his case, and, after making a motion for nonsuit, which was denied, the defendants placed the defendant A. G. Ainsworth upon the witness stand, who, while admitting that he was the driver of the car in question at the time of said collision, and that it was the property of his wife, and that he was operating the same with her consent, denied that he was in any manner or to any extent attending to her business or affairs at said time. He testified that he had driven into town in said automobile to attend solely to certain matters of his own concern; one of these was to consult his physician as to his own ailments; another was to meet his brother, whom he expected to arrive on the train, and the last was to purchase and ship on his own account certain groceries to a sick friend in San Francisco. He testified that as to the groceries he purchased the same at said store and had them all packed for shipment to their destination and sent them there by Wells Fargo Express; that he made no other purchases whatever and had no goods or groceries or other merchandise in his machine at the time of the collision; and that he had gone to the post office, and was on his way home when the collision occurred. He further testified that at the time of the purchase of said groceries he directed that they be charged to himself personally; and that he personally delivered the box containing the same to Wells Fargo Express. He apparently had in court and while so testifying a shipping receipt from the express company showing the shipment by him of a box on that day weighing 55 pounds, but he did not offer such shipping receipt in evidence, nor testify further as to its contents, with respect, particularly, to the name of the consignee or the destination of the shipment. He further testified that Mrs. Ainsworth had for several months past been in Oakland assisting in the care of a sick grandchild; that he had gone down occasionally, but usually remained on the ranch; that the automobile was driven by him generally when there, but was also used by different members of the family when needed.

Upon the cross-examination of Mr. Ainsworth his deposition, taken before the trial, was produced, from which it appeared that upon his first examination thereon he had given the other reasons stated for his visit to town on the day of the collision, but had not mentioned the episode of the grocery purchase or shipment, and that, upon being particularly questioned as to such purchase, stated that he had no recollection of any such transaction. It was only after he learned that plaintiff's counsel had gone to the store and ascertained the fact as to the grocery purchase on that day that the witness changed his testimony in that regard and gave the explanation as to his having sent the goods to a sick friend in San Francisco. He further admitted upon cross-examination that his sick friend was no relation of his, nor in any way dependent upon him, and that he had never done such a thing before. Mr. Ainsworth further admitted on cross-examination that he had no regular vocation, no bank account, and no property, except an interest in his mother's estate, which did not stand in his name, but from which he stated that he received a monthly income, the amount of which was not given.

Mrs. M. I. Ainsworth was also called as a witness for the defendants, and testified that at the time of the collision and for several months prior thereto she had been in Oakland attending upon her sick grandchild; that she knew nothing whatever as to the collision until some time thereafter, nor of the movements or transactions of her husband on that day, and particularly nothing as to the grocery transaction; that she owned the ranch and the automobile, which was used as a pleasure car by the family; that the ranch was leased to Chinese, and required no personal attention whatever; that as to the groceries and other merchandise bought for the home on the ranch Mr. Ainsworth looked after and handled all these things, and that she did not handle any of those matters herself, but that Mr. Ainsworth personally attended to them. Upon the cross-examination of this witness it developed that she knew very little about the management of the ranch, the ordering of household supplies, or the payment of the bills, and less about the possession of any definite income of Mr. Ainsworth except that derived from the proceeds of the ranch, which she received in the form of checks and either deposited in the bank or gave to her husband to deposit in her name; her husband having no bank account. The disposal of these proceeds she sums up as follows:

"Well, it is paid at the end of the year. I don't know exactly; I couldn't tell exactly how it is paid. Sometimes it is divided up with the Chinese, and the balance is divided up and paid against our bills, and I guess I may say that some of the bills are paid in checks, and then in case we do not put it in the bank sometimes they are paid in cash."

From this quite unsatisfactory statement of the situation it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the main, if not only, reliance of the Ainsworth household was upon the proceeds of the ranch, and that the collection and distribution of these was left almost wholly in the hands of Mr. Ainsworth, who, aside from these proceeds, had no definite or sufficient income of his own with which to meet the household or family expenses. There was but one other witness called for the defendants upon this phase of the case, viz., the housekeeper at the Ainsworth home, who undertook to testify that on the day of the collision when Mr. Ainsworth came home he brought no groceries in the machine, but as to this her testimony was of little value, since she depended entirely upon her recollection as to a particular date nearly a year before the trial, and admitted that she did not see the machine or its contents when it came home on that day.

[3] It is the contention of the appellant from the foregoing state of the evidence that the inference of agency arising from the admitted fact that Mr. Ainsworth was at the time of the collision operating Mrs. Ainsworth's automobile with her consent is entirely overthrown by the evidence offered to the effect that at said time he was not acting upon any matter of business or concern of his wife, but was engaged in using it solely upon matters of his own personal business or concern. The appellant correctly states the law in that regard, as laid down in the case of Spence v. Fisher, 184 Cal. 209, 193 P. 255, 14 A. L. R. 1083, but the difficulty with the appellant's contention lies, not with the law, but with its application to the facts of the particular case. In the case of Spence v. Fisher, supra, the evidence was clear and uncontradicted that the 19 year old daughter of the owner of the automobile, who maintained it for the general convenience, use and pleasure of his family, was, at the time of the injury, caused by her negligent driving of the same, using the car solely for the pleasure of herself and her guests. This case is in entire harmony with the cases of Fahey v. Madden, supra; Maupin v. Solomon, supra; Dierks v. Newsom, supra, and the other cases above cited, with relation to the sufficiency of the inference of agency prima facie to sustain a verdict in the absence of clear and uncontradicted proof to the contrary. In the case of Dierks v. Newsom, supra, the District Court of Appeal, while applying the rule for which the appellant herein contends to the facts of that case, held that the evidence offered to rebut the inference of agency was neither clear nor uncontradicted, but was substantially conflicting, and that in such a case the inference of agency was not overthrown. In the case of Grantham v. Ordway, supra, it was held that the inference of agency arising from the operation by another of the defendant's car with the latter's consent would not be overthrown by evidence which was conflicting, and which was not free from justifiable doubt. In the case of Randolph v. Hunt, supra, the same doctrine was applied, and this court upon petition for hearing herein denied said petition upon the ground that the evidence whereby the defendant sought to relieve himself from the effect of the inference of agency was conflicting, and, when resolved by the jury against the defendant, would not be reviewed by this court. This case comes clearly within the rule laid down and adhered to in the foregoing cases. The evidence upon which the appellant relies to overcome the inference of agency arising from the operation of her automobile by her husband with her consent at the time of the plaintiff's injuries is neither clear nor uncontradicted. If, in fact, her said husband was engaged in conveying to her home goods and merchandise which he had purchased on her account and as her agent at the store which was accustomed to furnish such supplies to him only as such agent and upon her credit, the inference would not only be not overthrown, but would be supported by such a state of facts. While it is true that the defendant A. G. Ainsworth testified most positively to the contrary, there is the testimony of three witnesses which not only contradict but discredit the said witness; and there is also other testimony and other circumstances which, if believed by the jury, would utterly overthrow his evidence in that regard. This evidence and these circumstances were presented to the jury in the plaintiff's main case, and it cannot be said, therefore, that the plaintiff's only reliance for a verdict was upon the inference of agency arising from the fact that the defendant A. G. Ainsworth was operating his wife's automobile with her consent at the time the plaintiff's injuries were received. There was considerable proof presented upon the plaintiff's main case tending to show, not only that the defendant A. G. Ainsworth had for years been acting as the general agent of his wife in the collection and expenditure of the proceeds of her separate property, but that he was acting in that capacity at the very moment of the collision in the conveyance by the use of her automobile of family provisions which he had purchased with such proceeds to the family home which his wife was thus maintaining upon the ranch which was her separate property and estate.

[4] It is, however, contended by the appellant that under the law, as laid down in section 156 of the Civil Code, the husband is the head of the family, and that, this being so it must be presumed that he was acting as such, and not as the agent of his wife in purchasing and conveying household supplies to the family home. It is true that, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, such a presumption would arise and would prevail; but this is a disputable presumption, and is subject to be overthrown by evidence that the wife is in fact the furnisher of the family home, and the substantial, if not sole, supplier of the needs, sustenance, support, and luxuries of the household. There was sufficient evidence in this case, if believed by the jury, to sustain its conclusion establishing these facts, and, this being so, the presumption would be overthrown. We are satisfied that the evidence in this case, considered as a whole, was sufficient to support its verdict in the plaintiff's favor, and, this being so, the judgment is affirmed.

McCARTHY v. GRIDER et al. (Civ. 2860.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 23, 1925. Rehearing Denied May 25, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 22, 1925.)

1. Tender ⟹11—Code sections held inapplicable, where payment of money is required by party making offer, and latter not able to comply.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2074, 2076, and Civ. Code, § 1496, relating to tenders, are applicable only in those particular instances specified therein, and have no reference to other essentials of valid tender, nor where transaction, as to which offer is made, requires payment of money by party making offer, and latter is not able to comply with offer in that particular.

2. Tender ⟹11—Inability of offerer to perform evidence that offer not made in good faith.

Under Civ. Code, § 1493, an offer involving payment of money as condition precedent to performance of reciprocal act by offerer must be made in good faith, and, where offerer is not able to perform, such inability is indubitable evidence that offer is not made in good faith.

3. Tender ⟹11—Offerer must be both willing and able to perform according to terms of offer.

Under Civ. Code, § 1495, a party making an offer must not only be willing but able to perform according to terms of his offer.

⟹For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

4. Tender ⟸11—Statutory requirements that offer be made in good faith and offerer able to perform held not dispensed with by other provisions.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2074, and Civ. Code, § 1496, dispensing with actual production of money when offer is made in writing, but not accepted, does not dispense with requirements of Civ. Code, §§ 1493, 1495, requiring offer to be made in good faith, and that offerer be able to perform according to terms of his offer.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⟸170—Facts held to show that vendee's offer of performance invalid because of his inability to perform according to terms thereof.

A tender by vendee, under contract of sale of land, requiring payment of money to make good offer, as condition to conveyance of legal title by vendor, held invalid and without legal force, where vendee was not able to perform according to offer, in that he did not have sufficient amount of money to comply with terms of offer.

6. Tender ⟸15(1)—Right to object to offer because of fatal infirmity may arise independent of statute, and is available to offeree.

The right to object to an offer to perform some act because of a fatal infirmity therein, not constituting valid ground of objection, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2076, arises independent of statute, and is always available to whom offer is made.

7. Tender ⟸11—That offeree unprepared to perform no justification for offerer's inability.

The fact that offeree is unprepared to perform does not furnish any justification for offerer's inability to perform, nor change what would otherwise be an ineffectual offer into a bona fide and effective tender.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by T. G. McCarthy against C. K. Grider and another to rescind contract for the purchase of real property. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hawkins & Hawkins and J. W. Hawkins, all of Modesto, for appellants.

R. B. Maxey, of Modesto, for respondent.

HART, J. The defendants, prior to and at the time of the transaction upon which this action is founded, were the owners of lots 30 and 31, block No. 515, of the city of Modesto, in the county of Stanislaus. On the 1st day of September, 1920, the defendants and the plaintiff entered into and executed a written contract, whereby the former sold to the latter said lots for the sum of $4,800, of which the sum of $1,000 was to be and was paid upon the execution of said contract, and the balance to be paid in monthly installments of $30 or more until January 1, 1921, "at which time said monthly installments shall be increased to $35 or more for each month," deferred payments to bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. The contract provided that the vendee should be let into immediate possession of the premises; that time shall be of the essence of the contract; that, if the vendee failed to pay any of the installments as stipulated within 30 days after the same became due, the vendors shall be released from all obligation to convey said property, in which event the vendee shall forfeit all right to said property, and all payments theretofore made by him shall be deemed rental for the use of the premises while in the possession of the vendee. The contract proceeds:

"The vendors, upon receiving payments, at the times and in the manner hereinbefore specified, agree to execute and deliver to the said vendee, or to his assigns, a good, sufficient, and marketable deed, free and clear of all liens and claims, and incumbrances, except permitted or suffered by said vendee.

"The said vendors further agree that upon payment of twenty-four hundred ($2,400.00) dollars of said purchase price, in the manner hereinbefore specified, by said vendee, they, the said vendors, will convey the title to the said premises, as set forth in the paragraph immediately preceding, upon the execution by the said vendee and his wife, of a deed of trust on said premises to secure the unpaid purchase price. Said deed of trust shall be a first lien upon said premises, and shall be executed according to the same terms as are stated in this contract for payment of balance due, and interest to be paid semiannually in addition to the monthly installments paid during the six months."

The total sum of $1,984 was paid by plaintiff to defendants under said contract and, upon grounds which will presently be stated, this action was brought by the former to obtain a decree rescinding, canceling and setting aside said contract and a judgment for the moneys paid by the plaintiff to the defendants under and according to the stipulations thereof, with interest on the sum of $1,000—the initial payment under the contract—from the 1st day of September, 1920. The plaintiff was awarded judgment as prayer for, and the defendants appeal.

It will be noticed that the contract provides in effect that the vendee may pay any sum on the lots in excess of the specified monthly installments, from which it is manifest that he could have paid the entire indebtedness at any time had he desired to do so.

The amended complaint, after recapitulating the provisions of the contract to the effect that, upon the payment by the plaintiff of the sum of $2,400 on the purchase price of the lots, the defendants would execute to the former a "good, sufficient, and marketable deed, free and clear of all liens and claims, and incumbrances," etc., alleges that on the 28th day of December, 1921, the plaintiff tendered to defendants the sum of $890; said sum being the amount necessary to make the payments total the sum of $2,400, thereby entitling the plaintiff, under the terms of the contract, to a deed from defendants conveying the property to him, and that, at the same time, the plaintiff deposited "with the American National Bank of Modesto a deed of trust, duly executed and acknowledged by the plaintiff and his wife, on the premises," as required by the contract of sale. The complaint further alleges:

"That subsequently thereto and on or about the 6th day of January, 1922, defendants herein tendered to plaintiff a deed to said lands and premises hereinabove described; that said deed was a bargain and sale deed in the usual and customary form, and subject to the payment of taxes levied or assessed against said property."

The complaint, proceeding, states that, upon the tender by defendants of a deed to said property, plaintiff caused the title to the lots to be investigated by an abstract company, with the result that it was disclosed that on the 13th day of August, 1921, Clara E. Newport and others had brought an action in the superior court of Stanislaus county against one W. H. Hatton, the defendants, and others to obtain a decree quieting title in favor of plaintiffs therein and against the defendants herein to certain lands, including the lots involved in this controversy, and that said action of Clara E. Newport and others against defendants herein and others "is still pending and undetermined and constitutes a lien or claim or incumbrance against said property"; that a lis pendens in said Newport action was filed for record and recorded on the 13th day of August, 1921. It is further alleged:

"That on or about the 7th day of January, 1922, plaintiff herein notified defendants of the claim, lien, or incumbrance existing against said property, and demanded a title thereto in conformity with the terms of the agreement hereinbefore specified, but to perfect same defendants have, and do now still fail and refuse so to do.

"That on or about the 18th day of January, 1922, plaintiff herein surrendered the possession of the said lands and premises to defendants herein, rescinded the contract dated September 1, 1920, and demanded from the defendants the return of the moneys heretofore paid to defendants under and by virtue of the terms of the said agreement."

The answer specifically denies the allegations of the complaint, except one or two, which, with certain qualifications in the nature of an avoidance of the effect thereof, it admits.

It appears that the case of Newport v. Hatton et al., above referred to, was founded upon an alleged fraudulent transaction, whereby the plaintiffs therein were wrongfully divested of their title to a certain body of land within which the lots in question are embraced. The demurrer to the complaint in said action was sustained without leave to amend, whereupon judgment was rendered and entered in favor of the defendants therein and from which the plaintiffs therein appealed to the Supreme Court. That court, in disposing of the appeal, affirmed the judgment as to all the respondents (defendants) other than W. H. and Ora D. Hatton, and, as to the latter, reversed the judgment. Newport et al. v. Hatton et al., 66 Cal. Dec. 351. Within due time, however, a petition for a rehearing was filed and granted, and, upon a reconsideration of the appeal, the judgment was reversed as to all the respondents, and the "cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrers of the various defendants." Newport et al. v. Hatton et al., 231 P. 987.

On December 29, 1921, the plaintiff served the defendants with a written notice, which, after referring to the provisions of the contract of sale to the effect that therein it was stipulated, among other things, that, upon the payment by plaintiff of the total sum of $2,400 of the purchase or contract price of the lots, the defendants would execute and deliver to plaintiff a good, sufficient, and marketable deed to said property, free and clear of all liens, claims and incumbrances, upon the execution by plaintiff and his wife of a deed of trust to and upon said premises, to secure the unpaid balance of the purchase price, contained the following:

"You will therefore take notice that I have this day deposited with the American National Bank of Modesto the moneys to pay the balance due under the terms of said contract to you, together with a deed of trust, for the sum of $2,400 due on or before 3 years, payable to your order, payable in monthly payments or installments of $35 or more, each month, with interest from date until paid at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, said interest to be paid semiannually."

The notice further stated that plaintiff had been and was then ready to pay any interest which might become due on the unpaid balance of the purchase price from September, 1921, to the date of the execution of the deed, and then demanded from defendants a deed conveying to plaintiff the property free from any and all liens, incumbrances, etc.

In reply to said notice, the defendants, on January 6, 1922, served upon plaintiff a written notice, tendering a deed conveying said lots to plaintiff, conditioned for the payment by plaintiff to defendants of the sum of $890, as principal and the sum of $77.63 for interest to the date of the execution of said notice, and the delivery to defendants by plaintiff of a deed of trust on said lots, together with a promissory note for the unpaid balance of the purchase price. Said notice stated that defendants "will immediately place said deed in escrow with the American National Bank of Modesto to be delivered to you (plaintiff) upon the conditions herein stated." Accordingly, on the 6th day of January, 1922, the defendants delivered to the bank above named a deed, conveying the lots to the plaintiff, to be held in escrow by said bank and delivered to plaintiff upon the latter's compliance with the conditions specified in the notice to plaintiff from defendants, and last hereinabove referred to. The said deed so delivered to the bank was accompanied by instructions to the bank in accord with the said notice from defendants to the plaintiff.

Thereafter the plaintiff addressed and delivered to defendants a letter in which he stated that the latter had failed to comply with the provision of the contract of sale that they (defendants) would, upon the payment by plaintiff of the total sum of $2,400, convey to the latter, by deed, the lots in question, free and clear of all liens, claims, incumbrances, etc., and that, therefore, he refused "to accept the deed to this property at the present time" for the reason just stated, and calling the attention of the defendants to the report of the Stanislaus Land & Abstract Company upon the title to said lots. By said letter the defendants were further notified that they would be allowed 5 days in which to perfect the title to the property, and that, "failing therein, the agreement heretofore made and dated September, 1920, will be rescinded, and a demand made upon you (defendants) for the return of the moneys heretofore paid thereunder." This letter was accompanied by the report of said abstract company on the status of the title to the property. By said report it was shown that the action in which Clara E. Newport and others seek a judgment quieting their alleged title to the lots as against Hatton, the defendants herein and others had been brought and was then pending in the superior court of Stanislaus county, and that a notice of lis pendens had been and was still recorded in the office of the county recorder of Stanislaus county.

On the 18th day of January, 1922, the plaintiff served a notice in writing on the defendants that he rescinded the contract of sale and that he surrendered possession of the premises to defendants. Accompanying said notice of rescission was a quitclaim deed to the premises, conveying same to defendants. Said notice stated that the ground of the rescission was that defendants had, through their own fault, caused the consideration for said contract of sale to fail, in that the "title thereto is not a merchantable title, and for the further reason that the title * * * is not clear of all liens and claims and incumbrances," etc. Demand was also made in said notice for a return to plaintiff of all moneys paid by him to defendants on account of said contract of sale; the payments made being itemized therein.

The defendants, in answer to the said notice of rescission, on the 19th day of January, 1922, notified the plaintiff, by letter, that they refused to rescind said contract, and to accept the quitclaim deed to said premises executed by plaintiff quitclaiming said property to defendants, and that they refused to pay to plaintiff the sum of $1,984, as demanded by plaintiff and which constituted the sum paid by the latter on the purchase price. At the same time the defendants returned to the plaintiff said quitclaim deed.

There are many points urged for a reversal of the judgment, but, as we view the case, the points made and the argument supporting them on the one hand and confuting them on the other cover a wider range than that within which we are justified in circumscribing the consideration of the appeal.

There is no claim, nor could such a claim be well founded, that there is not sufficient support for the finding and the conclusion of law that, by reason of the action of Newport et al. v. Hatton et al., to quiet title to certain lands of which the lots in question were a part, which action was pending and undetermined at the time plaintiff offered to complete the payment of the sum of money entitling him to a deed to the property (and which was still pending at the time of the institution of this action), there then existed a claim against and, consequently, a cloud upon the title to the lots, and that, therefore, defendants were without ability to convey a marketable or merchantable title to the lots. But the defendants urge the contention, among others likewise pressed upon us, that the offer of plaintiff to them, dated December 28, 1921, to complete the payment of the sum of $2,400, which payment, either by the installments specified or otherwise, would, according to the terms of the contract of sale, entitle the latter to a deed from defendants conveying the lots to him, did not constitute a valid offer or tender, for the reason that, when the offer was made, the plaintiff was without ability to make it good. To this proposition the plaintiff counters with the contention that, inasmuch as defendants failed to object to the offer on that ground or for that reason, at the time the same was made, they waived said objection or the right to urge said objection, and are, as a consequence, estopped from now making such objection. This position of the plaintiff is founded on his construction or conception of the meaning and intent of sections 2074 and 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The first of the sections named reads:

"An offer in writing to pay a particular sum of money, or to deliver a written instrument or specific personal property, is, if not accepted, equivalent to the actual production and tender of the money, instrument, or property."

See, also, section 1496, Civ. Code, to the same effect.

The section secondly mentioned provides:

"The person to whom a tender is made must, at the time, specify any objection he may have to the money, instrument, or property, or he must be deemed to have waived it; and if the objection be to the amount of money, the terms of the instrument, or the amount or kind of property, he must specify the amount, terms, or kind which he requires, or be precluded from objecting afterwards."

[1-4] It will be observed that both of the above sections are exclusive as to the matters as to which objections to an offer to perform an act are required to be made at the time such offer is made on penalty, if not made, of being bound to a presumptive waiver and its corollary, an estoppel. In other words, those sections are applicable only in those particular instances expressly specified therein, and have no reference or application to other essentials of a valid tender. At any rate, they have no application where the transaction as to which the offer is made requires the payment of money by the party making the offer and the latter is not able to comply with the offer in that particular. One of the essentials of a valid offer where it involves the performance of an act which calls for the payment of money as a condition precedent to the performance of a reciprocal and concurrent act by the party to whom the offer is made is that it "must be made in good faith" (Civ. Code, § 1493), and where the offer of performance is made by a party who is at the time of the offer not able to perform it in that particular; that is, if at the time he is without the money necessary to make the offer good and knows it, such inability is indubitable evidence that the offer is not made in good faith. But our Code goes further and declares that—

"An offer of performance is of no effect if the person making it is not able and willing to perform according to the offer." Civ. Code, § 1495.

By this provision the party making the offer must not only be willing but able to perform according to the terms of his offer. It is true that, by section 2074 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 1496 of the Civil Code, where an offer to perform is made in writing, but is not accepted, the actual production of the money is not necessary, but these sections do not dispense with the requirements of sections 1493 and 1495 of the Civil Code. Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 17, 91 P. 1001. That case quotes approvingly the following from Ladd v. Mason, 10 Or. 314:

"Surely the justice and good sense of the Legislature should not be impugned by such a construction of this provision as would place its framers in the position of having intended to provide a mode whereby a party might make a valid tender if his offer should not be accepted, without the readiness or ability to make it good, in the event of its acceptance."

Again, in that case, our Supreme Court likewise quotes the following excerpt from Holladay v. Holladay, 13 Or. 523, 11 P. 260, 12 P. 821:

"This statute dispenses with the necessity of actually producing the money with the offer, 'but this does not dispense with the necessity of the party having the money in fact.' "

See, also, Allen v. Chatfield, 172 Cal. 60, 68, 156 P. 47; Kuhns v. Chicago, etc., Co., 65 Iowa, 528, 22 N. W. 661; Shugart v. Pattee, 37 Iowa, 422; McCourt v. Johns, 33 Or. 561, 53 P. 601.

[5] The evidence, without conflict, shows that plaintiff was not able, at the time his offer of performance was made, to satisfy or make good said offer in the particular mentioned. Indeed, the plaintiff himself does not claim that he had on deposit in the bank named in his written offer the money requisite to make good the offer of performance. In fact, he admitted that he then had no money in the bank at all and practically admitted that he had no money anywhere sufficient in amount to comply with the terms of his offer.

C. D. Swan, an officer of the American National Bank of Modesto, with which the deed of trust executed by plaintiff in favor of defendants was deposited, testified that plaintiff, about the time the latter served on defendants the writing containing the pretended tender, deposited with the bank, to be by it held in escrow, a promissory note, in favor of defendants for the balance which would remain unpaid on the purchase price after the $2,400 had been paid, together with a trust deed to said lots for the benefit of the Griders or to secure said promissory note, but that he did not then deposit in the bank the money with which to make good his tender, that is, to make up the said $2,400; that plaintiff did not at that time have any money on deposit in the bank for any purpose. The witness stated, however, that at or just prior to the depositing of said note and deed of trust with the bank a party by the name of Way called at the bank with plaintiff and stated that if the bank would let plaintiff have a sufficient amount of money to complete the $2,400 payment, so that the latter would be in a position to make good his tender, he (Way) would indorse plaintiff's note to the bank for the money so loaned. To this proposition Swan, for the bank, assented, but, so the witness stated, the arrangement thus proposed was never carried out. No note was ever executed by plaintiff and Way in favor of the bank and no money was ever deposited in the bank by either for the purpose of satisfying the tender or for any purpose. Swan further testified that the bank would not have loaned the money to plaintiff on his unsecured note, nor would the bank have loaned plaintiff the amount required to complete the $2,400 payment on a second mortgage on the lots. In brief, neither at the time the tender was made, nor at any time immediately succeeding that event, did the plaintiff have available the necessary amount of money with which he could complete the $2,400 and so make good his offer, and at no time after the service of his written tender on defendants or before bringing this action did he show his ability to make such payment.

Way did not testify, but, so far as the record shows to the contrary, his proposal to indorse plaintiff's note at the bank for the amount required to complete the $2,400 payment was merely that of a volunteer. He was to be an accommodation indorser only. He was under no legal obligation to indorse or become a party to any note which plaintiff might have offered the bank to evidence a loan of money sufficient to make good his tender. In actions by brokers to recover commissions for procuring a purchaser of property, it is requisite, to support such actions, that it be shown that such proposed purchaser is ready, able, and willing to make the purchase, and where it appears in any such action that the purported ability of the purchaser to make the purchase is wholly dependent upon the verbal promises of a third party, without consideration, to assist him in securing the money necessary to make the purchase, then the latter is not shown to be able to make such purchase, and the broker is hence not entitled to recover. He has not shown that he produced a purchaser either able or ready to purchase. Merzoian v. Kludjian, 183 Cal. 422, 191 P. 673, per Lawlor, J.; 4 Cal. Jur. 591, note 1; A. L. R. 528. The principle thus stated is, of course, applicable to any case where, as here, an offer to perform an act carries with it the necessity for the payment of money to make good the offer of performance as a condition to the performance of a concurrent condition by him to whom the offer is made.

Measured by the rules of law above set forth, it is clear that the undisputed evidence shows that the so-called offer or tender by the plaintiff was entirely invalid or without legal force or effect.

[6] The authorities cited by counsel for the respondent deal with cases which fall entirely within the terms of section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and are not in point here. There is, as has been shown, no objection here to the amount of the money tendered, or the trust deed or the sufficiency thereof. The objection is, as pointed out above, that the plaintiff was wholly without ability, financially, to make good his purported offer to pay the defendants the sum of money specified therein and which it was necessary for him to pay to entitle him, under the contract of sale, to a deed to the premises. The right to object to an offer to perform some act because of a fatal infirmity therein which does not come within those constituting valid grounds of objection thereto under section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure or other sections of our Codes arises, of course, independently of statute, and is always available to him to whom the offer is made.

[7] To what has been said above it may be added that the fact that the party to whom the offer is made is also unprepared to perform, does not furnish any justification for the inability of the offerer to perform, nor "change what would otherwise be an ineffectual and shadowy form into a substantial, bona fide, and effective tender." Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 17, 23, 91 P. 1001, 1004.

The judgment is reversed.

QUADRO v. WIDEMANN. (Civ. 5042.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 30, 1925.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⟸326(1)—Landlord, leasing farm to tenant for portion of crop, bound to bear his own loss, where crop damaged by rain.

Where landlord leased farm to tenant for a portion of crop raised, he was bound to bear his own loss, when tenant on sale of crop was compelled to accept reduced price, because crop had become damaged by rain.

2. Frauds, statute of ⟸17—Promise to answer for debt of third person must be in writing.

Promise to answer for the debt of a third person falls within Civ. Code, § 1624, and must be in writing.

3. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Frauds, statute of ⟸159—Whether plaintiff's oral agreement to answer for debt of third person was original promise was question of fact, and, evidence being conflicting, trial court's decision was conclusive thereon.

Whether plaintiff's oral agreement to answer for debt of a third person was made on consideration that defendant cancel obligation of original obligor, and therefore an original promise, within Civ. Code, § 2794, and not required to be in writing, was a question of fact, and, evidence being conflicting, trial court's decision in plaintiff's favor was conclusive on appeal.

Action by M. S. Quadro against C. H. Widemann. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Albert Mansfield, of Redwood City, for appellant.

J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $592.09, in an action for money had and received by defendant for the use of plaintiff. The facts which gave rise to the action are as follows:

The plaintiff had rented certain land from the defendant and was to pay a crop rental of one-third of the crop raised. A written agreement had been entered into between plaintiff and McGill & Co., by which the latter was to furnish seed to plaintiff and purchase the crop of peas raised upon the land at the rate of 8 cents per pound, after receiving from said crop an amount equivalent to the seed furnished. The defendant signed this contract between plaintiff and McGill, thus providing for the sale of his share of the crop. The contract also provided that 90 per cent. of the purchase price should be paid when the peas were delivered to McGill & Co. and the balance after they were recleaned.

When plaintiff delivered the peas to McGill & Co. under this contract, the company would not pay for the peas until they had been examined, because they were defective and not fit for seed. Later McGill & Co. refused to pay for the peas at the contract price, because they had been rained on and their value greatly impaired. After some negotiations, and the commencement of an action to recover the purchase price of the peas, plaintiff gave defendant an order requesting him to settle with McGill & Co. After some delay defendant finally settled the claim upon the basis of 4½ cents a pound for the peas.

[1] The questions involved upon the appeal arise with reference to various counterclaims set up by the defendant. Two of these claims were allowed and two were disallowed. One of the latter sought to charge plaintiff with the difference between the price at which the peas were contracted to be sold (8 cents per pound) and the price which defendant finally received for his portion of the crop (4½ cents per pound). The position of appellant with reference to this claim is that the plaintiff should have collected for the peas at the contract price when they were delivered to McGill & Co. and because he failed to do so the defendant was forced to take a reduced price. The answer to this is that the plaintiff testified that McGill & Co. would not pay for the peas upon delivery because they were damaged. Apparently the condition of the peas was such that McGill & Co. were not legally obligated to pay the contract price for the same, because an action was brought by plaintiff, and negotiations entered into between the parties, and the defendant himself undertook to make the collection and all without avail. Defendant was finally compelled to agree to compromise the claim and accept 4½ cents a pound. By the contract between the parties hereto the defendant was to receive a portion of the crop, and, when the crop became damaged by rain, defendant was bound to bear his own loss. There is no merit in this counterclaim, and the trial court so concluded.

[2, 3] Another counterclaim arose out of an alleged oral agreement of plaintiff to answer for the debt of a third person. Such a promise falls within the provisions of section 1624, Civil Code, and must be in writing. Appellant seeks to meet this obstacle by contending that the record shows plaintiff's promise was made upon the consideration that defendant cancel the obligation of the original obligor, and therefore was deemed an original promise. Section 2794, Civ. Code. This was a question of fact upon which the evidence was conflicting, and the trial court has decided the same in favor of the plaintiff. This determination finds support in the testimony of the plaintiff and of his brother, corroborated by the conduct of defendant in attempting to collect the debt from the estate of the original debtor after the time of the alleged substitution of obligors. The question, being one of fact, is closed upon appeal.

PEOPLE v. JORDAN. (Cr. 1185.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 23, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⊂⊃442—Marriage certificate properly excluded, in absence of proof of signature of person authorized to perform marriage ceremony.

To render marriage certificate admissible, proof of signature of person by whom it purports to have been signed and of his authority to perform marriage ceremony is necessary, and, on failure of such proof, certificate was properly excluded.

2. Criminal law ⊂⊃598(4)—Continuance to obtain additional evidence to render marriage certificate admissible held properly denied.

Where defendant in prosecution for bigamy had ample time to prepare for trial and knew that he would have to affirmatively prove that marriage was void by reason of prior subsisting marriage, held, that court did not abuse his discretion in refusing to grant application for continuance, not made until major portion of evidence was introduced, in order to enable defendant to obtain testimony which would render a marriage license and certificate admissible in support of his defense.

3. Criminal law ⊜655(1)—Trial judge's expressions of impatience held not prejudicial.

Statements of court consisting chiefly in expressions of impatience, not containing any expression indicating opinion of judge concerning guilt or innocence of defendant, were not seriously prejudicial to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

J. A. Jordan was convicted of bigamy, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. I. Rosin, C. R. Morfoot, and L. M. Powell, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The information charged that the defendant committed the crime of bigamy by marrying one Sadie Kessler while he was the lawful husband of Grace Jordan. The defendant was convicted and sentenced. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The defense presented by appellant was and is that the marriage to Grace Jordan was void by reason of a prior subsisting marriage of defendant to one Cora Leak.

After the defendant had testified to some facts tending to prove his marriage to Cora Leak, he offered in evidence an exemplified copy of a marriage license purporting to have been issued by a county judge in Mayes county, Okl., and which had indorsed thereon a certificate of marriage purporting to have been signed by "H. A. Pearce, Christian Minister." It was certified by the county clerk that said instrument was "a full, true and correct copy of marriage license and certificate as the same appears of record and on file in my said office."

[1] Appellant's first point on appeal is that the court erred in sustaining the district attorney's objection to said marriage license and certificate, which objection was that no proper foundation had been laid for its admission in evidence. But we think that the ruling of the court was correct. There was no testimony of any witness who saw the certificate of marriage signed by Mr. Pearce, and there was no evidence of the genuineness of the signature. A marriage certificate does not prove itself. Proof of the signature of the person by whom it purports to have been signed and of his authority to perform the marriage ceremony is necessary. The record of such an unacknowledged private writing as this is not made evidence of the truth of the recitals contained in it. People v. Le Doux, 155 Cal. 535, 550, 102 P. 517; People v. Spitzer, 57 Cal. App. 593, 208 P. 181.

[2] The court did not err in refusing a continuance for the purpose of enabling the defendant to send to Oklahoma for testimony to establish the additional facts which would have made admissible in evidence the said marriage license and certificate of marriage. The record shows that the defendant had ample time to prepare for the trial of the case. Both he and his attorneys knew that he would make the affirmative defense to which we have referred. Therefore they knew, or should have known, that they would have need of testimony to establish the facts of that defense. The application for a continuance was not made until after a large part of the evidence in the case had been heard by the jury. The circumstances as shown by the record do not indicate any abuse of discretion by the court in its refusal to grant a further continuance of the trial.

[3] Finally, it is claimed by appellant that he was prejudiced by certain remarks of the court, made in the presence of the jury, and that the court erred also in refusing to instruct the jury to disregard those remarks. The statements referred to could not have been seriously prejudicial to the defendant. They did not contain any expression indicating an opinion of the judge concerning the guilt or innocence of the defendant, or concerning the truth or falsity of any of the evidence. The statements chiefly consisted in expressions of impatience arising out of the fact that defendant had caused subpoenas to issue for the attendance of certain witnesses, and then had not caused those witnesses to testify. It may be conceded that the defendant should not have been criticized for his conduct of the case in relation to those witnesses.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ANDERSON v. PALLADINE et al.

(Civ. 2891.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 25, 1925.)

1. Judgment ⊜743(2)—When only declaring ownership of "timber" under deed, meaning as used in deed may be inquired into.

Judgment that defendant was the owner of the timber standing on land at certain time, notwithstanding it had not been removed in time provided by deed thereof, not attempting to define word "timber," court, in proceeding for injunction, based on violation of judgment, could examine into and ascertain the meaning of the word as used in deed.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1195(3)—Opinion on former appeal law of case.

Ownership of parties to land and standing timber thereon being distinctly set forth in the opinion of appellate court, such opinion is law of the case, in proceeding for injunction, based on violation of judgment of trial court entered pursuant to such opinion, though the judgment be interlocutory.

3. Logs and logging ⟸3(7)—Deed of standing timber imports right of removal only in proper manner.

Deed conveying standing timber and conferring right to remove it, while placing on land the burdens unavoidably incident to cutting and removal, imports only right to remove in the usual, customary, and proper manner, as understood and applied in logging and lumber business.

4. Logs and logging ⟸3(7)—Proper manner of removing standing timber, pursuant to conveyance, may be ascertained from United States government rules.

In ascertainment and application of proper manner for removal of timber suitable for merchantable purposes, pursuant to a conveyance thereof, resort may be had to United States government rules.

5. Injunction ⟸190 — For violation of judgment by manner of removal of standing timber, removal may not be permanently enjoined.

While, if defendant in its logging has violated judgment fixing its ownership of standing timber, with right to remove it, it is liable to plaintiff, owner of the land, for any damages therefrom, and may be restrained from so violating the judgment, and from removing the timber in other than proper manner, which the order may define and set forth, it may not be permanently enjoined from removing the timber, thus working an entire forfeiture of its timber.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Gustaf Anderson against A. G. Palladine and others. From the judgment granting perpetual injunction, defendant Sanger Lumber Company appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Peckinpah & Carter, of Fresno, for appellant.

F. E. Cook and Frank Kauke, both of Fresno, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. On the 6th day of April, A. D. 1887, the plaintiff, then being the owner of the lands and premises hereinafter described, executed and delivered to the grantors of the appellant a certain instrument of conveyance, transferring title to certain timber situate in Fresno county, described as follows, to wit:

"All the timber now growing and standing on the northeast quarter of section 22, in township 13 south, range 28 east of Mt. Diablo base and meridian, together with the right and privilege of free and undisturbed ingress and egress in, upon and from said real property at any and all times within 10 years from the date of this grant, to cut and remove from said parcel of land the timber hereby granted from time to time as said grantees may elect, and together with the right to construct logging roads, tramways, trails, and railroads and such other ways and means as said grantees may require to enable them to cut and remove said timber, and together with all other rights and privileges necessary for the full enjoyment by said grantees of this grant."

No attempt was made by any of the grantees of the plaintiff to remove said timber prior to the institution of this action in the year 1915. At about this time the plaintiff began this action to quiet his title to the above-described premises, and to have it adjudged and decreed that the defendants possessed no right, title, or interest therein, or to the timber then standing and being on said premises. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed. This appeal was heard and determined in Division 1 of the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, and reported in 39 Cal. App. 256, 178 P. 553. In this opinion, the judgment of the trial court was reversed and the rights of the respective parties in and to the premises adjudged and decreed to be as follows: That the plaintiff was the owner of the lands and premises described in his complaint and that the appellant, Sanger Lumber Company, was the owner of the timber standing and being on the premises at the time of the execution of the instrument before referred to. In the opinion of the appellate court rendered in this cause, the trial court was further directed to proceed according to the views expressed in said opinion entering judgment for the plaintiff quieting his title as prayed for, subject to the ownership of said timber by the appellant, with the right in the appellant to remove the same from the above-described premises within such reasonable time as the court might determine, and to enter an interlocutory decree to that effect, fixing the time for appellant to remove the timber from said land, and further providing that, if the appellant failed so to do, the plaintiff might remove the same, and further providing for determining and adjudging the cost and expenses, and also providing that the trial court should retain jurisdiction of the cause for the purpose of an accounting between the parties, in the event that appellant failed to remove the timber within the specified time.

Upon the going down of the remittitur, the trial court entered judgment, in accordance with said opinion, as follows, to wit:

"That the said defendant Sanger Lumber Company is the owner and holds title to all of the timber standing and growing on the northeast quarter (N. E. ¼) of section twenty-two (22), in township thirteen (13) south, of range twenty-eight (28) east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian, situate in the said county of Fresno, which timber was standing and growing thereon on the 6th day of April, 1887, and now remains thereon, together with the right and privilege of free and undisturbed ingress to and egress from, and upon and from, said real property to cut and remove said timber, at any and all times on and before the 31st day of December, 1924, as to that portion thereof on the northerly and easterly slope of said lands toward Hume lake and the mill and equipment of said defendant, and as to the remaining portion of said land at any and all times on or before the 31st day of December, 1926.

"That in cutting and removing said timber the defendant shall observe and comply with the rules of the United States government now in force relative to the cutting and removal of timber from lands of said government where timber is sold to purchasers thereof, and said defendant shall leave standing and being on the land hereinabove described all young trees which have grown thereon since the 6th day of April, 1887.

"That, if the said defendant shall fail, refuse, or neglect to so cut and remove the said timber from said land within the time hereinabove specified therefor, the plaintiff shall have full right to remove, and may remove, and sell the timber at the expense and for the benefit of said defendant, accounting to said defendant for the net proceeds thereof, and that if the said timber be not so cut and removed from said land by the defendant, within the said time, then, if plaintiff shall cut and remove same, said plaintiff shall be entitled to retain and may retain, from the proceeds of his sale of the said timber, the actual cost and expense of cutting and removing same; and if any of said timber be cut and removed from said land, either by the plaintiff or by the defendant, after the expiration of the time herein specified and allowed to the defendant for such cutting and removal by said defendant, then the plaintiff shall also receive such an amount as will reasonably compensate him for loss of the use and occupation of the soil from the time of the expiration of the period herein fixed by the court for such removal by the defendant up to the time of the actual removal thereof, which amount shall hereafter be determined by the court on application therefor.

"That this court shall have and retain full jurisdiction of this cause for the purpose of an accounting between the parties in the event the said defendant fails to remove its said timber from said land within the time herein specified therefor.

"That the court shall also have and retain jurisdiction of this cause for the purpose of hearing evidence and determining as to any damage or injury having been caused to the plaintiff at any time by said defendant in its performing the work of cutting and removing the timber from said land in the manner or at a time other than as herein authorized, and that either party to this action, at any time when occasion shall require, may apply to the court for a hearing in that respect, and for the determination of the damages, if any, so caused to or suffered by the plaintiff, and the amount to be paid plaintiff by the defendant by reason thereof, or by reason of any act or thing done or omitted by said defendant, at any time in cutting or removing said timber from said land.

"That the consideration of the question of loss to the plaintiff of the use and occupation of said land after the expiration of the period of time hereinabove specified, the damage, if any, that may be done by the defendant to the young trees of recent growth on said land, and an accounting as to any cost or expense incurred by the plaintiff in removing said timber on the failure of the defendant so to do as herein provided for, is reserved by this court, and shall be determined by this court as occasion therefor may hereafter arise, and as a proper application be made therefor by either party hereto."

After the entry of this judgment, the Sanger Lumber Company proceeded with the work of removing the timber from the described premises, and cut and removed therefrom all the timber standing and being on 40 acres thereof. The judgment last herein referred to was entered on or about the 16th day of May, 1923. Thereafter, and on or about the 25th day of June, 1923, upon affidavits made and filed in said cause, praying for an order that the defendant the Sanger Lumber Company be required to appear before said court to show cause why it was not in contempt for violating the provisions of said judgment, and for a temporary restraining order, prohibiting the further cutting and removing of timber during the hearing of said matter, and that the said defendant Sanger Lumber Company be prohibited, restrained, and enjoined from tearing, devastating, and destroying the young growth and trees under a certain size standing on said premises on the 6th day of April, 1887. The said trial court issued a temporary restraining order and order to show cause. Thereafter a hearing was had upon said affidavits and order to show cause. Whereupon oral and documentary testimony was introduced and thereafter the court entered the following order or judgment, to wit:

"Now therefore, by reason of the law and the findings of fact aforesaid, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the motion of plaintiff above named for a permanent restraining order be and the same is hereby granted.

"It is further ordered and decreed that a permanent injunction issue out of the above-entitled court directed to the defendant Sanger Lumber Company forever restraining and enjoining the defendant Sanger Lumber Company, its servants, agents, and employees from entering into or upon or in any manner conducting any logging operations upon the real property belonging to the plaintiff herein and more particularly described as follows, to wit: The northeast quarter of section 22, in township 13 south of range 28 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian."

A permanent injunction was thereupon issued, in conformity with said order or judgment. In the findings supporting this latter judgment of the court, it is found and determined by the court that the Sanger Lumber Company had not conducted its logging operations in accordance with government rules and regulations, in that said company had made use of what is known in the lumber trade as a high-lead line, which said high-lead line was placed at an elevation of approximately 90 feet above the ground, whereas, the rules and regulations provide that said line shall not be placed at an elevation greater than 35 feet above the ground, and further, that the said Sanger Lumber Company had violated the terms of the interlocutory judgment of said court, in that said defendant, without excuse or cause in conducting its said logging operations, made a barren waste of approximately 40 acres of the real property hereinabove described, in that all saplings and undergrowth standing and being on said real property were unnecessarily and without cause or excuse uprooted and strewn upon the ground; that said defendant had cut and removed from said real property trees which were not of a merchantable kind, character, or size on the 6th day of April, 1887. The court further found that the word "timber," as used in the instrument of sale first hereinabove referred to and also in the judgment of the court, had reference only to merchantable timber or timber capable of being converted into lumber suitable for building purposes, and included only standing trees which were at least 12 inches in diameter then being and standing on the ground on the 6th day of April, A. D. 1887, and that defendant did not own any timber standing and being upon said premises which had become merchantable since said date, and that in its logging operations the Sanger Lumber Company was only entitled to remove from said premises timber that was of the diameter before mentioned on the 6th day of April, 1887.

In the judgment entered by the trial court, in accordance with the opinion and directions contained in the opinion of the appellate court, supra, the word "timber" is used without any definition or further explanation than the mere use of the word, and the exact legal rights of the parties in and to the timber on said premises left in doubt. Under its interpretation of the judgment, the Sanger Lumber Company proceeded to take everything from the 40 acres referred to that could be converted into a merchantable commodity at the date of its logging operations, irrespective of the long lapse of time and the incident growth of the trees on said premises between the date of the execution of the instrument conveying title thereto and the year 1923, when the logging operations were being conducted. The trial court, upon the hearing of the application for an injunction, interpreted and applied the meaning of the word "timber" as meaning trees suitable for being converted into lumber adapted for construction or manufacturing purposes, etc., and having found that the Sanger Lumber Company was taking other trees therefrom, and also unnecessarily damaging the young growth on said premises, permanently enjoined the appellant from further logging operations. It is from this injunctive order or judgment that the Sanger Lumber Company appeals.

[1] On the part of the appellant it is argued that the judgment to which we have referred, fixing the rights of the parties in and to the premises, is a final judgment, and on the part of the respondent that the judgment is wholly interlocutory. We do not think the determination of this question is necessary for a decision in this case. Irrespective of whether the judgment entered by the trial court pursuant to the opinion of the appellate court is final or interlocutory, the legal rights of the parties are therein set forth and the law of the case concerning the legal rights of the parties, we think, fixed and determined by the appellate court in the opinion to which we have referred. The appellate court finds in its opinion that the plaintiff is the owner of the soil, subject to the ownership of the Sanger Lumber Company in and to the timber standing thereon. Other matters contained in the opinion relate to the manner in which the rights of the respective parties may be exercised and conserved. The Sanger Lumber Company is there determined to be the absolute owner of the timber that was standing upon said premises at the date of the execution of the instrument conveying title to its grantors. It will be observed that that instrument gave to the plaintiff's grantees certain rights and privileges, to wit:

"To cut and remove from said parcel of land the timber hereby granted from time to time as said grantees may elect, and together with the right to construct logging roads, tramways, trails, and railroads and such other ways and means as said grantees may require to enable them to cut and remove said timber, and, together with all other rights and privileges necessary for the full enjoyment by said grantees of this grant."

This necessarily imposed upon the lands and premises certain easements and conferred upon the plaintiff's grantees the right to do the things therein specified, the doing of which would undoubtedly impose burdens upon the lands belonging to the plaintiff. Whether the judgment which we are considering be considered as final or interlocutory, it did not attempt to define the word timber, and, in determining whether the Sanger Lumber Company was proceeding in accordance with the judgment of the court to remove the timber, and in ascertaining whether it was violating any of the provisions of said judgment, we think the court had jurisdiction to examine into and ascertain the meaning of the word timber as used in the instrument of conveyance under which the appellant claims title. In the case of Balderson v. Seeley, 160 Mich. 186, 125 N. W. 37, 136 Am. St. Rep. 428, 19 Ann. Cas. 1049, timber is defined to mean that sort of trees which is proper and suitable to be used in the construction of buildings, etc. This case, as reported in Ann. Cas., supra, contains in an extended note a large number of cases supporting the interpretation hereinbefore stated and followed by the trial court and also holding that the word timber does not denote trees which are suitable only for firewood, cordwood, and the like.

[2] It is further argued by the respondent that the opinion of the appellate court, supra, is not the law of the case, and that the judgment of the trial court entered in accordance therewith, being interlocutory, does not finally fix and determine the rights of the parties. In this, we think, the respondent is in error. The ownership of the parties in and to said property is distinctly set forth in the opinion of the appellate court, and likewise clearly set forth in the judgment, but whether so clearly set forth in the judgment of the trial court as might have been done, we think the law of the case, as declared by the appellate court, is final. See, also, 2 Cal. Jur. p. 954, etc.

[3, 4] The right to remove the timber to which the appellant acquired title, as herein stated, was conferred in the instrument conveying title, and it placed upon the land incidents and burdens necessarily attendant upon the cutting and removal of such timber. The damages unavoidably incident thereto must be held to have been necessarily within the contemplation of the parties when the title was conveyed. This, however, we do not think imports an absolute right. It only imports the right to remove the timber in the usual, customary, and proper manner, as those terms are understood and applied in the logging and lumber business, and we think resort may be had to the United States government rules and regulations in the ascertainment of and the application of the proper manner for the removal of timber suitable for merchantable purposes.

[5] If the appellant in this case, in its logging operations, has in any particular violated the judgment fixing its ownership in the timber referred to, to the damage of the plaintiff, it is certainly liable to respond to him for such damages, and the appellant may also be restrained from conducting its logging operations contrary to the provisions and conditions of said judgment, but this did not authorize the trial court to enter a judgment or order which, in effect, constitutes an entire forfeiture of the property belonging to the appellant, to wit, the timber as defined by the trial court standing and being on said premises, which was standing and being on said premises on the 6th day of April, 1887, and also that the trial court is authorized to enter an order prohibiting the removal of any of said timber other than in accordance with the approved methods and under rules and regulations by the trial court to be fixed and determined, and that the method of removal should be such as may best and most clearly protect and conserve the property rights of the respective parties. The judgment to which we have referred also reserves the right to ascertain and fix damages, and, in view of the fact that some 38 years have elapsed since the appellant's grantors acquired ownership in and to the timber standing on said premises, we think the trial court, sitting as a court of equity, authorized to take into consideration the changed conditions and the fact that there may be trees standing on said premises of considerable value now belonging to the plaintiff and to provide for the removal of the timber belonging to the appellant in such manner as may least injure the same, and also further provide that said timber shall not be removed by the appellant other than in accordance with the directions specified and set forth in the court's order.

The appellant further insists that the record shows that the plaintiff, since the entry of the judgment herein, pursuant to the opinion of the appellate court, supra, has parted with all interest and ownership in and to the 40 acres upon which the logging operations under consideration have been conducted. However, there is testimony to the effect that the lumber company has crossed the boundary lines of said 40 acres and taken some timber on land still belonging to the plaintiff, and the manner of the operations conducted on the 40 acres would at least furnish a basis from which the court could determine the kind of operations that would be continued, unless restrained by the orders of the court.

The judgment granting a perpetual injunction against the removal of timber found to belong to the appellant is hereby reversed, and the trial court directed to make and enter such judgment and orders as may be necessary to provide for the removal of the timber belonging to the appellant as may be best calculated to preserve the rights of all parties interested in the premises, and to prohibit the removal of such timber in any other manner.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; McDANIEL, Justice pro tem.

BROYLES v. MAHON et al. (Civ. 2719.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 30, 1925.)

1. Schools and school districts ⟸22—Statute, providing for annexation of common school districts to high school district, held constitutional.

Pol. Code, § 1734b, providing for annexation of common school districts to high school district, held constitutional.

2. Certiorari ⟸21—Writ of review held proper procedure to determine whether board of county supervisors acted in excess of its jurisdiction in annexing common school districts to high school district.

Though creation of high school district by annexation of common school districts to original high school district may be legislative act, writ of review held proper remedy to determine whether board of county supervisors acted in excess of its jurisdiction in annexing such school district, since proceedings pursuant to legislative act granting right to exercise powers only upon certain conditions and upon ascertainment of certain facts by board and notice to interested parties were of a judicial character.

3. Evidence ⟸10(6) — Judicial notice taken that common school districts were within certain distance from high school district.

In proceedings to annul resolution of county supervisors in annexing certain common school districts to high school district, held, evidence was not required to prove that portion of common school district was within 10 miles of high school district, as provided by Pol. Code, § 1734b, since board could take judicial notice of such distances.

4. Schools and schools districts ⟸42(2)—Voting for resolution, which recommended annexation of common school districts to the high school district, held to comply with statute.

Voting by supervisor in support of resolution, which stated he had recommended annexation of certain common school districts to high school district, held a sufficient recommendation for annexation required by Pol. Code § 1734b.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Certiorari by Chester Broyles against A. H. Mahon and others, constituting the Board of Supervisors of Butte County, and others, to annul a resolution of the Board annexing certain school districts. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed, with instructions to dismiss writ.

William E. Rothe, of Chico, and Clinton W. Johnson, of Gridley, for appellants.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Davids & Snyder, of Chico, for respondent.

McDANIEL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from the judgment of the superior court of the county of Butte, and from an order denying a motion for new trial. The hearing in the court below was upon a return to a bill of review directed to defendants. Plaintiff sought to have annulled a certain resolution of the board of supervisors of the said county, adopted on the 24th day of August, 1921, purporting to annex certain named common school districts to the Chico high school district, under the provisions of section 1734b of the Political Code.

The findings omit a few items of fact which, however, are shown by the return. These omissions will be noticed later. The names of the 17 common school districts will be omitted from the copy of the findings following:

Findings.

"The above proceedings came on regularly for trial before the court on the 12th day of May, 1922; W. H. Carlin and Davids & Snyder appeared as counsel for plaintiff, and J. R. Robinson, district attorney of the county of Butte, state of California, appeared as counsel for defendants; the cause was tried by the court upon the petition or complaint of plaintiff, and the return made by defendants to the alternative writ of certiorari issued by this court in said matter on the 6th day of May, 1922; and the cause was duly presented to the court and argued by respective counsel; and the court having duly considered the evidence and being fully advised in the premises, now finds the facts as follows:

"I. The defendants, A. H. Mahon, F. L. Roohr, C. E. Porter, H. W. White, and James Craig, during all the times in said complaint and herein mentioned, were and now are the duly elected, qualified, and acting supervisors, and all five thereof are, and during all the times herein mentioned did, and now do constitute the board of supervisors of said county of Butte.

"II. The defendants, George E. Canfield, E. B. Copeland, Thomas Crew, C. L. Stolp, and Henria Compton now are, and during all the times herein mentioned were, the duly elected, qualified, and acting members of the board of education, and that during all the times in said complaint and herein mentioned did, and now do, constitute the board of education of Chico high school district in the county of Butte, state of California.

"III. The defendant, Irvin Passmore, during all the times in said complaint and herein mentioned was, and now is, the duly elected, qualified, and acting county superintendent of schools in and for the county of Butte, state of California.

"IV. During all the times in this complaint and herein mentioned each and every of the following named school districts [naming them] was a common school district duly and regularly organized, constituted, and existing in the county of Butte, state of California. On the 24th day of August, 1921, said board of supervisors of said county of Butte pretending to act under the authority of section 1734b of the Political Code of the state of California, and not otherwise, did pass and adopt a certain resolution in words and figures following, to wit:

" 'Hearing on Proposed High School District Annexations. 11 o'clock a. m. This being the time fixed for the hearing on the recommendations of the county superintendent of schools as to the various annexations of grammar school districts to the nearest high school district, the board now proceeds with the hearing. After due consideration of evidence presented to this board, and after recommendation of the county superintendent of schools, and also the recommendation of each supervisor in whose supervisorial district the following named school districts are situated, it is moved by Supervisor Porter, seconded by Supervisor White, that (certain-named school districts) each be and they hereby are annexed to and made a part of the Chico high school district.'

"V. Said defendants, members of the board of education of said Chico high school, acting with and by the direction and approval of defendant, Irvin Passmore, county superintendent of schools of said county of Butte, at the date of the filing of the complaint in this action were about to and intended to take action in connection with said resolution passed by said board of supervisors of said county of Butte, and organize a high school district with the purpose and intent of having said board, when organized, exercise jurisdiction over, not only said Chico high school as the same existed prior to the 24th day of August, 1921, but also over the whole territory comprised by said Chico high school district and said above-mentioned 17 common school districts, and by the exercise of such jurisdiction cause taxes to be levied and assessed upon all land situate in all of said common school districts and collect such taxes from the owners of said lands to be thereafter expended in connection with the management and control of an alleged high school district which shall include not only said Chico high school but all of said 17 common school districts aforesaid.

"VI. Plaintiff is a citizen of the United States, a resident of said Rock Creek school district in said county of Butte, and owns real estate situate therein and the same is and at the date of the filing of said complaint was taxable for school purposes in said district.

"VII. No evidence was introduced at said trial as to whether or not the nearest point of any of said common school districts was more than 10 miles from said Chico high school district.

"VIII. Notwithstanding the recitals in the said return of the proceedings had by and before the board of supervisors of said county of Butte, upon the passage of said resolution aforesaid, the record of the proceedings of said board upon the passage of said resolution does not show that the supervisor of said county of Butte, in whose district said common school districts above mentioned are located, recommended the annexation of any of said common school districts to said Chico high school district, except that it appears from said record that he, with the other supervisors of said county, voted for the passage of said resolution.

"As conclusions of law from the foregoing facts the court finds: That said board of supervisors were without jurisdiction to pass said resolution annexing said common school districts to said Chico high school district, and that said resolution purporting to annex said common school districts to said Chico high school district be annulled and set aside."

The amended return established several facts not referred to in the foregoing findings, the essential ones being that the board received the recommendation in writing of Irvin Passmore, county superintendent of schools of Butte county, dated August 5, 1921, marked Exhibit A, recommending the annexation of the various school districts to the several high school districts therein named; that proof of publication of notice of the hearing, as provided in said section 1734b, was duly made; that thereafter the matter of the annexation of the said school districts, under the recommendation of the county superintendent of schools, and pursuant to said notice, came on regularly for hearing before said board on the 24th day of August, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m., said board being then in regular session, and that at said time said matter was called for hearing before said board, all of said members of said board of supervisors were present at said hearing; and the votes for the adoption of the resolution were unanimously "aye"; that no sworn testimony was taken, but after consideration and discussion, said resolution of annexation was passed and adopted by said board, Exhibit D, attached to and part of the return, being a true copy of the minutes of said meeting on August 24, 1921, duly entered in the official minute book.

Appellants claim that the trial court erred in the following particulars, to wit: (1) In deciding that the board of supervisors of Butte county did not have jurisdiction to annex common school districts to high school districts in accordance with the provisions of section 1734b of the Political Code, without proof that the districts so annexed were within less than 10 miles of the high school district to which it was annexed; (2) in holding it was necessary to prove facts before the board of supervisors of which the board had judicial knowledge without proof; (3) in holding that said action of the board of supervisors was judicial (it is argued that the act of annexation was a legislative act and not reviewable by certiorari); (4) in not dismissing the writ.

[1] Respondent, in support of the judgment of the lower court, attacks the constitutionality of section 1734b of the Political Code, basing his argument upon a claimed lack of due notice to the taxpayers; and, though pointing to no specific provision of the Constitution violated, contends that section 1734b, under which the board of supervisors acted in the case at bar, in attempting to annex the several elementary school districts named in the record, is inconsistent and in conflict with other Code sections, and gave no authority to the board of supervisors to annex the districts to the Chico high school district, which was and is a city high school district.

He also contends that if Political Code, section 1734b, is constitutional, the board of supervisors, in its proceedings culminating in the adoption of the resolution of annexation, acted without or in excess of its jurisdiction, because no evidence was received by it to show that the several school districts are within the 10-mile limit specified in the statute, a jurisdictional omission or failure of proof which he deems fatal. The court below held against respondent's attack upon the constitutionality of section 1734b. The recent cases of People v. San Bernardino High School District, 62 Cal. App. 67, 216 P. 959; Board of Education San Rafael City v. Davidson, 190 Cal. 162, 210 P. 961; Antelope School District v. McClellan, 55 Cal. App. 244, 203 P. 147, seem to meet and overcome all the respondent's objections to said section 1734b, and to uphold its constitutionality.

In People v. San Bernardino High School District, supra, the constitutional questions are thus stated:

"It is contended that section 1734b of the Political Code is unconstitutional in the following respects: (1) That it places the power of annexation in the hands of officials having no legislative authority; (2) that it is special legislation in that it provides for annexation only to high school districts that are governed by an appointive school board; (3) that it subjects annexed districts to taxation and local government without representation; (4) that it subjects annexed districts to taxation for outstanding bonds of the high school district."

In Board of Education v. Davidson, supra, quoting from page 167 (210 P. 963), it is said:

"We conclude, therefore, that under the state school law as followed by the charter of San Rafael it is contemplated that outlying and adjacent elementary school districts may be annexed to a city high school district for high school purposes, and that the district so consolidated is to be under the government and control of the city board of education, and the annexed territory becomes part of the city for the purpose of electing such board."

We determine that the lower court was right in upholding the constitutionality of the said section 1734b.

[2] Was the hearing upon writ of review in the lower court a proper proceeding to determine the question whether or not the board of supervisors acted without or in excess of its jurisdiction? For the purposes of this discussion we believe the answer should be in the affirmative. It may be conceded that the creation of the proposed Chico high school district, as it will be after the annexation of the common school districts, is a legislative act; but it appears to be the law that where the Legislature delegates legislative power to a local board and provides that it can be exercised only upon certain conditions and upon the ascertainment of certain facts by such board, after notice and hearing to interested parties, the proceeding thus authorized is of a judicial character which may be reviewed by writ of review. Imperial Water Co. v. Supervisors, 162 Cal. 14, 120 P. 780; 4 Cal. Jur. 1074, and citations note 19.

In view of the conclusion we have formed upon the merits of the return and the findings of fact, it is unnecessary to examine with meticulous care this question as to the propriety of the proceeding under section 1068, Code of Civil Procedure, in the court below. There are two points which seem to have caused the trial court by its judgment to invalidate the resolution of annexation. They are indicated in findings VII and VIII.

Paragraph VII refers to matters upon which the board of supervisors could make a determination without receiving testimony, because it can take judicial notice of its own orders, records, fixed geographical facts, such as boundaries of school districts established by its own orders or by the general law.

In Anderson v. Board of Dental Examiners, 27 Cal. App. 336, 149 P. 1006, we note this language:

"It has been held that courts will take judicial notice of their records and officers [citing many cases]. Judicial notice is based upon convenience and expediency, and its application is not confined to courts of record. Thus it has been held, with respect to proceedings in a municipal court, instituted for the express purpose of enforcing municipal ordinances, invested with full jurisdiction for that purpose, that the ordinances are the peculiar law of the forum, and the court is bound to take judicial notice of their existence. * * * There are in addition to courts certain boards and special tribunals for determining certain classes of rights; and while they are not strictly courts, they partake of their nature, and their findings partake of the nature of judgments. The jurisdiction of such bodies rests upon the same basis as inferior courts; and they, too, may take judicial notice of certain matters. * * * Learning in the law is not one of the qualifications required of the members composing the board; and to hold under these circumstances that the board's investigations should be conducted according to technical legal rules would have the effect of seriously impairing the successful performance of the duties for which that body was created [citing cases]."

Counsel for appellants cited numerous authorities upon this point on pages 4 and 5 of their opening brief.

As above indicated, we believe that finding VII is surplusage and may be disregarded, if in fact it means to refer to the hearing before the board of supervisors. If it refers to the hearing in the superior court, it is equally immaterial, because evidence in that court upon the question mentioned in the finding as to the 10-mile limit would have been inadmissible as dehors the record. Hoffmann v. Superior Court, 79 Cal. 475, 21 P. 862; Borchard v. Board of Supervisors, 144 Cal. 10, 77 P. 708.

[3] It is apparent therefore that error occurred if the finding indicates it to be the lower court's view that proof was requisite upon that provision of section 1734b, stating "that no common school district shall be annexed, unless the nearest point of such common school district lies within 10 miles of a high school district," because the board could, and no doubt did, take judicial notice of the distances.

Upon the second proposition also we are satisfied error occurred which culminated in wrong conclusions and judgment.

Finding VIII is peculiar in form and statement in the part which is negative and precedes the exception contained in the final clause. That negation in the finding appears, inferentially, to have been given much weight by the court, which in our opinion was not warranted. Not only does an examination of the minutes disclose (see page 100 of the transcript) that, prior to the adoption of the resolution, a full discussion and consideration of the features and requirements of the section were had by the board of supervisors and that, consequently, the finding is inaccurate and unsupported by the evidence as to that first clause, but its implication of a failure of proof upon a material prerequisite to the act of annexation is wrong, and the error is reflected in the judgment of annulment. The exception in the second clause of the finding embodies the only matter of weight or substance in it, and, in effect, is contradictory of the first, overcoming the implication and inaccuracy, or, at least, revealing an inconsistency between the two clauses.

[4] When each supervisor cast his vote in support of the resolution which stated he had recommended annexation, he must be presumed to have done so. In truth, by that affirmative vote he then and there was making the required recommendation. There is no specified form of recommendation required. It might be manifested orally or in writing or by a vote.

It will be noted that the resolution itself recited as follows:

"After due consideration of evidence presented to this board, and after recommendation of the county superintendent of schools, and also the recommendation of each supervisor in whose supervisorial district the following named school districts are situated, it is moved by Supervisor Porter, seconded by Supervisor White, that," etc., (naming the said respective school districts), "each be and they are hereby annexed to and made a part of the Chico high school district."

The record of the vote shows the affirmative vote of all five supervisors. This recital of the recommendation, voted upon by each supervisor, carries in itself conclusive proof that he recommended the annexation. This is too clear to require further argument or citation of authorities. We are of opinion therefore that the court's finding did not include a correct finding upon some of the material facts and omitted others, which, however, are shown by the return and stand undisputed.

We determine as follows: (1) That section 1734b, Political Code, is constitutional in all respects. (2) That every step, required thereby of the board of supervisors in these matters of annexation of school districts, was taken: (a) The county superintendent of schools made his recommendation in writing to the board of supervisors for annexation. (b) August 24, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m., was fixed as the time for the hearing by said board of the matter of said annexation, and notice was ordered to be published. (c) That due notice to all parties interested was published at least once a week for two successive weeks in a newspaper of general circulation published in the county; that such notice stated the time when and the place where the board of supervisors was to act and gave the names of the common school districts to be affected by the action of the board (see page 113 et seq. of transcript, down to and including page 116). (d) That a hearing on said August 24, 1921, was duly and regularly held before said board of supervisors. (e) That said resolution hereinbefore set out was duly and regularly adopted, after full consideration and determination of all jurisdictional matters.

It follows that the proceedings before the board of supervisors in all respects were regular and valid, and that the judgment of said superior court, declaring them canceled and invalid, should be reversed.

The motion for a new trial was not argued nor pressed in this appeal. No ruling thereon need be made.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the superior court to dismiss the writ of review.

PEOPLE v. BARTON. (Cr. 1167.)

1. Criminal law ⟸742(1)—Credibility of witnesses for jury.

Where disputed questions of fact are presented by conflicting testimony, it is solely within jury's province to determine credibility of witnesses and truth or falsity of their evidence.

2. Criminal law ⟸814(3)—Instruction, as to admissibility of evidence of other acts between defendant and prosecutrix, held misleading and prejudicial, where only one act testified to.

In prosecution for rape, where prosecutrix testified to but one act, an instruction, that evidence of other acts between defendant and prosecutrix both before and after time charged in information, is admissible to prove adulterous disposition of defendant, held misleading and prejudicial.

3. Criminal law ⟸678(1)—Election not required, where but one act testified to.

Where, in prosecution for rape, prosecutrix definitely testified that but one act occurred, district attorney could not be required to make an election.

4. Criminal law ⟸1137(5)—Defendant, opening inquiry as to other acts by defendant, cannot complain of similar testimony by state.

Where defendant, in prosecution for rape, first elicited, on cross-examination of prosecutrix, testimony as to improper familiarities with her in presence of other persons, and with another young woman in prosecutrix' presence, defendant cannot complain of similar testimony elicited by state on redirect examination.

5. Criminal law ⟸371(9)—Evidence of other improper familiarities properly admitted to show disposition of defendant, and probability of commission of act charged.

In prosecution for rape, evidence of improper familiarities by defendant with prosecutrix, and with another young woman, was admissible for purpose of showing disposition of defendant, and probability of commission of act with which he was charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

James O. Barton was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed.

Frank W. Allender, Marshall A. Stutsman, both of Los Angeles, W. L. Mason, of San Pedro (Scarborough & Bowen, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. It was charged by information that the appellant committed rape upon a girl of the age of 11 years on or about the 15th day of September, 1921; and by a second count he was also charged with having committed an assault upon the same child with intent to commit rape. A jury found him guilty as charged in the first count, and acquitted him on the charge of attempted rape. A motion for new trial having been denied, this appeal is taken from the judgment and order denying said motion.

The prosecuting witness was one of two adopted daughters of appellant and wife, and she testified that she came from Montana to San Pedro, Los Angeles county, in the year 1917, and that she lived in a tent at the latter place, until the defendant built a garage, wherein she slept thereafter. She testified that she became 11 years of age on September 27, 1921, and that appellant had taken indecent liberties and indulged in lascivious conduct with her person ever since she was about 8 years old, but that he had had actual intercourse with her only once, and that it occurred about two weeks before her eleventh birthday.

Many grounds are assigned for reversal, including alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support a conviction, and asserted errors of the trial court in its rulings during the trial, and in giving and refusing instructions. From the view which we take of the case, it is apparent, as we shall hereafter show, that it must be reversed, and doubtless certain features complained of will not recur upon another trial. We shall therefore devote our attention only to points which require rulings at this time.

Although the testimony of the prosecutrix, if believed by the jury, may be said to have been accompanied by incriminating circumstances, yet without it there was little evidence of guilt; such being the fact, we are constrained to analyze and subject to close scrutiny the principal factors which apparently led to the conviction.

[1] The prosecutrix testified, and it was the theory of the prosecution, that appellant slept in the garage with his daughter, and that the act complained of occurred therein, but appellant stated positively that there had been no bed in the garage for months preceding the date of the alleged offense, and that all of the girl's testimony in this regard was false. Other witnesses corroborated him in this, and swore that the principals in the case occupied beds in different parts of the house during all of this period. Appellant argues that the prosecutrix was discredited by this evidence, but disputed questions of fact were thus presented, and it was solely within the province of the jury to determine, as to the credibility of the witnesses, and as to the truth or falsity of the evidence.

Barton emphatically asserted that he had at all times felt, and exhibited an attitude and course of conduct, of the most properly affectionate and fatherly character toward the prosecutrix, and that had the people been required to elect upon a specific act and date upon which they would ask the jury to base a verdict, he would have been enabled to meet and refute any such charge.

[2] One ground urged by appellant as sufficient for a reversal appears to us to be well taken. The court instructed the jury as follows:

"Evidence of other acts of sexual intercourse between the defendant and the prosecutrix, and other improper familiarities on the part of the defendant toward, and with, the prosecutrix, both before and after the time charged in the information, is received and admitted in evidence to prove the adulterous disposition of the defendant, and as having a tendency to render it more probable that the acts of sexual intercourse, charged and relied on in the information, were committed and for no other purpose."

While this instruction has been upheld in a number of cases as proper where the evidence warrants it, and particularly where there has been testimony to the effect that more than one act of sexual intercourse has taken place between the defendant and the prosecutrix, under the circumstances of the instant case we believe that the instruction was not only erroneous, but was calculated to mislead the jury in a manner prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant. This instruction is susceptible of the construction that by it the court intended to indicate to the jury that, in its opinion, there had been introduced evidence of more than one act of sexual intercourse, in fact, of acts "both before and after the time charged in the information." While the language of the instruction may be regarded as a statement of an abstract principle of law and therefore properly used in instructing the jury where the testimony is susceptible of the interpretation that acts other than that charged in the information have occurred between the defendant and the prosecutrix, it should not be used where, as in this case, the evidence does not allow of that construction.

In one of the answers given by the prosecuting witness it was positively stated that only one act of intercourse occurred, which was on the 13th day of September, 1921, and this, therefore, was the sole basis of the charge. However, it appears that in other parts of her examination the questions put to her by the prosecutor, and her answers thereto, were so framed that the jury might easily have been misled into the erroneous notion that other acts of intercourse had taken place between the defendant and herself. The following is an example of such testimony:

"Q. (By the district attorney.) When was the last time that you recall that you had an act of intercourse with your father? A. Well, that was two weeks before my birthday in 1921.

"Q. That is, this one that you are now testifying to was the last act that you recall? A. Yes, sir."

When asked over how long a period of time before this act of September 13, 1921, she had had intercourse with her father, the prosecutrix replied that she could not say exactly, but that he had slept with her since she was eight years old, that she did not wish to tell an untruth, but that she knew that it occurred on September 13th. We are not in accord with appellant's statement that the instruction above quoted declared that other acts of intercourse had occurred both before and after the date charged in the information, but we think that the jury could, under the circumstances of this case, and probably did, infer from the evidence and the instructions of the court that there were other acts. They were at least encouraged by this instruction to assume that such was the fact. It should be noted that the instruction quoted did not inform the jury that they should determine for themselves whether or not there were other acts, and that if they found them to have occurred that evidence thereof should be considered merely for the purposes stated; but it carried a strong inference that evidence of other acts of sexual intercourse had been received and admitted in the case, to prove the adulterous disposition of the defendant, and as having a tendency to render it more probable that he was guilty. It is our conclusion, therefore, that, in view of the condition of the record to which we have called attention, the instruction was misleading and prejudicial.

[3] One of the points relied upon by appellant is that the court refused to require the prosecution to elect as to which act of intercourse it relied upon for a conviction. As we have stated, although the testimony of the prosecuting witness is quite ambiguous, she nevertheless definitely testified that but one such act occurred; consequently this case is not one where the district attorney could be properly required to make an election.

[4, 5] Exception is taken to the rulings of the trial court permitting the prosecutrix to testify that in 1923 appellant indulged in improper familiarities with her in the presence of other persons, and with another young woman, in her presence. It appears that this testimony was elicited upon redirect examination after counsel for appellant had opened the door therefor by cross-examination. The point, therefore, is without merit. People v. Knight, 62 Cal. App. 143, 216 P. 96. Evidence of this nature was not offered in an attempt to convict appellant of another or different offense, and was admissible merely for the purpose of showing the disposition of defendant, and the probability of his committing the act with which he was charged. People v. Martinez, 57 Cal. App. 771, 208 P. 170.

Other grounds for reversal are assigned, which we do not deem to be tenable, since they have repeatedly been decided in earlier cases, but, for the reasons which we have stated above, we think the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Judgment and order denying motion for new trial reversed.

PEOPLE v. ERBEL. (Cr. 847.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 7, 1925.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ⟸236(13)—Evidence held to show that liquor fit for beverage purposes.

Testimony that liquor containing 50 per cent. of alcohol by volume was jackass brandy, by one who smelled and tasted it, together with fact that manufacture was conducted secretly, held sufficient to show that liquor was fit for beverage purposes within meaning of statute.

2. Intoxicating liquors ⟸242—Judgment imposing prison sentence and fine for first offense held void.

Under Volstead Act, § 29 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½p), court is without power to impose a direct prison sentence and a fine for first offense of manufacturing intoxicating liquor, and judgment doing so is entirely void.

3. Criminal law ⟸913(4) — That judgment void does not require new trial, but sentence may be imposed in accordance with law.

That judgment of conviction is entirely void does not render a new trial necessary, as trial court has power to call defendant before it and impose a sentence in accordance with law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; Warren B. Tryon, Judge.

Chris Erbel was convicted of unlawfully manufacturing intoxicating liquor, and appeals. Reversed for erroneous sentence, and remanded, with directions.

John L. Childs and George W. Howe, both of Crescent City, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of unlawfully manufacturing intoxicating liquor, alleged in the information to be "fit for use for beverage purposes." His motion for a new trial was denied. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

[1] It was stipulated at the trial that the liquor in question contained 50 per cent. of alcohol by volume, but it is contended that there is no evidence to show that it was fit for beverage purposes. One of the men engaged with the defendant in manufacturing the liquor testified that it was jackass brandy. He described fully the process of manufacturing the liquor and the ingredients used for that purpose. Neither the process described nor the ingredients used would have any tendency to render the liquor unfit for beverage purposes, but indicated rather the ordinary case of the illicit manufacture of corn whisky. The operations were conducted with as much secrecy as possible; the plant being located in the woods, and the utensils were hidden in the brush when not in use, thus indicating a consciousness that the manufacture of the liquor was unlawful. The sheriff of the county testified that he smelled and tasted the liquor, and that it was jackass brandy. In the absence of anything to the contrary, the evidence is sufficient to show that the liquor was fit for beverage purposes within the meaning of the statute.

[2, 3] Apparently, through inadvertence, the judgment is void. It provides that the defendant "pay a fine of $750, or in lieu thereof to be confined in the county jail * * * for six months; and for further punishment to be confined in the county jail for 30 days, unless sooner discharged." The information did not charge a prior conviction. Section 29 of the Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½p), provides:

"Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of this title shall for a first offense be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding six months."

While for a first offense of unlawful manufacture of liquor a court may impose a fine, with the alternative of imprisonment at a given rate per day until the fine is satisfied, not exceeding a total of six months, or a direct jail sentence, the court is without power to impose a direct prison sentence and a fine for a first offense. The judgment is entirely void. Ex parte Gilmore, 71 Cal. 624, 12 P. 800; People v. Conley, 27 Cal. App. 362, 365, 150 P. 412, 413. It is unnecessary, however, to order a new trial. The judgment being void, the trial court has power to call the defendant before it and impose a sentence in accordance with law. People v. Conley, supra; People v. Johnson, 71 Cal. 384, 392, 12 P. 261; People v. Sama, 189 Cal. 153, 207 P. 893; People v. Bassetti, 58 Cal. App. 390, 395, 208 P. 696.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed, and the judgment is reversed and set aside, with direction to the trial court to render and enter an appropriate judgment.

PEOPLE v. ELDRIDGE. (Cr. 1220.)

1. Criminal law ⟸535(2)—Conviction supported by proof of corpus delicti and confessions.

Proof of corpus delicti by victim's testimony, and of defendant's connection therewith by his confession and that of a companion, setting forth the circumstances of defendant's participation, and signed by defendant after agreeing to its truth, is sufficient to sustain conviction for robbery.

2. Criminal law ⟸736(2), 1158(4)—Voluntariness of confession primarily for trial court, and conclusion supported by substantial evidence not disturbed.

Voluntariness of confession, of which there was preliminary proof, but which defendant claimed was the result of fear of officers, is primarily for the trial court, and its conclusion having substantial support in the evidence will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

John Eldridge was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Oscar Hudson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. The defendant, John Eldridge, was charged jointly with Clifford Miles and Charles Davis with the crime of robbery. Davis demanded and was granted a separate trial, but the charges against him were subsequently dismissed without trial. Miles and Eldridge were tried together, and Miles was convicted, but the jury disagreed as to Eldridge. Upon a second trial Eldridge was convicted, and he prosecutes this appeal from the judgment.

It appears from the record that on the night of April 2, 1924, about 11:30 o'clock, one Henry Waxman was held up by three men, on Willow avenue, between Laguna and Octavia streets, San Francisco, and robbed at the point of a revolver. Immediately following the robbery he telephoned to the police department from his home near by, and upon arrival of an officer gave descriptions of his assailants. About four hours later complaint of a different nature was made to the police department by a woman concerning the conduct of Eldridge, pursuant to which said officer, accompanied by said woman, proceeded to a house on Sutter street, where Eldridge roomed, and there found Davis in bed, but Eldridge apparently was not there. The officer, observing fresh footprints on the window sill, left the room temporarily to search the rear of the premises. Upon returning he knocked at the door of the room, and the door was opened by Eldridge, who was undressed as if about to retire. The officer asked Eldridge who had been with him the night before, and Edridge first stated that no one had been with him, but afterwards said that he and Miles had been together. Eldridge was then taken to a house on another street, where Miles was found in bed. Eldridge and Miles were then taken to Waxman's home, arriving there about 4 o'clock. Upon being confronted with the two defendants, Waxman immediately identified Miles, positively, as one of the robbers, but was unable to recognize Eldridge as being one of the other two. Both men were then taken to prison, and later, according to the testimony of the police officer, admitted participation in the crime, implicating Davis as the third man. Subsequently the defendants were taken to the office of the detective bureau in the same building for the purpose of having their confessions reduced to writing and signed by them. While their statements were being prepared Eldridge sat near a desk with Police Sergeant McLaughlin, and Miles was seated about 6 or 7 feet away at another desk beside Police Sergeant Hughes. After the statement of each defendant was prepared and signed by him, Miles signed the statement made by Eldridge, and the latter, after reading Miles' statement, said it was true, and likewise signed it. The confession of Miles is as follows:

"Room 7, Hall of Justice, April 3, 1924. Statement of Clifford Miles. My true name is Clifford Miles, age 26 years, 5 feet, 8 inches, 127 pounds, born Galveston, Texas. On April 2, 1924, about 4 or 5 p. m., I went by 1892 Sutter street. I went up to Eldridge's room, No. 20, and saw Eldridge and Davis. They were talking about pulling a job—an unlawful job. They asked me if I wanted to work and get off in the morning with some money. They told me of some of the jobs they pulled. They asked me if I had a gun. I said, 'Yes, but it's in a pawn shop.' They asked me if I could get it, and told me to hock my coat and get the gun. Davis said if I could not hock the coat, to take his watch and sell it. I went out to sell my coat, and a Jew in a hock shop on Golden Gate offered me $2.80, and finally gave me $4 for it. I then got my gun for $3.50 at Fillmore Loan Office. I went back to their room, and the bullets in my gun would not fit his. About 9 p. m. I met Eldridge on Sutter street and Webster street. We went back to his room. We talked and went out for a walk and Davis took my gun. Around a park, or soon after we left a park near Eddy street, two men came up an alley (both white). Davis pointed the gun at them and said: 'Stick up your hands.' Both did so. Eldridge and Davis then searched them. They got some money. I don't know how much. Me and Davis went down the street. Eldridge walked the two men down the street. He then came back (Eldridge). * * * Then Davis went across the street and disappeared. Eldridge also went across the street. I kept on till I got to Webster street and then to Sutter street and I went to a restaurant to eat. Before I went to eat I went up to Eldridge's room and we split the money. I got $4.10 I think. I ate and met a negro who sold me a pint of whisky for $1, and I went up to Eldridge's room and drank some of the whisky. Eldridge and I then went up to a Mrs. Davis' room, 1872 Sutter street, and we drank up all the liquor we had left. We went to the restaurant, had something to eat and back to Mrs. Davis' room. I lit the lamp. Mrs. Davis wanted a razor Eldridge had previously taken from her. After a little quarrel all of us had, I went home. I don't know whether Eldridge went. I went to bed, and at 5:10 a. m. the law came and took me out. Eldridge and Mrs. Davis were with the law. This is the first holdup I ever was on. This is a true statement, made free and voluntarily, without promise of reward or immunity, and know it will be used against me in court. Witnesses: Richard O. Hughes, Detective Sergeant 689, George J. McLaughlin, Sergeant 437, John L. Eldridge. [Signed] Clifford Miles, 1788 Sutter street."

The following is the confession made by Eldridge:

"San Francisco, April 3, 1924. A statement made by John L. Eldridge, residence 1892 Sutter street, room 20. I want to make a truthful statement about the robbery and burglary charges against me. The man I saw with you in Judge Golden's court this morning is the man that Clifford Miles, George Davis, and myself robbed last night of $1.60. I did not use the gun. There was a gun used. I don't know if it was Miles or Davis that used it. We three colored men also robbed Raymond Foz, I believe, after reading the police report No. 95,354. Thinking it over we may not have robbed Foz. If he is a Filipino, the second man we robbed last night looked like a Filipino. It may be him. Mary Davis, living on Sutter street, about three doors from me, was out with Miles and me. * * * This statement I make free and voluntarily and without any force or violence being used against me or any promises being offered me. I have read this statement, and it is a true one. [Signed] John L. Eldridge. George J. McLaughlin, Sergeant 437. Richard O. Hughes, Detective Sergeant 689. Clifford Miles."

In connection with Eldridge's confession it was shown that Sergeant McLaughlin, who prepared Eldridge's statement, had in fact appeared in court with Waxman, the victim of the robbery, on the morning of the day this statement was written and signed. Later and during the trial appellant repudiated his written confession, claiming that it had been signed by him under an apprehension of fear that physical violence would be inflicted upon him by the police officers if he did not sign the same. In denying participation in the robbery, he claimed that he was elsewhere at the time the crime was committed. The alibi offered by him, however, was not supported by any other witness nor by any corroborating circumstance.

[1] The principal ground urged for a reversal of the judgment is that the evidence is legally insufficient to sustain a conviction, counsel for appellant contending "that the two matters upon which the conviction are predicated are these, first, there was a crime committed; second, Eldridge confessed to the crime; and", counsel for appellant say, "We submit that these two facts alone are not sufficient to support a verdict of guilty."

[2] With this contention we are unable to agree. The corpus delicti was clearly and positively established by the testimony of the victim of the robbery, and appellant's connection with and participation in the crime was shown by his own confession, and by the one made by Miles, which he also signed, after stating, as before mentioned, that it was a true statement. Preliminary to the introduction in evidence of said written confessions, proof was made to the effect that said confessions were freely and voluntarily made, and that the defendants were informed that said confessions if made could be used against them at the time of trial. The question, therefore, of whether said confessions were free and voluntary, or were the result of inducement, coercion, intimidation or duress exerted by the officers, was one peculiarily within the province of the trial judge to decide upon the facts, and, inasmuch as the conclusion reached by him has substantial support in the evidence, it will not be interfered with on appeal. People v. Grafft, 61 Cal. App. 7, 214 P. 273; People v. Fouts, 61 Cal. App. 242, 214 P. 657; People v. Wheaton, 64 Cal. App. 58, 220 P. 451.

It matters little whether Miles' confession with Eldridge's signature attached to it be considered as a part of the latter's confession, as appellant contends, or whether it be considered as the separate statement of Miles containing declarations not made in Eldridge's presence, for the reason that Miles' confession sets forth in detail the circumstances of the participation of Eldridge in the commission of the robbery, and of his movements and operations on the night in question, to the truth of which Eldridge agreed before he signed the Miles confession. It would therefore appear that in either event he was bound by it, and, if believed by the jury, was legally sufficient without corroboration to justify a verdict of guilty.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MILES. (Cr. 1211.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 23, 1925.)

Criminal law ⟸1158(4) — Voluntariness of confession primarily for trial court, and conclusion supported by substantial evidence not disturbed.

Whether a confession, of the voluntariness of which there was preliminary proof, was the result of intimidation, as claimed by defendant, is primarily a question for the trial court; and its conclusion, being supported by substantial evidence, will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Clifford Miles was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Oscar Hudson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen. and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. An appeal by defendant, Clifford Miles, from a judgment of conviction of the crime of robbery. This is a companion case to People v. Eldridge, (No. 1220, this day decided) 237 P. 770. As stated in the opinion rendered in that case, Eldridge, Miles, and one Charles Davis were jointly charged with robbing one Henry Waxman, shortly before midnight, on April 2, 1924, on Willow avenue, between Leguna and Octavia streets, San Francisco. The victim of the robbery positively identified Miles as one of the perpetrators of the crime, and, moreover, Miles made a written confession setting forth the circumstances of the preparation for and the execution of the crime, and of the movements and operations of himself and his two associates on the night in question. All of this evidence is set forth in the opinion in the Eldridge Case, and it will therefore be unnecessary to again narrate it here. But, in addition to the evidence therein stated, as against Miles, the pawnbroker with whom Miles had previously pawned his revolver was produced as a witness. He testified, in corroboration of the confession made by Miles, that on the day of the robbery Miles wanted to pawn an overcoat, but that he refused to lend him any money on it; that Miles then took the coat away and in a few minutes returned with money with which he redeemed the revolver. And it was also proved as against Miles that on the night the crime was committed, while the officer was in Miles' room waiting for him to dress, Miles observed the officer searching the bureau drawers, and inquired as to what he was doing. The officer replied that he was "looking for a gun." Miles then said that he "never had a gun; got no use for a gun." Later, at the city prison, after he had confessed, Miles informed the officers where, in his room, he had placed the revolver; and thereupon the officers searched the room and found the revolver where Miles stated he had hidden it.

Eldridge and Miles were represented by the same counsel, who has submitted their cases on appeal in one brief. In view of the positive identification of Miles by the victim of the robbery, the only point apparently made in support of the Miles appeal is that his written confession was obtained through the use of intimidation. But, as stated in the opinion in the Eldridge Case, preliminary proof was made that the confession was free and voluntary, and that both defendants were apprised of the fact that said confessions, if made, could be used against them at the time of trial. The question, therefore, of whether said confessions were the result of the use of intimidation as claimed by the appellant was one primarily for the consideration of the trial court, and since, there is substantial evidence in the record to the effect that said confessions were freely and voluntarily made, the conclusion reached by the trial court in admitting them in evidence will not be disturbed. People v. Wheaton, 64 Cal. App. 58, 220 P. 451.

The record discloses no error, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

CITY OF FRESNO v. FRESNO IRR. DIST. et al. (Civ. 2893.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 2, 1925.)

1. Waters and water courses ⟸231—Land of municipality not expressly exempt from assessment by irrigation district.

Land of municipality situated within irrigation district is not expressly exempt from assessment by such district.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸426—Public property exempt from assessment when actually appropriated to public use.

Public property is exempt from liability to assessment for public improvements only when it is actually appropriated to public use.

3. Waters and water courses ⟸231—Municipal property used for sewage disposal held not liable to assessment by irrigation district.

Property of municipality used for sewage disposal was not shown to be devoted to a private use, so as to render it liable to assessment, by irrigation district because certain portions thereof were used for agricultural and horticultural purposes, and that an income was produced from such activities, where use was still made of such areas for disposal of sewage, and hence they retained their character as property devoted to public use.

4. Waters and water courses ⟸231—That irrigation district could assess portions of municipal property would not render portion used for sewage disposal liable to assessment.

That irrigation district could properly assess portions of property of municipality, used for agricultural and horticultural purposes, would not render remaining portion, which was in use as part of sewer system, and which could be separately designated from former portions, liable also to assessment.

5. Waters and water courses ⟸231—City not required to object to assessment of exempt property by irrigation district.

City was not required to attempt to have its lands excluded from irrigation district, or after assessment was levied to appear before board of directors of district and object to assessment in order to avoid assessment, where property was exempted therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Suit by the City of Fresno against the Fresno Irrigation District and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Harris, Johnson, Willey & Griffith and Harris & Hayhurst, all of Fresno, for appellants.

H. M. Johnston, City Atty., of Fresno, for respondent.

JONES, Justice pro tem. This action was brought by plaintiff to obtain a decree quieting its title to certain lands, and to enjoin the defendants from selling said lands for the payment of an assessment levied thereon by the defendant district and from levying any tax or assessment against the lands. The defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against them or either of them, which demurrer was overruled.

The defendants did not answer the complaint, and judgment was then rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which judgment the defendants have appealed.

In brief, the complaint alleges as follows: That the plaintiff is, and since October 27, 1885, has been, a municipal corporation; that the defendant the Fresno irrigation district is, and since July, 1920, has been, a public irrigation district organized under the laws of the state of California, and that the defendant Will Sutherland is, and ever since the organization of the said district has been, the collector of said district; that the plaintiff owns, and since April 6, 1907, has owned, certain real property situate within said district and consisting of 812 acres of land; that an assesment of said lands (excepting a 12-acre tract, which was by mistake assessed to another person) for the year 1921 was made by the assessor of said district; that the directors of the district then levied an assessment on the lands within said district, including the lands of the plaintiff; that the assessment on its lands was not paid by plaintiff; and that the defendant Sutherland, as the collector of the district, was proceeding to sell said lands for the assessment, percentages, and costs.

The construction and maintenance of a system of public sewers by the plaintiff are then alleged, which system consists of a number of mains and laterals within the city, an outfall sewer about five miles long from the southwest corner of the city to and upon the property here involved, the sewer farm, consisting of said real property upon which are constructed two septic tanks, and a number of ditches and lines for distribution of the effluent from the septic tank to and upon said lands; that the solids in the sewage are dissolved by bacterial action in the septic tanks, and the sewage is discharged therefrom in liquid form and distributed over and upon the land so that it may sink and percolate into the soil. It is further alleged: That said "tract is not sufficient for the disposal of the discharge from said city, and that plaintiff is leasing 160 acres of land at a rental of $4,800 per year, for flowage of said sewage. That of said 812 acres 545 acres are not cultivated in any respect, but are covered with wild grasses, and are used principally for discharge of said sewage during the winter; the portion thereof when not covered by water is used by plaintiff for pasturing stock for a compensation, and pasturing stock of plaintiff used on said sewer farm; 207 acres are planted to alfalfa, which are flooded from time to time with sewage. The hay grown on said land is sold by plaintiff and used to feed stock belonging to plaintiff used on said farm. That about 30 acres are planted to grain, which will be sold by the plaintiff or used for feed of stock belonging to plaintiff used on said farm; that about 7 acres are planted to vineyard, which is not in bearing; the septic tanks occupy about 3 acres; about 7 acres are used for residence of foreman, outbuildings and corrals; and about 13 acres (not cultivated) are used from time to time as required. That all of said real property, including the portion thereof planted to alfalfa, grain, and vineyard, except the portion set apart for buildings, is used for disposal of sewage, and that the farming and grazing of a portion thereof are incidental to and in aid of the disposal of said sewage and are not conducted with a view to making a profit." It is then alleged "that the total receipts from said sewer farm, from its acquisition to and including the year 1920, barely offset the expense of the maintenance and operation of the septic tanks, sewage disposal and sewer farm, but were not sufficient to pay the expense of the maintenance of said sewer system within said city," and the receipts for four fiscal years are set forth as follows: For the year 1918, $9,022; 1919, $17,888; 1920, $10,794; 1921, $10,532.02; while for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1919, the expense for the operation and maintenance of the outfall sewer was $7,035.07, of the septic tanks and sewer farm $16,267.81, and of the system within the city $26,040. And for the year 1920 the expense for the outfall sewer was $9,692.28; for the septic tanks and sewer farm, $13,554.23; and for the system within the city, $15,225. It is also alleged that there are no fees or charges made for the use of said sewer, other than the ordinary municipal taxes. Other allegations are contained in the complaint, but we have mentioned only those we deem pertinent for the purpose of this decision.

In the judgment we find the following recital: "* * * And the defaults of said defendants, and each of them, having been duly entered, and the plaintiff having applied for judgment in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, and the court having taken and heard evidence, and it appearing to the satisfaction of the court, and the court finds," and then are incorporated findings which closely follow the allegations of the complaint.

It is the contention of the appellants that the court erred in overruling their demurrer to the complaint, claiming that it is apparent therefrom that the lands of the city are not necessarily or actually used exclusively for governmental purposes, and that, where the property of a municipality is not so used, there is no exemption in law, express or implied, of such property from assessments of the character mentioned herein.

[1] It has been definitely held that the land of a municipality situated within an irrigation district is not expressly exempt from assessment by such district. San Diego v. Linda Vista Irrigation Dist., 108 Cal. 189, 41 P. 291, 35 L. R. A. 33.

[2] But though there is no express exemption, there may exist an implied exemption, dependent upon the use to which the property is put. It has been stated that "the principle * * * in regard to the exemption of public property is that while the exemption from liability to assessment for public improvement will be implied, such implication will only arise when the property is actually appropriated to public use" (35 L. R. A. 39, note), and this, in effect, is declared to be the rule in California. City Street Improvement Co. v. Regents, etc., 153 Cal. 776, 96 P. 801, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 451. In the case just cited, the court, after citing a number of cases decided in other jurisdictions, said:

"A reading of these cases will disclose that in many of the states, upon the theory that, in the absence of express prohibition, even the state should bear its share of benefits for special assessments, it is held that property, although devoted to public use, is liable to such assessment. The rule in this state is, as above indicated, that such property when actually devoted to the public use is exempt; otherwise not."

[3] To sustain the contention of the appellants, we must hold that the complaint shows that the lands of plaintiff were not actually devoted to a public use. That certain portions of the property are used by the respondent for the raising of alfalfa and grain and for vineyard purposes, and that an income is produced from its agricultural activities, are facts admitted in the complaint; but it does not follow that, because of these facts, the public use of the land is changed. If, notwithstanding this cultivation, use is still made of these areas for the disposal of the sewage, then they retain their character as property devoted to public use, and we cannot say that the growing of alfalfa or grain or the planting of a vineyard will necessarily preclude the city from discharging the fluid from the septic tanks over the portions used for such purposes, or will necessarily mean that these portions are withdrawn as a part of the city's sewer system. Further, it is alleged that "all of said real property, including the portion thereof, planted to alfalfa, grain and vineyard, except the portion set apart for buildings, is used for disposal of sewage," which allegation tends to negative the contention of the appellants.

We are satisfied that the complaint does not show that the property of the respondent is devoted to a private use, so as to render it liable to assessment, and the appellants' contention in that respect cannot be sustained.

[4] It may be further pointed out that while only a portion of the 812 acres owned by respondent within the irrigation district was used for the growth of the alfalfa, grain, and vineyard, yet the entire property, including that portion upon which are erected the septic tanks, is included in the assessment. Even though it should be conceded that the district could properly assess the portions used for agricultural and horticultural purposes, yet that would not render the remaining portion, which without question was in use as a part of the sewer system and which could be separately designated from the former portions, liable also to assessment.

[5] The appellants urge that there is no showing in the complaint that the city attempted to have its lands excluded from the district, or that, after the assessment was levied, it appeared before the board of directors of the district sitting as a board of equalization or objected to the assessment.

The property being exempt from assessment, it was not necessary that the city, in order to avoid assessment, should have taken either of these steps.

We conclude that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

O'CONNELL v. ROGERS et al. (Civ. 5147.)

1. Attachment ⟸275 — Order requiring new undertaking and restoring attachment, made more than three years after attachment issued, without force or effect.

An order of superior court, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1057, requiring new undertaking for release of attachment, and ordering attachment restored after plaintiff ignored order, made more than three years after attachment was issued, and lien thereof had ceased, under section 542a, was ineffectual for any purpose.

2. Attachment ⟸337—Surety on attachment bond held not released by ineffectual order requiring new undertaking which was not complied with.

An order of court requiring new undertaking for release of attachment, which was ineffectual and not complied with, did not have effect of releasing surety on original undertaking.

3. Parties ⟸91—That others improperly joined no defense as to one against whom complaint states good cause of action.

Where complaint in action on attachment bond, given under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 554, 555, stated a good cause of action against one of sureties on such bond, it is of no concern of such surety that others were improperly joined to share her liability.

4. Appeal and error ⟸173(10)—Plea of statute of limitations, not raised below, not considered on appeal.

Contention that action in question barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 542a, cannot be considered on appeal where not raised in trial court, as plea of statute of limitations may be waived.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Daniel O'Connell against William J. Rogers and others. From a judgment against her, defendant Beatrice M. F. McKellar appeals. Affirmed.

Courtney L. Moore, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel O'Connell, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to recover on a statutory bond given under sections 554 and 555, Code of Civil Procedure, for the release of an attachment upon real property. The defendant, McKellar, alone appeared in answer to the summons, and from the judgment which was rendered against her she appeals under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The controversy arose from an action commenced by the same plaintiff against the Santanella Land Company, a corporation, for services rendered. When that action was commenced an attachment was issued and levied upon real property belonging to the corporation and situated in Merced county. To release its property from the attachment, the corporation filed an undertaking with the defendants Rogers and McKellar as sureties, and, after a hearing and examination thereon, the undertaking was approved and the attachment was, by order of the court, discharged. Thereafter the corporation disposed of all its property, and rendered itself immune from execution upon the judgment which was subsequently rendered against it. The undertaking was in the usual form provided for in section 555, Code of Civil Procedure, and recited that it was given in consideration of the release from attachment of the property of the corporation. Thereby the sureties expressly contracted that, if the plaintiff should recover judgment, the defendant would, on demand, redeliver the attached property to the proper party to be applied on the judgment, or that in default thereof, they would pay to the plaintiff the full value of the property, not exceeding the amount of the judgment. The value of the bond was $2,500; the judgment was for $398. Execution was returned unsatisfied, and the plaintiff made demand upon the corporation and its sureties for payment of the judgment. This demand having been refused, the present action was commenced against the principal and the sureties on the bond, and against Rogers and one Wiley, who were alleged to be the sole stockholders and owners of the corporation. The defendant Wiley defaulted, and the trial was had against the defendant, McKellar, alone. She appeals from the judgment which went against her in the sum of $409.92.

Two grounds are presented by the appellant in her attack upon the judgment: First, that the sureties on the bond in suit were released when the superior court ordered the attachment restored upon the failure of the corporation to give new and sufficient surety; and, second, that the special demurrer of appellant on the ground of misjoinder of parties defendant should have been sustained.

[1] On the first point the appellant directs our attention to section 1057, Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes the superior court to require a new undertaking with sufficient sureties when it appears that any surety on the bond given has become insufficient. The section also provides that, if such new undertaking shall not be given, "all rights obtained by the filing of such original undertaking shall immediately cease." Acting under the provisions of this section, the superior court, upon motion of the plaintiff in the original suit, ordered a new undertaking, and when this order was ignored by the defendant corporation the court ordered the attachment "restored with all the force and effect given to it by law," As the order was made more than three years after the attachment was issued and the lien thereof had ceased (section 542a, Code Civ. Proc.), there was no force or effect "given to it by law," and the order was therefore ineffectual for any purpose.

[2] But aside from this the order did not purport to release the sureties on the original bond. The motion of the plaintiff was to order a new undertaking because of the absence from the state of Rogers, one of the sureties on the original bond. If a new undertaking with new sureties had been offered and accepted by the plaintiff, then the question of the release of the sureties on the original undertaking might arise. But this was not done. The defendant in the original suit not only failed to file a new undertaking, but, having disposed of all its property, suffered the court to make an order which was ineffectual.

The case before us is therefore a simple one on a contract, wherein the appellant agreed that the property would be restored for the purpose of satisfying the judgment, or that in default thereof she would pay. The consideration was the release of the property from the attachment. This consideration was executed and paid. The breach of the contract is obvious and the judgment properly followed against the appellant.

[3] In framing his complaint the respondent joined as defendants the principal and the two sureties on the undertaking. He also joined Rogers, one of the sureties, and Wiley, as the sole stockholders and owners of the corporation principal upon the undertaking. The demurrer of the appellant is on the ground of misjoinder of these parties, "in that it cannot be determined" in what capacity some of them are sued. It may be conceded that some of the other defendants may have demurred on these grounds, but the complaint states a good cause of action against this appellant, and it is, of course, no concern of hers that others may be improperly joined to share her liability. Gardner v. Samuel, 116 Cal. 84, 90, 47 P. 935, 58 Am. St. Rep. 135.

[4] In her final brief on this appeal, the appellant for the first time raises the point that the proceedings are barred by section 542a, Code of Civil Procedure. It needs no citation of authority to the point that the plea of the statute of limitations may be waived, and that unless the plea is made in the trial court it cannot be considered on an appeal from the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

Mutual oral agreement between vendor and purchaser to cancel written contract is a sufficient consideration for its abandonment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Jacob Haberman and wife against Emil Sawall and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for appellants.

Gallaher, Simpson & Hays, of Fresno, for respondents.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. Plaintiffs commenced this action to recover from defendants the sum of $675, alleged to be due under a certain written agreement between plaintiffs and defendants. The case was tried by the court without a jury. Judgment went for the defendants. From this judgment plaintiffs prosecute this appeal.

The facts of the case are these: On September 15, 1919, the plaintiff, Jacob Haberman, entered into a written contract with R. S. Elliott and Ethel M. Elliott, his wife, for the purchase of certain lands owned by them in Fresno county, Cal., for $14,000 payable as follows: $2,500 cash; $500 April 1, 1920; $500 October 1, 1921, and $1,000 annually thereafter, payable on October 1st of each year, until October 1, 1929, and the remaining $2,500 on October 1, 1930; all deferred payments to bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, interest payable October 1, 1920, and annually thereafter; plaintiff having the option of paying any part, or all, before it became due.

The contract also provided for the right of forfeiture in case of default by the vendee; also, that on the full performance, a deed would be delivered, conveying the property free and clear of all liens and incumbrances, etc. All payments were made when due, and this contract fully performed by the vendee, Jacob Haberman, from its date until the 12th day of October, 1920, at which time the said Jacob Haberman and wife, plaintiffs in this action, entered into a written contract with the defendants Emil Sawall and F. P. Leisman, wherein they agreed to sell and assign to the defendants all their right, title, and interest in and to the Elliott contract, above mentioned, on the following terms, stipulations, and conditions, to wit: That the unpaid portion of the purchase price to the Elliotts was the sum of $11,000 principal and interest thereon from the 1st day of October, 1920. This sum should be paid by the defendants herein to Mr. Elliott at the times specified in the original Elliott contract. In addition to this, defendants were to pay to plaintiff Jacob Haberman $9,000, payable in annual installments as follows: $500 cash; $2,000 on or before the 12th day of November, 1920; $2,500 on or before the 10th of January, 1921; $1,000 on or before the 30th of July, 1921; $500 on or before the 1st of October, 1922; $500 on or before the 1st day of October of each year thereafter until the whole purchase price of $9,000 had been fully paid; all deferred payments, except the $2,000 due November 12, 1920, should bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from date until paid, and the interest on all deferred payments except the $2,500 payment due January 10, 1921, should be made on the 1st of October, 1921, and annually thereafter; defendants to have possession of the property on November 12, 1920; or, in other words, the defendants were to pay the annual installments and interest remaining due on the Elliott contract as they became due, and perform the other covenants and conditions of that contract, which Jacob Haberman had obligated himself to do, and in addition thereto pay plaintiff Jacob Haberman $9,000 for his equity in the Elliott contract, payable in installments as above set forth. This latter contract also contained this clause:

"That should the said second parties (Sawall and Leisman) fail, neglect or refuse to make the payments hereinabove required to be made by them or otherwise fail, neglect or refuse to comply with any of the terms of this contract or of the aforesaid contract of sale on their part, then the said first parties (Haberman and wife) may, at their option, consider this contract canceled and terminated, and shall be released from all obligations in law or in equity to make said assignment and transfer of said contract of sale to the said second parties, and the said second parties shall forfeit all right thereto, and to the real and personal property therein described, and will quit and deliver up possession thereof to the said first parties, and it is agreed that time is of the essence of this contract."

The terms of both contracts were complied with by the defendants until the time when the installments became due on October 1, 1923. On this date the defendants, under their contract with plaintiffs, had agreed to pay $1,000 and interest to Elliott and wife, and an installment of $500 and interest to plaintiffs. The $1,000 and interest due Elliott and wife on this date were not paid; the $500 due the plaintiff, Jacob Haberman, was not paid, and amounted to $675, including interest. Mr. Elliott, after October 1, 1923, demanded payment of Haberman, and Haberman stated that he could not make the payment himself, and that he was informed that Mr. Sawall and Mr. Leisman could not meet their payments, and asked Mr. Elliott for time. Mr. Elliott insisted that Haberman take the land and make the payments. Then Mr. Elliott gave Haberman two days to make up his mind whether he would take the land or not. Haberman visited the property, and in a day or two returned, and told Mr. Elliott that he did not want the land, and wanted to know how he could get released from his contract, and Mr. Elliott informed him that he understood Sawall and Leisman were willing to surrender their contract, and that, if he, Haberman, would give him, Elliott, a quitclaim deed, that would release him from his contract. Haberman agreed to this. Haberman then had a conversation with Mr. Sawall and Mr. Leisman, and demanded payment of them, and they both informed him that they could not make the payments, and were unable to go on with the contract, etc. Haberman, after further conversation, agreed to release them from any further payments under the contract, and stated that he was going to "call the contract off," and that he was going to quitclaim the land back to Elliott. Thereupon Sawall and Leisman agreed that Haberman might convey the property back to Elliott, saying, "that was the only thing to do." A day or two after this conversation Haberman and his wife and Mr. Elliott met at a real estate office in Fresno, and there Haberman and his wife signed and acknowledged a quitclaim deed for the property covered by the agreement to Mr. Elliott. After this deed was signed and acknowledged, there was a conversation between the real estate agent and Haberman in the German language, and after this conversation the real estate agent, a Mr. Yurk, stated to Mr. Elliott that Haberman wanted him, Elliott, to leave the deed in Yurk's hands until Leisman and Sawall brought in their contract. This was done. Elliott and Haberman and wife left the office of Mr. Yurk, and the same day Mr. Haberman met a friend, Mr. Scheidt, and told him what he had done with reference to the contracts, and Scheidt informed him he had made a mistake, and that he should recall the deed, and collect all of the money due him from Leisman and Sawall. Haberman and Scheidt then consulted an attorney, and this action was brought to recover $675, being the principal and interest due from defendants under the contract with the plaintiffs on October 1, 1923.

What became of the quitclaim deed is not revealed by the record. Mr. Elliott, being unable to recover possession of the deed, brought an action against plaintiffs and defendants to quiet title. No appearance was made by any of the plaintiffs or defendants to this suit to quiet title, and in December, 1923, Elliott procured judgment by default quieting his title, and thereafter demanded possession of the premises from a tenant of defendants, and, after some negotiations with the tenant regarding the removal of his crops, possession of the permises was delivered to Mr. Elliott without protest.

From these facts the trial court found that the contract between plaintiffs and defendants was then and there terminated and abandoned by mutual consent, and the defendants released from the payment of any moneys due thereunder, and released from any and all obligations under and by virtue of said contract, and gave judgment for the defendants.

[1, 2] From the testimony above related there is ample evidence in the record to support these findings of the trial court. There were a few inconsistencies in the testimony of both plaintiff, Jacob Haberman and the defendants, but the power to hear and determine the facts, and to weigh the testimony, rested with the trial court, and, as we have just shown, such findings, being supported by the evidence, are conclusive upon this court.

1. It is contended by appellants that a mutual rescission or abandonment of the contract between plaintiffs and defendants could not be effected by a verbal agreement, and that the court erred in admitting evidence of the conversations between Jacob Haberman and the defendants, Sawall and Leisman, as it was an attempt to vary the terms of a written contract by oral evidence.

[3] The purpose of the introduction of this oral testimony was not to vary the terms of the written contract, but to show that the contract between the plaintiffs and defendants had been canceled by mutual consent, and had no longer any operative effect. Such evidence is admissible for such purpose, as is oral testimony that the terms of a written agreement had been fully performed by the parties, or that the instrument evidencing such agreement has itself been canceled and destroyed by the concurrent act of both parties. Guidery v. Green, 95 Cal. 634, 30 P. 786; Arsenio v. Smith, 50 Cal. App. 173, 194 P. 756; Hooke v. Great Western Lumber Co., 54 Cal. App. 681, 202 P. 492; Tompkins v. Davidow, 27 Cal. App. 327, 149 P. 788.

In the case of Tompkins v. Davidow, above cited, which is somewhat similar to the case at bar, the court said:

"There can be no question that a contract can be mutually abandoned by the parties at any stage of their performance and each of the parties released from any further obligation on account thereof; that it may be done by parol, and the fact of its having been done established by evidence of the acts and declarations of the parties."

Again, in the case of Hooke v. Great Western Lumber Co., above cited, this court said:

"It is a general rule that a written contract as well as one not in writing may be discharged or modified by a subsequent oral agreement, and that the parol evidence rule does not exclude oral evidence thereof."

[4] 2. It is next contended by appellants that there was no consideration for the oral rescission or abandonment of the contract. It is true, as contended by appellants, that it is necessary that there be a consideration, but it has been held that the mutual oral agreement to cancel the contract is a sufficient consideration (Hooke v. Great Western Lumber Co., supra), and in this case Jacob Haberman's release from his obligation to transfer the contract between himself and Elliott to defendants was also a sufficient consideration for the abandonment of the contract.

It therefore follows that the court's ruling in the admission of evidence was correct, and that the judgment should be and it is hereby affirmed.

Ex parte GOHLKE. (Cr. 1263.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 7, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⟸13—Statute, denouncing as felony driving of vehicle without owner's consent, held to make such act an offense, though no penalty provided.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 146, denouncing as a felony driving of a vehicle without consent of owner, makes such act an offense independent of Penal Code, § 18, though it fails to prescribe any penalty as a punishment therefor, in view that penalty is sufficiently covered by sections 17, 18a, and 671, which must be read in connection and considered as part of felony described in such act.

2. Criminal law ⟸13—Statute, denouncing as felony driving of vehicle without owner's consent, makes such act an offense, though maximum penalty may be severe.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 146, denouncing as a felony driving of a vehicle without owner's consent, makes such act an offense, though maximum penalty specified by section 671, which is applicable to such offense, might be severe, since imposition of maximum penalty is not imperative, and it cannot be assumed that in case of conviction a penalty wholly disproportionate to offense will be inflicted.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by W. H. Gohlke, to be directed to the Sheriff of Fresno County, to secure petitioner's release from custody for driving an automobile without the owner's consent. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded to custody.

Charles A. Hill, of Fresno, for petitioner.

George R. Lovejoy, Dist. Atty., and William A. White, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Fresno, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Petitioner, by this proceeding in habeas corpus, seeks to be discharged from the custody of the sheriff of Fresno county, by whom he is detained under a commitment issued out of the police court of the city of Fresno, following the making of an order holding him to answer for trial before the superior court for "the offense of felony, to wit, driving automobile without owner's consent." The charge against petitioner is based upon section 146 of the Motor Vehicle Act of California (St. 1923, p. 564), which in part reads as follows:

"Any person who shall drive a vehicle not his own, without the consent of the owner * * * with intent to either permanently or temporarily deprive the owner thereof of his title to or possession of such vehicle, whether with or without intent to steal the same, shall be guilty of a felony."

The Motor Vehicle Act omits, however, to prescribe any penalty as a punishment for the commission of the felony therein declared, and upon that ground petitioner contends that the acts denounced by said section do not constitute a crime or public offense.

[1] It may be conceded, as petitioner claims, that a description, definition, and denouncement of the acts necessary to constitute a crime do not make the commission of such acts a crime unless a punishment be annexed, for a punishment is as necessary to constitute a crime as its exact definition (People v. McNulty, 93 Cal. 427, 26 P. 597, 29 P. 61), and furthermore it may be admitted that, under the rule stated in the case of In re Isch, 174 Cal. 180, 162 P. 1026, cited by petitioner, the penalty provided for in section 18 of the Penal Code, which provides that, "except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by this Code, every offense declared to be a felony is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, not exceeding five years," may not be invoked to supply the omission complained of, for the reason that the presence in that section of the words "prescribed by this Code" limits the operation thereof to those felonies declared by the Penal Code. Nevertheless, we are of the opinion that, independant of said section 18, the matter of penalty for the commission of the felony defined by said Motor Vehicle Act is sufficiently covered by other general provisions of the Penal Code, which must be read in connection with, and considered as a part of, the felony described in said act.

Section 17 of said Code declares that "a felony is a crime which is punishable with death or by imprisonment in the state prison. * * *" Manifestly, the felony under consideration is not punishable with death, and therefore must be, necessarily, punishable by imprisonment in the state prison; that being so, the minimum and maximum duration of such imprisonment is fixed by sections 18a and 671 of said Code. Section 18a reads:

"Except in cases where a different minimum punishment is prescribed by law, for every offense declared to be a felony and punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, the minimum punishment shall be imprisonment in the state prison for not less than six months."

And section 671 provides:

"Whenever any person is declared punishable for a crime by imprisonment in the state prison for a term not less than any specified number of years, and no limit to the duration of such imprisonment is declared, the court authorized to pronounce judgment upon such conviction may, in its discretion, sentence such offender to imprisonment during his natural life, or for any number of years not less than that prescribed."

[2] It will be observed that the language of both of these sections is much broader than the language of section 18. Section 18a, which was added to the Code after the Isch

Case was decided (Stats. 1919, p. 7), is not restricted, like said section 18, to cases of felony "prescribed by this (Penal) Code," but by its terms applies to all felonies except those wherein a different minimum "is prescribed by law"; and section 671 contains no words of limitation whatever. The fact that the maximum penalty specified by said section 671, if inflicted, might be severe, does not in itself serve as grounds for abolishing the crime sought to be punished, because the imposition of the maximum penalty is not imperative, and it cannot be assumed that in case of conviction a penalty wholly disproportionate to the offense will be inflicted. In re Hallawell, 8 Cal. App. 563, 97 P. 320.

The writ is discharged, and the prisoner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Fresno county.

PEOPLE v. HOWARD. (Cr. 1138.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 9, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⊜445—Duly certified copy of judgment of conviction held admissible in evidence to show prior conviction as being "writing," within definition of public writings, and within class of judgments designated as "other official documents."

A certified copy of a judgment of conviction, delivered with a convict to, and filed by, the warden of the state prison as a commitment pursuant to Pen. Code, §§ 1213, 1216, held admissible in evidence in support of charge of prior conviction, in view of Pol. Code, § 1032, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1892, 1893, as being a "writing" within definition of public writings, defined by section 1888, and within class of writings designated as "other official documents," in section 1894, subd. 3.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Write—Writing.]

2. Criminal law ⊜304(17)—Trial court held entitled to take judicial notice of official position of state prison warden and genuineness of his seal.

Trial court held entitled to take judicial notice of official position of state prison warden and genuineness of his seal; he being an executive officer of the state under Pol. Code, § 343.

3. Criminal law ⊜322—Presumed prima facie that person assuming to act as secretary for prison board or warden was regularly appointed as such secretary.

It will be presumed prima facie that a person assuming to act as the secretary for prison board or the state prison warden, within Pen. Code, § 1576, was regularly appointed as such secretary.

4. Criminal law ⊜322—Presumed that warden regularly performed his duty to furnish on demand certified copy of commitment in his custody.

It will be presumed, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 14, 15, that the state prison warden regularly performed his duty to furnish on demand a certified copy of a commitment in his custody.

5. Criminal law ⊜445—Paper purporting to be copy of certified copy of judgment of conviction and commitment, and containing paper certifying such copy is correct copy of certified copy of judgment, held admissible in charge of prior conviction.

A paper purporting to be a copy of a certified copy of a judgment of conviction and commitment, and containing a certificate of the state prison warden, certifying that such copy of certified copy of judgment is a true and correct copy of the commitment in the case of a designated prisoner, and on file in warden's office, held admissible as evidence of the existence of and contents of the original copy, or of the duly certified copy thereof, alleged to have been on file in the office of the warden, in view of Pen. Code, §§ 1213, 1216, 1576, Pol. Code, §§ 343, 1032, Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1888, 1892, 1893, section 1894, subd. 3, and section 1963, subds. 14, 15, and Const. art. 10, § 3.

6. Criminal law ⊜1202(3) — Evidence held sufficient to sustain charge of prior conviction of felony.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a charge of prior conviction of felony.

7. Burglary ⊜31—Admitting evidence of physical condition of transom, above door leading to room wherein offense was alleged to have been committed, held proper.

Admitting evidence of physical condition of transom, above door leading to room wherein offense was alleged to have been committed, held proper.

8. Criminal law ⊜1170(4)—Sustaining objections to questions, not improper cross-examination, held not prejudicial; questions having previously been answered substantially.

Sustaining of objections to questions, not constituting improper cross-examination, held not prejudicial; questions having previously been answered substantially.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; George Samuels, Judge.

James E. Howard, alias Charles Leonard, was convicted of an attempt to commit burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CASHIN, J. Appellant was charged by information, filed in the superior court of Alameda county, with the crime of attempted burglary, and further therein charged with having, on January 14, 1920, prior to the attempted burglary alleged, been convicted under the name of Charles Leonard in the superior court of San Diego county of a felony, to wit, burglary of the second degree; that on said conviction appellant served a term of imprisonment in the California state prison at San Quentin. The appellant entered his plea of "not guilty" to both of these charges, on both was convicted, and was sentenced to be imprisoned in the state prison at San Quentin. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from the order and judgment has appealed.

Appellant assigns certain rulings of the court as prejudicial error, and contends that the evidence adduced by the prosecution on the charge of prior conviction is insufficient to support the verdict.

The evidence in support of that charge was the testimony of A. B. Monahan, a guard employed at San Quentin prison, who identified appellant as a person whom the witness had known between the months of January, 1920, and November, 1922, as a convict then confined in that prison, and known to the witness as Blackie Leonard. Appellant took the stand on his own behalf, and on cross-examination refused to answer the questions of the district attorney as to whether he had ever been convicted of a felony, and whether he had not been so convicted in the superior court of San Diego county under the name of Charles Leonard. The prosecution offered in evidence a paper purporting to be a copy of a copy of a judgment and commitment to the state prison at San Quentin of and from the superior court of San Diego county, with a paper attached thereto purporting to be a copy of the certificate of the clerk of that court, authenticating it as a true copy of such judgment; the purported judgment being one of conviction of Charles Leonard in said court on January 14, 1920, of the crime of burglary in the second degree. Attached to the paper offered was a certificate upon which was impressed the seal of the state prison at San Quentin, such certificate purporting to be that of J. A. Johnston, the warden, by K. T. Pietrzak, secretary, and certifying the papers attached, being the copy of the certified copy of the judgment hereinabove referred to, to be "a true and correct copy of the commitment in the case of prisoner No. 31995, Charles Leonard, now on file in this office." Appellant objected to this evidence as being incompetent, on the grounds that it was hearsay and secondary evidence.

[1] We are of the opinion that a certified copy of the judgment of conviction, delivered with the convict to, and filed by, the warden of the state prison as a commitment pursuant to sections 1213 and 1216 of the Penal Code, may be held by reasonable construction of the language of the Code to be a writing within the definition of public writings as such are defined by section 1888, Code of Civil Procedure, and within the class of such writings designated as "other official documents," in subdivision 3 of section 1894 of said Code; and, such being in the custody of the warden of a state prison, a public officer, for the purposes provided by the Penal Code, and being one which a citizen has a right to inspect (Pol. Code, § 1032), a duly certified copy thereof is admissible in evidence (Code Civ. Proc., §§ 1892, 1893).

[2-4] Such being the character of the writing so delivered and filed, the point made by appellant is whether a paper purporting to be a copy thereof was admissible as evidence of the existence and contents of the original record or of the duly certified copy thereof, alleged to have been on file in the office of the warden, without other proof than that of the certificate shown above.

The wardens of the state prisons are executive officers of the state of California (Pol. Code, § 343), and provision is made by law for a seal of office to be used by the warden as such. The only other officers of the state prisons whose offices as such were created by law are the clerks and five directors; the latter having the power to determine the necessary officers and employees of the prisons other than wardens and clerks, and to specify their duties severally (Pen. Code, § 1576), and the warden having the power to appoint the officers and employees of the prison so determined by the directors (Const., art. 10, § 3).

[5, 6] There is no direct evidence in the record of the appointment of K. T. Pietrzak, who signed the certificate mentioned as secretary, or of his authority as such. There is, however, attached thereto the seal of the warden, the certificate purported to be that of J. A. Johnston as warden, and of whose official position and the genuineness of whose seal the trial court might and did take judicial notice. The appointment of a secretary for the board or warden was provided for by statute (Pen. Code, § 1576), and the said Pietrzak, as shown by the certificate, assumed to act as such. It will be presumed prima facie that he was regularly appointed as such secretary; and, it being the duty of the warden to furnish on demand a certified copy of the commitment in his custody, it will be presumed that such duty was regularly performed. Code Civ. Proc., § 1963, subds. 14 and 15. We are of the opinion that the certificate with the copy of the certified copy of the judgment was properly admitted in evidence, and that this, with the testimony of the witness Monahan, was sufficient prima facie to prove the identity of the appellant with Charles Leonard, and that he had been convicted of a felony in the superior court of San Diego county as charged.

[7, 8] The appellant further assigns as error the ruling of the court admitting, over objection, evidence of the physical condition of the transom above the door leading to the room wherein the offense was alleged to have been committed, and sustaining objections to certain questions by appellant on cross-examination with reference to the same conditions. The former rulings were proper. The latter, while not improper cross-examination, had been answered substantially in replies to previous questions.

The other matters assigned as error were the refusal of the court to direct a verdict for appellant, to allow appellant's challenges of certain jurors for cause, an instruction of the court in which was quoted the language of section 663, Penal Code, and certain general objections to the jury system as administered in Alameda county, none of which have substantial merit.

After an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, we are of the opinion that the evidence supports the verdict, and that no error was committed by the court prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

SULLIVAN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4984.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 6, 1925.)

1. Divorce ⟸249(1)—Property rights not properly to be covered by interlocutory decree of divorce.

Property rights are not properly to be covered in interlocutory decree of divorce.

2. Divorce ⟸254—Interlocutory decree of divorce adjudging property rights becomes conclusive through lapse of time, when no appeal taken therefrom or attempt to set it aside made.

An attempt by judge to adjudge property rights in an interlocutory decree of divorce does not represent departure from jurisdiction of court, but is mere matter of error, and when petitioner, ordered by such decree to convey property to wife and build her a house, did not appeal therefrom, or make attempt, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to set it aside, such decree, through lapse of time, became final.

3. Divorce ⟸254—Petitioner, not having appealed or attempted to set aside interlocutory divorce decree within proper time, cannot attack order therein, on ground that it requires rendition of personal service.

Where petitioner did not, within proper time, appeal from interlocutory divorce decree ordering him to build wife a house, or move to set decree aside under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, he cannot later attack validity of such order on the ground that courts will not specifically enforce the rendition of personal service.

4. Divorce ⟸269(1)—Disobedience to one of orders in interlocutory divorce decree sufficient basis for contempt proceedings.

Where petitioner disobeyed order in interlocutory divorce decree, ordering him to convey land to wife, such disobedience was sufficient to support contempt proceedings, without determining whether an order contained in such decree, ordering petitioner to build a house, was void as uncertain and indefinite.

5. Divorce ⟸254—Petitioner, failing to appeal from interlocutory divorce decree, or to move to set it aside, cannot attack orders therein for lack of allegations in pleadings in action to support them.

Petitioner cannot attack orders in an interlocutory divorce decree on ground that they were not supported by allegations in pleadings in the divorce action, where he did not appeal from decree or move to set it aside.

6. Divorce ⟸170—Final decree of divorce may be denied party on the ground that he is in contempt of requirement in interlocutory decree.

A final decree of divorce may be denied party on the ground that he is in contempt of some requirement of interlocutory decree of divorce.

Application by R. E. Sullivan for writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and Hon. J. W. Summerfield, Judge thereof, to compel the entry of final decree of divorce. Writ denied.

Hilton & Critchley, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Sebald L. Cheroske, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. Petitioner presented his petition, asking that respondents be ordered to enter a final decree in an action for divorce between petitioner and his wife, which is pending in respondent court, and our alternative writ of mandate went forth. Respondents make return by demurrer to the petition.

The petition alleges that on September 27, 1922, petitioner and his wife entered into a written agreement for the settlement of their property rights; that the agreement provided, among other things, that petitioner "shall cause to be conveyed unto" the wife certain particularly described real property in Los Angeles county, and "shall further cause to be erected and constructed upon said real property a dwelling house of five rooms;" that theretofore, on July 20, 1922, petitioner commenced, in respondent court, an action against his wife for divorce on the ground of desertion; that on April 5, 1923, respondent court rendered its interlocutory decree of divorce in that action, which decree adjudged in part "that the plaintiff shall cause to be conveyed unto the defendant" the real property already mentioned, and that "said plaintiff shall further cause to be erected and constructed upon said real property a dwelling house of five rooms;" that "thereafter, and on the 17th day of April, 1924, more than one year having elapsed since the entry of the interlocutory decree, and no appeal having been taken from said judgment, and no motion for a new trial having been made, and the action not having been dismissed, this petitioner made application for a final decree; that thereupon * * * the defendant in the said action for divorce filed therein her petition based upon her affidavit * * * asking that a final decree be denied this petitioner, in that he was in contempt of court, having failed to comply with the terms of the aforementioned interlocutory decree, in that he had failed * * * to convey unto said defendant the aforementioned property, and had further failed to erect thereon a house in accordance with the terms of said interlocutory decree;" that thereafter, on May 22, 1924, before respondent judge, evidence was adduced in support of the last-mentioned petition, and "the court, after considering all testimony, found that this petitioner * * * had not complied with the order of the court, * * * in that he had not deeded said land" to his wife, "and that he had further not erected thereon a house as per the said interlocutory decree;" that at said hearing petitioner showed, by "uncontradicted testimony, that on account of financial reasons he was unable to comply with the order of the court in the building of the said house, but in lieu thereof had furnished" his wife "with an apartment, and paid therefor out of his own funds"; that "he had offered to convey said lot to" his wife, but that she "refused to join with him in the said conveyance according to the law, * * * and petitioner stands now ready and willing to deed said land" at any time when his wife "will join in the said conveyance to herself"; that it "was further shown at said hearing that this petitioner had put forth every effort to secure a loan to build said house, but that he was unable to secure such loan, and, not having the money himself, was unable to comply with the said order of court;" that thereafter, and on July 29, 1924, respondent judge caused to be entered an order holding petitioner in contempt of court for his failure to deed the land and to build the house, as required by the interlocutory decree; and that thereafter respondent judge refused to make and enter a final decree of divorce because of the order holding petitioner in contempt of court. The prayer of the petition is that respondents be required to set aside the order adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt of court and to enter a final decree of divorce.

[1, 2] Petitioner contends that the requirements that he build the house and convey the land had no proper place in the interlocutory decree, and were not therefore a basis for the order adjudging him to be in contempt. It has been decided several times, on appeals from interlocutory decrees of divorce, that such matters as those mentioned are not properly to be covered by such decrees. See Radich v. Radich, 64 Cal. App. 605, 222 P. 182, and cases cited in the opinion there rendered. Where, however, there is no appeal from the interlocutory decree, the rule is quite different. The attempt by interlocutory decree to make disposition of the property rights of the parties to the action does not represent a departure from the jurisdiction of the court. It is but a mere matter of error. If the interlocutory decree is not appealed from, or no attempt is made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure to set it aside on the ground that it was rendered through the surprise, inadvertence, or excusable neglect of the defendant, it becomes, through lapse of time, as fully a finality as if the matters mentioned were included in a final decree. In the absence of an appeal, or of a motion for relief under section 473, the parties are concluded by it. Abbott v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 232 P. 154. Here the time within which an appeal might have been taken and the time within which relief might have been sought under section 473 had both expired. The interlocutory decree became then, in the respects mentioned, as good as a final decree, granting that error was committed in its rendition.

[3] Petitioner contends for the invalidity of the interlocutory decree on another ground and insists that, because of its alleged invalidity on that ground, he could not legally be charged with contempt of court in refusing to obey it. The ground insisted upon is this: The provision of the interlocutory decree requiring the building of a house is void, for the reason that the courts will not specifically enforce the performance of a contract by which it is agreed that personal services shall be rendered. This point comes within the ruling of Abbott v. Superior Court, supra. If the agreement to build be regarded as an agreement to perform personal services, the attempt of respondent court to decree a specific performance of it can be regarded as nothing more than error, if, indeed, it is to be regarded even as error, which we do not decide, and petitioner has had his opportunity to correct the error by appeal. Not having availed himself of the opportunity, the requirement of the decree in the regard mentioned has become conclusive against him.

[4] Petitioner makes the further point that the interlocutory decree could not form a proper basis for the contempt charge against him, for the reason that the order to build the house was indefinite and uncertain. He cites authority, in support of his contention, to the effect that an uncertain order cannot furnish ground for a charge of contempt in disobeying it. We need not, however, decide whether the order in the respect mentioned was indefinite and uncertain. There still remains the order to convey. As petitioner was held in contempt as for a disobedience in the matter of that order, it is unimportant whether he was in contempt of the order to build.

[5] It is insisted that the order to build and the order to convey were alike void, upon the ground that there were not allegations of the pleadings in the divorce action to support them. This question is concluded under the rule stated in Abbott v. Superior Court, supra.

[6] It is contended that, an interlocutory decree of divorce having been rendered, the party in whose favor it had been made cannot be denied a final decree upon the ground that he is in contempt of some requirement of the interlocutory decree. Directly the contrary has been decided. See Weeks v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 620, 203 P. 93.

Demurrer sustained. The alternative writ of mandate is vacated, and a peremptory writ is denied.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 24, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 22, 1925.)

1. Licenses ⊂⊃39—Executory contract for sale of stock held void, where no application made to commissioner of corporations for permit to sell stock.

Executory contract for sale of stock to employee held void, in view of Corporate Securities Act, §§ 3, 12, where no application to issue stock attempted to be sold, and containing copy of contract for sale thereof, was ever made to commissioner of corporations prior to commencement of action.

2. Contracts ⊂⊃136—Purchaser of stock, under executory contract for sale, held not estopped to question validity of contract where it violated statute.

Purchaser, under executory contract for sale of stock, held not estopped, by conduct and ratification, to question validity of contract, where contract was void in view of Corporate Securities Act, §§ 3, 12, because no application to issue stock attempted to be sold, containing copy of contract, was ever made to commissioner of corporations.

One may not ratify contract contrary to express statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by A. J. Reno against the American Ice Machine Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Roy A. Bronson and E. D. Bronson, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sterling Carr, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against it, in an action brought to recover $891, alleged to be due to the plaintiff under facts revealed by the following findings, containing statements which were stipulated to be true:

On October 23, 1920, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract by the terms of which plaintiff was employed as agent for the defendant in the sale, design, construction, and erection of its apparatus, and in the direction and management of its business. The employment was to terminate at the pleasure of the board of directors of the defendant. Plaintiff was to be paid a salary of $49.50 a week. He subscribed to 33 shares of stock of defendant company at $100 a share, payable by a weekly credit on his salary account of $16.50. The agreement further provides that, in the event of a termination of the agreement by either party, plaintiff should not offer for sale the stock so acquired by him to any third party without first offering the same to the stockholders of the company. The plaintiff entered the employ of defendant under the terms of said contract, and continued in such employment until February 24, 1923, and duly and regularly performed all the terms of the contract by him to be performed. At the time the contract between the parties was entered into the defendant did not have a permit from the commissioner of corporations of this state to sell or dispose of its capital stock as required by the Corporate Securities Act. The defendant withheld from the salary of plaintiff $16.50 weekly during the period of employment, which sums aggregated $891 at the date the employment was terminated. Under date of June 29, 1921, defendant received a permit from the commissioner of corporations to sell certain of its shares of capital stock. Under date of October 14, 1921, the defendant received an amended permit from said commissioner, and in neither of these permits was the contract between plaintiff and defendant referred to, passed upon, or agreed to by the said commissioner. Said permits were revoked by said commissioner of corporations on June 21, 1922. Upon May 10, 1923, after the commencement of this action, the defendant filed an application with said commissioner for permission to issue its capital stock, and a new permit was issued upon said application. On May 1, 1922, during the period of plaintiff's employment, the stockholders of the defendant company held a meeting, at which plaintiff was present, and at which plaintiff made a motion that said stockholders apply to the commissioner of corporations for a permit to sell and issue its capital stock. On June 22, 1922, the directors of said defendant held a meeting at which plaintiff was also present.

No shares of stock of the defendant company were ever offered, issued, or tendered to plaintiff prior to the commencement of this action, and the plaintiff has never taken or received any of the capital stock of said defendant, but, subsequent to the date of the filing of the action, defendant tendered to plaintiff nine shares of stock, which plaintiff refused to accept. Before bringing this action, plaintiff demanded the return to him of the amount of his salary retained by the company.

As appellant correctly states, the only question presented by the appeal is the validity of the subscription agreement between the parties. If such agreement was not valid in its inception, and did not become so later by reason of any action of the plaintiff, it is conceded that the judgment must be affirmed.

There is a contention by appellant, urged in one portion of its brief, that the original contract for stock, which contract was made in the absence of a permit to the corporation to issue said stock, was not void. The Corporate Securities Act, § 3 (Stats. 1917, p. 673), provides that no corporation shall take subscriptions for any security of its own issue until it shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner a permit authorizing it so to do. Such application shall contain, among other things, a copy of any contract it proposes to make concerning the same.

[1] No application to issue the stock attempted to be sold to plaintiff, and containing a copy of the contract for the sale thereof, was ever made to the commissioner of corporations prior to the commencement of this action, and it was never possible for the defendant company to have lawfully issued its stock to plaintiff. That being true, we think it must follow that the contract for the sale of the same was void. Section 12 of the Corporate Securities Act provides that any security issued without a permit shall be void. But appellant contends that this provision does not apply to a contract for the sale of stock. Can it be contended seriously that, while an executed contract forbidden by statute is void, the same contract, while executory, is valid? If the issuance of the stock to plaintiff during the term of his employment by the defendant would have been void, certainly the contract for the issuance of the same was equally void.

[2, 3] The next question raised by appellant is involved in the contention that although the original contract was void when made, it became possible for the defendant to perform the same at one period when it had certain unrevoked permits from the commissioner, and that during that period the contract was ratified by the plaintiff by attending meetings of the stockholders and directors and thus assuming to act as such, and also by plaintiff's continued payments upon the purchase price of the stock. An answer to this contention is the finding of the trial court that under neither permit to issue stock, which defendant had been granted prior to the commencement of this action, was defendant permitted to make the contract involved here. If this finding be a misconstruction of the permits which were granted, nevertheless there remains the steadfast rule of law that one may not ratify a void contract—a contract contrary to an express statute. This is one of the distinctions between void and voidable contracts. The doctrines of estoppel by conduct and ratification have no application to a contract which is void because it violates an express mandate of the law or the dictates of public policy. Such a contract has no legal existence for any purpose, and neither action nor inaction of a party to it can validate it, and no conduct of a party to it can be invoked as an estoppel against asserting its invalidity. Colby v. Title Ins., etc., Co., 160 Cal. 632, 644, 117 P. 913, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 813, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 515; Lukens v. Nye, 156 Cal. 498, 505, et seq., 105 P. 593, 20 Ann. Cas. 158. The case of Moore v. Moffatt, 188 Cal. 1, 204 P. 220, relied upon by appellant as contrary to the doctrine we have just announced, does not so impress us. That was not an action between the parties to avoid contract, but an action by a trustee in bankruptcy of a corporation to recover the unpaid subscription price of stock for the benefit of creditors. That situation presents an exception to the rule above announced, which rule is suspended in the interests of innocent third persons who have relied upon the contract. 6 R. C. L., p. 820, § 215.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CORDERO. (Cr. 836.)

1. Witnesses ⟸387—Sustaining objection to question, on cross-examination of state witness as to which of conflicting statements was true, held proper.

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 288, objection of counsel for prosecution to question, on cross-examination of state witness as to truth of his former statements, made to counsel for defendant, which were different from statements in his testimony, was properly sustained; it being for jury to determine which of conflicting statements were true.

2. Criminal law ⟸730(8)—Remarks of counsel for prosecution, as to whether state witness was being tampered with, held not prejudicial error warranting reversal.

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 288, where defense was based on claim that boys alleged to have been tampered with by defendant had framed the case, remarks of counsel for prosecution, while defense counsel was cross-examining one of the boys as a witness, to let him alone, and that "we will see if you are tampering with witness" held not prejudicial error warranting reversal, in view of charge to consider testimony only.

3. Criminal law ⟸666½—Right of counsel for defendant to interview witness is sacred.

Right of counsel for defendant to interview witnesses prior to trial is as sacred as right of district attorneys to ascertain all facts concerning cause to be tried, and exercise thereof constitutes no basis for charge of improper or unprofessional conduct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Charles Cordero was convicted of violating Pen. Code, § 288, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Reynolds, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was prosecuted for the offense denounced and made punishable by the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code. Following the defendant's conviction, a motion for a new trial being denied, the defendant appeals. In prosecuting this appeal, no question is tendered to the court as to the sufficiency of the evidence, if believed by the jury, to support the verdict. We have read all the testimony set forth in the transcript, and are satisfied therefrom that no question could be raised as to its sufficiency, but the nature of the testimony is such as to preclude its being set forth in this opinion.

The points relied upon for reversal relate simply to remarks made by the district attorney during the course of the examination of witnesses and in his closing address to the jury. Appellant also sets forth in his brief that certain remarks of the court were prejudicial, but, as an examination of the transcript discloses no objections to the remarks made at the time, and no request made by counsel that the court instruct the jury to disregard such remarks, it is not necessary for us to set forth the remarks of the court, or to make any further comment thereon.

The testimony relied upon by the prosecution being an action based, as we have said, on section 288 of the Penal Code, was necessarily, in large part, that of the testimony of small boys. It appears that the attorney for the defendant interviewed one of the boys involved in the offense alleged to have been committed by the defendant, and obtained from him some statements as to why he was testifying against the defendant, and that the boy, under the examination conducted by the attorney for the defendant at the interview referred to, made statements different, or at least alleged to be different, from the testimony he had given on the witness stand. It also appears that the defense in this case was based upon the claim that the boys alleged to have been tampered with by the defendant had framed the case against the defendant out of spite, owing to some differences relating to money matters. It was during the cross-examination of the witnesses, that had been interviewed by the attorney for the defendant prior to the trial, that the remarks of the district attorney, hereinafter set forth, were made, which appear in the transcript as follows:

"Q. And didn't you tell me on that occasion that the story wasn't true, that you boys got together and framed it by reason of the fact that you were sore at Charlie Cordero? A. Yeh.

"Q. That is what you told me yesterday? A. Yeh.

"Q. Now, is that the truth, Mario? Did you tell me and your father the truth? Was what you told us yesterday true, Mario? Do you understand that?

"Mr. Henderson: Well, let him alone. See if he understands it. We will see if you are tampering with witnesses or what.

"Mr. Reynolds. May it please the court, I assign that remark upon Mr. Henderson's part as prejudicial error to this defendant.

"Mr Henderson: We will find out whether it is prejudicial error.

"Mr. Reynolds: All right, and I assign this remark—

"Mr. Henderson (interposing): By the time we get through with this witness, Mr. Reynolds, we will find out."

At this time, it appears from the transcript, that a brother of the witness was alleged to be shaking his hand at the witness, whereupon Mr. Henderson said:

"Let us get hold of him. We will find out about this thing, whether he is framing these witnesses or not.

"Mr Reynolds: Again, I assign that remark of the district attorney as prejudicial error, and I ask the court to admonish the jury to pay no attention to that remark."

At a later period in the trial, during the course of an argument participated in by the district attorney and counsel for the defendant, the district attorney used these words, "I call it intimidating the witnesses for the prosecution," referring to interviews had by counsel for the defendant with witnesses who appeared for the prosecution.

[1] As to the evidence itself, it is clear that the objections thereto, made by counsel for the prosecution, were correctly sustained. It was for the jury and not for the witness to determine which of the conflicting statements, if the statements were conflicting, were true. The different statements alleged to have been made by the witness were allowed to be admitted by the court, and the circumstances under which the statements were made, and the jury also had the witnesses before it, and could determine whether the witness was confused in his statements, was endeavoring to tell the truth, or whether he was endeavoring to assist in framing a case against the defendant.

[2] It does not appear that the defendant submitted any proposed instructions to the jury to disregard the remarks of the district attorney, nor does it appear that any further attention was paid thereto. The remarks, in and of themselves, while uncalled for, and remarks that should not have been made, taken in connection with the testimony adduced under the claim of the defendant that a case had been framed against him, do not, we think, constitute prejudicial error, warranting a reversal of the case. The jury was carefully instructed that they should consider nothing in arriving at their verdict except the evidence, which had been admitted by the court and allowed to remain, that they were not to allow passion or prejudice to govern them in their deliberations, but that they should find their verdict upon the testimony, and the testimony alone. These are not the exact words of the instructions, but correctly state their substance upon these points.

[3] In the course of his address to the jury, the district attorney referred to the fact that counsel for the defendant made no attempt to impeach the testimony of one of the witnesses named Joe Senga, and that the defense's attack was principally directed against the witness named Mario. We find nothing of merit in this assignment of error, and our attention has not been called to anything contained therein which would warrant this court in interfering with the verdict of the jury. The right of counsel to interview witnesses prior to a trial of a case is just as sacred, and just as full and complete, as is the right of district attorneys to ascertain all the facts concerning the cause to be tried. The exercise of this right by counsel for the defendant, in and of itself, constitutes no basis for a charge of improper or unprofessional conduct, but we cannot conclude that jurors, sworn to find a true verdict, will disregard their oaths and also disobey the instructions of the court to base their verdict upon the testimony alone, will allow themselves to be influenced by one or two casual remarks, which may be made by counsel under the influence of passion, or when it has been charged that the case he is presenting against a defendant is a framed or put-up scheme to convict the defendant.

We find nothing in the case justifying a reversal. It is therefore ordered that the judgment and order of the trial court be, and the same are hereby, affirmed.

FISHER et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.
(Civ. 4725.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 13, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1925.)

Highways ⟸213(2, 4)—Negligence in causing smoke and contributory negligence of driver held questions for jury.

Whether railroad company burning thicket along the side of the highway, causing smoke obscuring automobile driver's vision, was negligent, and whether driver, who, though conscious of the danger, proceeded until a collision occurred, was contributorily negligent, in view of his apprehension of danger from the smoke and fire, and from a possible collision with a following car, held questions for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Edith Fisher and husband against the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Goldman, Nye & Surr, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. Appeal by Edith Fisher and Ralph W. Fisher, her husband, from an order of nonsuit and judgment entered thereon in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco in favor of respondent, Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, and against appellants.

The action was brought by appellants to recover damages on account of personal injuries received by appellant Edith Fisher, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of respondent. Respondent denied the alleged negligence, and pleaded the negligence of appellant Ralph W. Fisher as a proximate contributing cause of the damage alleged.

The evidence, in substance, was as follows: On January 3, 1921, at about 3:40 o'clock p. m., appellants were traveling in an automobile driven by Ralph W. Fisher in a southerly direction, on a paved highway, at a point near Maxwell, in Colusa county. The right of way and tracks of respondent run parallel with the highway north and south at the point mentioned; the westerly line thereof being the easterly line of the right of way of the highway. On the date mentioned, respondent was engaged in burning dry weeds and tules which had grown upon its right of way between the tracks and the east line of the right of way for the highway, and in so doing burned grass growing along the east line of the paved portions of the highway, causing smoke to arise and drift over and across the pavement, obscuring, at times, the vision of those traveling thereon. The highway was undergoing repairs, and there had been placed a sign some distance north of the point mentioned stating the fact and that its condition was "dangerous but passable," which sign was seen and read by Fisher. The paved portion of the highway at the places mentioned herein was 16 feet wide. As appellants approached the section of the railroad right of way being burned, smoke was drifting therefrom to the west across the pavement, obscuring vision to some extent, and when they arrived at a point about 100 feet north of the place of the accident hereinafter described a cloud of smoke from a thicket fired by respondent suddenly enveloped them, making it impossible for them to see in the direction in which they were going farther than the front of the hood of the automobile. To this point Fisher had been driving at a speed of about 15 miles an hour. He knew that another automobile was following, but did not know at that moment its distance in the rear. A space of about 4 feet in width, being the earth portion of the right of way, ran along the west line of the pavement, permitting a car to stand off the pavement to approximately that extent. Parallel with and adjoining said strip was a ditch used to drain water from the road surface. At a point 100 feet south of where the smoke cloud enveloped appellants, and on their right-hand side, there had been left standing unattended and facing appellants on the highway by the California highway commission a motor truck, which was unseen by them. Appellants testified that the smoke was suffocating and made vision ahead impossible, and that flames were visible and the heat therefrom intense. Ralph W. Fisher was conscious of the danger of proceeding, but apprehensive of the smoke and fire, and also of a possible collision with the car approaching from the rear if he stopped on the pavement or ran his car upon the dirt strip to the extent possible by reason of its width; he proceeded at a speed less than 15 miles an hour —how much less the evidence does not show —with the result that appellants' automobile struck the truck mentioned and caused bodily injury to Edith Fisher. Appellants' car was damaged to such an extent that the inference might be drawn of a speed greater than the testimony directly shows.

The car approaching from the rear was in fact about 500 yards away at the time appellants were enveloped by the smoke and became conscious of the danger of proceeding. At a point between 75 and 100 feet north of the place of collision, appellant Ralph W. Fisher could see the flames mentioned through the smoke, and which were distant 14 feet from the edge of the pavement, but could not see objects ahead of the automobile.

The motion for nonsuit was granted on the ground of lack of evidence showing negligence on the part of respondent, and on the further ground that, assuming such negligence, the only reasonable conclusion from the evidence was that Ralph W. Fisher also was negligent, and that such negligence was imputable to Edith Fisher, and was a proximate contributing cause of the injuries and damage alleged.

In view of the facts known to respondent, and those which should have been apparent to it before and at the time the thicket was fired—the position of the standing truck which, as a fair inference from the evidence, could be seen by respondent's employees, the direction of the wind, the obvious fact that clouds of smoke would be created and would drift across the highway, the presence of travelers moving south thereon, the probability that their vision would be obscured and a view of the track cut off, and the fact that no warning of the presence of the truck was given or attempted before or after these atmospheric conditions were produced—we are of the opinion that a jury might reasonably and fairly find respondent guilty of negligence which was a proximate cause of the injuries and damage alleged.

It is contended by respondent that from the conduct of appellants but one reasonable conclusion could fairly be arrived at by the jury, to wit, that the act of appellant Ralph W. Fisher in proceeding through the smoke at a rate of speed not permitting the stopping of the car quickly enough to prevent a collision, or, if a collision occurred, that it would be of so slight a character as not to entail injury to the occupants of the automobile, was, in view of his consciousness of the danger of proceeding, negligent and a proximate contributing cause of the injuries and damage suffered.

We are prepared to affirm that such conduct, standing alone, would constitute negligence as a matter of law; but we are also of the opinion that, from the situation presented to appellant Ralph W. Fisher, namely, his apprehension of danger from the rear, the obstruction of vision by the smoke, the heat and sight of the flames, calculated to induce excitement and confusion of mind, the jury might fairly and reasonably have concluded that, while actual peril did not exist, the driver had reasonable ground based on appearances for believing that such peril did exist, and that his course of action in proceeding in the manner and at the rate of speed that might be inferred from the evidence was such as an ordinarily prudent man might reasonably have adopted under like circumstances. McRae v. Erickson, 1 Cal. App. 326, 329, 82 P. 209; Gibson v. Kennedy Extension Mining Co., 172 Cal. 294, 301, 156 P. 56. It is our opinion that the case should have been submitted to the jury and the motion for a nonsuit denied.

For the foregoing reasons it is ordered that the judgment be reversed.

PEOPLE v. SOKOLIS. (Cr. 1217.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 8, 1925.)

Witnesses ⊂=301—Cross-examination held not to include matters outside of scope of direct examination so as to compel accused to be witness against himself.

In prosecution for receiving stolen automobiles, where accused gave an account of some transactions in which he purchased one or both of the automobiles alleged to have been stolen, and described somewhat generally his method of transacting business, and denied he ever bought a car that he knew was stolen, cross-examination of accused as to the particular transactions concerning which he had testified and about other matters, responsive only to the direct testimony, held not to include matters outside of scope of direct examination so as to compel accused in effect to testify against himself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

E. L. Sokolis was convicted of receiving stolen property, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Mart Coles, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of receiving stolen property. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

No briefs were filed. On oral argument, counsel for appellant, without specifically pointing out any error of the trial court, stated as the ground of his appeal that on cross-examination of the defendant the court permitted that cross-examination to include matters outside of the scope of the direct examination, and that defendant was thereby unlawfully compelled to be a witness against himself.

The rule of law relating to such cross-examination, as well as the manner in which that rule should be applied, was clearly explained by the Supreme Court in People v. Creeks, 170 Cal. 368, 379, 149 P. 821. We have examined those portions of the defendant's testimony to which we understand that the oral argument referred. On direct examination, the defendant gave an account of some transactions in which he purchased one or both of the automobiles which were alleged to have been stolen, and also described somewhat generally his method of transacting business in relation to the purchase and sale of automobiles. In reply to a question of his counsel, asking whether he did "so take that car or any other car," the witness replied, "No, sir; I never taken any car if I knew it was stolen, because I never do any kind of business like that." After he had given some other testimony of a similar character, he was questioned by the district attorney about the particular transactions concerning which he had testified. Also, he was questioned about other matters which could be responsive only to the direct testimony of the witness in which he denied in general terms that he ever purchased any stolen automobiles knowing that they were stolen property. The court overruled the objections, not only for the reason that the questions had a bearing upon "the question of intent" of the defendant, but also for the additional stated reason that the direct examination had covered the topic, and that thereby the gates had been let down for the purpose of impeaching the witness and attacking his credibility.

We think that the cross-examination was reasonably limited to the subject-matter of the direct examination, and that there was no error in overruling the objections of the defendant. To have excluded these questions from the cross-examination would have left unchallenged his general statements, made in his own favor, in giving his direct testimony. The prosecution was entitled to meet that situation by appropriate questions, to show by the defendant's own admission that he had made contrary statements, or that his conduct had been inconsistent with the statements given in his direct testimony.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

FISKE v. LOWRY. (Civ. 5142.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 15, 1925. Rehearing Denied June 8, 1925.)

Appeal and error ⟹1011(1)—Findings of trial court conclusive where the evidence is conflicting.

Findings of trial court on questions of fact are conclusive where the evidence is conflicting.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by F. L. Fiske against P. C. Lowry. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sidney P. Robertson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Arthur L. Shannon, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment against him in the sum of $1,545.60 for plumbing supplies alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant by the plaintiff.

The complaint is in two counts. Count 1 alleges:

"That within two years immediately last past defendant became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,545.60, on account of goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant at the latter's instance and request; that neither the whole or any part of said sum has been paid."

Count 2 alleges:

"That on the 20th day of February, 1924, an account was stated between plaintiff and defendant in the sum of $1,545.60; that defendant agreed to pay plaintiff said sum but neither the whole or any part thereof has been paid."

Defendant, by his amended answer, denies specifically both counts of the complaint, and in addition alleges, as a separate defense, that the merchandise, consisting of certain plumbing supplies, were not purchased by him, but, on the contrary, were placed in his warehouse on the understanding and agreement that defendant should sell same as agent for plaintiff, and receive a commission on all sales made, and that in pursuance of this agreement defendant did sell certain of said plumbing supplies to his regular customers, but that the goods were defective, and many were returned and rebates made to customers on others. Defendant admits that there is certain money due plaintiff from him on these sales, but contends that he could not pay any money to plaintiff at the time of filing his answer, owing to the fact that other dissatisfied customers might return their goods and demand a return of their money, etc.

Defendant has also filed a counterclaim in which he alleges that he was the agent of plaintiff to sell certain plumbing fixtures, and that he did make certain sales, and earned commissions in the sum of $359.37, and that he expended $35 as freight on the goods, and other incidental expenses, amounting in the aggregate to $411.87, and prays judgment in his favor for $411.87.

Upon the issues thus joined the case was tried by the court without a jury, and the court found that all of the allegations of count 1 of plaintiff's complaint were true, and further found as follows:

Finding 2. "That on February 20, 1924, defendant became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,545.60 on account of goods, wares, and merchandise, consisting of plumbing supplies, sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant at the latter's instance and request; that said sum of $1,545.60 became due and payable from defendant to plaintiff on February 20, 1924; that neither the whole nor any part of said sum, nor any interest thereon, has ever been paid."

Finding 3. "That it is not true that plaintiff ever employed or appointed defendant as plaintiff's agent to sell said plumbing supplies or that defendant ever acted, or was ever authorized to act, as such agent; that plaintiff never promised or agreed to pay defendant anything for any services by defendant in connection with the sale of said plumbing supplies, nor to reimburse defendant for any expenditures made by defendant in connection with said plumbing supplies; that no commission or other compensation is due from plaintiff to defendant for selling said plumbing supplies; that nothing is due from plaintiff to defendant on account of any expenditures made by defendant in connection with said plumbing supplies."

Judgment for plaintiff for $1,545.60 followed these findings.

The only contention made by appellant which is supported by argument or citation of authority is (1) that the evidence was and is insufficient to justify the decision of the court.

It is the contention of plaintiff, and testified to by him at the trial, that he sold and delivered certain plumbing supplies to defendant at a fixed and understood price, to wit, $21 per set net to him, which was agreed to be paid to plaintiff by defendant as and when the defendant resold the goods to his customers. Plaintiff only seeks to recover at the rate of $21 per set for the plumbing supplies that defendant admits he sold. Defendant, on the other hand, contends that he did not purchase the goods from plaintiff, but merely acted as plaintiff's agent in the resale of them, and claims he is entitled to deduct certain expenses incurred by him in the resale of the goods, and also a commission on the sales made by him.

It is admitted by appellant that the evidence is conflicting. Appellant also admits that he accepted the goods in question from plaintiff and resold them to his own customers at his own price, upon his own terms, and after adding certain of his own equipment thereto. In other words, the facts testified to by plaintiff are substantially the same as found by the court in its findings, and the testimony of defendant in substantially the same as set forth in his amended answer and counterclaim. There were other witnesses who testified on both sides, and there were some inconsistencies and discrepancies in the testimony of both plaintiff and defendant, but the testimony, on the whole, was conflicting upon the disputed issues in the case. The court, however, as indicated by the findings, accepted the testimony of plaintiff and his witnesses as being a correct statement of the transaction, and resolved the conflict in the evidence in favor of the plaintiff, and, as there is abundant evidence in the record to support the findings of the trial court on the disputed issues, it is conclusive on this appeal.

The appellant also makes a number of assignments of error on the part of the trial court, but none of them are supported by argument or citation of authority. However, we have examined the record very carefully, and we find no merit whatever in any of the contentions of appellant. It is simply a case where the evidence is conflicting, and the trial court resolved the conflicts in favor of plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

RODETSKY v. NERNEY. (Civ. 5115.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 8, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 6, 1925.)

1. Breach of marriage promise ⟸22 — Evidence of character of defendant held inadmissible.

Where, in action for breach of promise to marry, with seduction alleged in aggravation of damages, character of defendant was not put in issue by complaint, evidence thereof was not admissible.

2. Appeal and error ⟸989—Courts of Appeal cannot weigh testimony or determine credibility of witnesses.

It is not within province of Courts of Appeal, nor can they from the record weigh testimony or determine credibility of witnesses from all facts that appear to jury, but they are required to do so to extent possible therefrom.

3. Appeal and error ⟸1026—Before appellate court may reverse judgment, error complained of must have resulted in miscarriage of justice.

Before a court of review may reverse trial court's judgment, it must be of opinion that error complained of has resulted in miscarriage of justice, and such result must fairly and reasonably appear from whole record, or appellate court's conclusion must be an affirmative one.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1170(7)—Error in admission of evidence as to character held not to result in miscarriage of justice.

In suit for breach of promise of marriage, in view of doubtful testimony of plaintiff and her witnesses, and uncontroverted testimony of defendant, error in admission of evidence of defendant's character held not prejudicial to degree which would lead court of review to opinion that it resulted in miscarriage of justice, within Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Cecelia Rodetsky against T. A. Nerney. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. F. Herron, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ralph Starke, of San Francisco, and Carl E. Lindsay, of Fresno, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. Appeal by Cecelia Rodetsky from a judgment of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, made and entered in favor of T. A. Nerney, respondent herein. The action was for damages for breach of promise to marry, with seduction alleged in aggravation of the damages. The case was tried before a jury. The verdict was for respondent. A motion by appellant for a new trial was denied, and she appeals from the judgment.

The appellant complains of certain rulings of the trial court in permitting respondent, over objections duly made, to introduce evidence tending to show that respondent's reputation—his character not having been attacked—for chastity and morality was good. This is the only point made by appellant as ground for reversal.

Decisions directly in point are few, and these from jurisdictions other than California. That the general rule is against the admissibility of such evidence unless the issue involves the character of the party is well settled. Vance v. Richardson, 110 Cal. 414, 42 P. 909; Title Insurance Co. v. Ingersoll, 153 Cal. 1, 94 P. 94; Greenl. on Evidence, § 54; Wigmore on Evidence, § 64. As stated by Mr. Wigmore in the section of his work cited, it is possible to maintain that the reasons of policy for the exclusion of such evidence should be yielded to in ordinary civil cases only; and that where a moral intent is marked and prominent in the nature of the issue the defendant's good moral character should be received as in criminal cases. And to the same effect is the decision in Hein v. Holdridge, 78 Minn. 468, 81 N. W. 522, quoted by Mr. Wigmore and cited by the respondent in this case. The opinion in the case last cited states persuasive reasons for the rule contended for by respondent here; and it might seem that such evidence, under the provisions of section 2053, Code of Civil Procedure, would be admissible on the ground that the issue involves the character of respondent, had not the court, in the case of Van Horn v. Van Horn, 5 Cal. App. 719, 91 P. 260, discussed and applied the rule to facts so closely analogous in their nature to the instant case and decided in principle against the views of counsel for respondent. That action was one for divorce, charging defendant with adultery. Judgment was entered for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. Among the assigned errors urged as a ground for reversal was the refusal of the trial court to permit defendant to introduce evidence of her good moral character. On appeal the court held that by the allegation of adultery appellant's character was not put in issue, and that evidence concerning it under section 2053, Code of Civil Procedure, was properly excluded. A rehearing therein was denied both by the District Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court.

We are unable to perceive a distinction in principle between a charge of adultery in a civil case, which was held not to involve the character of a party, and a charge of seduction, which is contended here to have that effect. Both involve similar acts, and are reflected in reputation at least in an equal degree; but if the charge of adultery in a civil action does not involve character in the sense the word is used in section 2053, it cannot reasonably be said that the charge of seduction in such an action has that effect.

[1] It is our conclusion that the character of respondent was not put in issue by the allegations of the complaint, and that evidence thereof was not admissible in the case at bar.

[2] It is contended by respondent that, assuming the admitted evidence to have been improper, it but supported the presumption that respondent's conduct was in accordance with the rules of morality (Glos v. McBride, 47 Cal. App. 688, 690, 191 P. 67; White v. White, 82 Cal. 427, 433, 23 P. 276, 7 L. R. A. 799), and was, therefore, not prejudicial to a degree which, in view of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, would warrant a reversal.

[3] It is not within our province, nor can we from the record weigh the testimony or determine the credibility of witnesses from all the facts that appear to the jury, many of which, due to their nature, cannot be recorded; but we are required to do so to the extent possible therefrom. Hirshfield v. Dana, 193 Cal. 142, 223 P. 451; People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 P. 1042. Before an appellate court may reverse the judgment of a trial court it must be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Such may not be assumed, but the result must fairly and reasonably appear from the whole record. For us to say that we cannot determine therefrom that the error complained of did not have that result is not sufficient. Our conclusion in the premises must be an affirmative one. People v. Chapman, 55 Cal. App. 192, 201, 203 P. 126; People v. Mazzurco, 49 Cal. App. 275, 280, 193 P. 164; Const. art. 6, § 4½; People v. O'Bryan, supra; People v. Roe, 189 Cal. 548, 561, 209 P. 560.

[4] An examination of the evidence shows that appellant and respondent were respectively of the ages of 35 and 62 years. Appellant, a widow, was engaged in the business of dressmaking, and is the mother of two boys, one of whom, aged 15 years, was a witness in the case. Respondent is a traveling salesman. The parties became acquainted in the month of October, 1921, in the course of certain negotiations for the leasing by appellant of a house owned by respondent. The proposed arrangement was not consummated, but thereafter, following a casual meeting on the street, respondent called on several occasions at the home of appellant, and they from time to time visited various public places together. According to the testimony of appellant, the marriage proposal was made at her home by respondent on a certain day in the forenoon during the absence at school of both her children; that she hesitated to accept, stating to respondent that she had known him "just for a couple of days"; that on this occasion the first act of intercourse took place. Appellant's testimony as to the date of this meeting was contradictory. It might be inferred therefrom as being a few days or several weeks after their first meeting. Nor is it clear from her testimony whether the alleged promise of marriage was made before or after the first act of intercourse. She further testified that, due to the act mentioned and further acts of the same nature, she became pregnant. There was no corroboration of her testimony in these respects other than the testimony of her son, Theodore Rodetsky, that respondent visited appellant from time to time, and on one occasion at the hour of noon. This witness testified that respondent visited appellant during the evening of the last-mentioned day, and that at that time the witness from an adjoining room while looking through the keyhole of the door saw the parties seated on a sofa and heard respondent ask appellant to marry him, and that appellant then and there agreed. Appellant further testified that the first act of intercourse, whatever the date, was during the daytime and in the absence of her children, and that the proposal accepted by her was also made in the daytime and during such absence. That such proposal should have been renewed and again accepted at any time thereafter seems improbable, and, in the minds of the jury, might tend to throw doubt on the truth of the testimony of the son, and might, together with the method used to gain information as to the facts testified to, lead to the conclusion that his testimony was not entitled to full weight and credit.

Respondent denied the alleged offer of marriage and the acts of intercourse; admitted his acquaintance with appellant and various visits to her home and with her to places of amusement, and further testified that on his last visit to her house during the month of November, 1921, in response to a call from her by telephone, appellant requested of respondent—whether as a loan or a gift the record does not show—the sum of $500, stating to respondent, "You are a big man and got a lot of money," and, "You come to see me, and I could make you much trouble"; that thereupon respondent departed and their relations ceased. The testimony of respondent as to the conversation on the last day mentioned was not denied by appellant.

From the nature of the testimony of appellant and her son, and from the uncontroverted testimony of the respondent last set forth, it is our opinion that a jury might fairly and reasonably have concluded that the allegations of the complaint were untrue; and it is our conclusion that, conceding that the admission of the evidence of character was error, such error was not, in view of the evidence as a whole, prejudicial to a degree which would justify, nor does it lead us to the opinion that it resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

PEOPLE v. CHESNEY. (Cr. 1215.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 9, 1925.)

1. Forgery ⟸44(½)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

Evidence held to sustain conviction of forgery.

2. Criminal law ⟸1159(3)—That testimony of handwriting experts conflicting in forgery prosecution does not require reversal, but makes jury question.

Fact that handwriting experts, in prosecution for forgery, did not agree, is not ground for reversal, but makes it a question for jury, whose finding will not be disturbed.

3. Criminal law ⟸1186(4)—Appellate court not required to sit as jury, subject to all presumptions that govern jury in first instance.

Const. art. 6, § 4½, does not require an appellate court to sit as jury and be subject to all presumptions that govern jury in first instance.

4. Criminal law ⟸1159(2, 4)—Questions of fact, credibility of witnesses, and weight of their testimony for jury, whose finding not reversed because testimony inconsistent.

Questions of fact, credibility of witnesses, weight to be given their testimony, and guilt or innocence of person on trial, are exclusively for jury, and, when so determined, a reversal is not authorized because testimony inconsistent or susceptible of two reasonable inferences.

5. Criminal law ⟸770(2)—Court must instruct as to law pertaining to each class of facts on which evidence adduced.

The trial court is required to instruct as to law pertaining to each class of facts as to which evidence has been adduced.

6. Criminal law ⟸829(4)—Refusal of instruction covered by court's given instruction held not error, though requested instructions stated correct principle of law.

In prosecution for forgery, defendant advancing theory that check was issued either by purported maker, or by purported payee, held that, where court instructed jury that, under theory advanced by defendant, a verdict of acquittal must be returned, it was not error to refuse to give further instructions on same matter, though containing correct statement of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Robert B. Chesney was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Affirmed.

H. K. Sargent, Wm. M. Morse, Jr., and Harold Ide Cruzan, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. It was charged, by information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county, that appellant forged the name of one Robert Urban to a check for the sum of $700, and that he made the same payable to J. S. Young, indorsed the latter name thereon, and uttered, published, and passed said check with intent to defraud the said Robert Urban and the Security Trust & Savings Bank. A jury found appellant guilty as charged, and he appeals from an order denying his motion for new trial, and from the judgment, alleging insufficiency of evidence, and errors in giving and in refusing to give certain instructions.

[1] It appears that the appellant and said Urban had previously been friends, but that they had not recently met for some time, until shortly before the offense was alleged to have been committed. In March, 1924, Urban testified he received his bank statement and canceled checks, and upon examination of them discovered the check here in controversy, which he immediately returned to the bank with a protest. He further testified that, he did not know Young, had had no dealings with him, and did not sign or issue said check or know of its existence until it came to his attention in the manner stated. When appellant was questioned about the matter, he claimed to have received the check from J. S. Young, with instructions to reopen the latter's account, and produced at the trial a purported power of attorney from Young, reading:

"To whom it may concern: I, J. S. Young, do hereby give power of attorney to R. B. McChesney to sign for me any papers pertaining to business during my absence. J. S. Young."

He admitted having opened an account in the name of Young with the check in question, and having checked out moneys on several occasions from said account, but contended that he had authority to do so, and that Young had given him the power of attorney at the Stowell Hotel in Los Angeles. Appellant told the police, when arrested, that the J. S. Young from whom he had received the check resided at 1238 West Fifty-First street, Los Angeles, and was a railroad and construction engineer and contractor. Bank officers testified that appellant, when opening the account, stated to them that he was the J. S. Young therein named, that he was born in Iowa, was an engineer, at the time was in the army at Manila, or in the Philippine islands, and gave 1238 West Fifty-First street as his address.

Maude L. Young, a witness for the people, testified that she was the wife of J. S. Young, and that in February, 1924, when said account was opened, she was residing with her husband at said address, 1238 West Fifty-First street; that she had previously met appellant, and knew his wife, but that appellant was theretofore known to her as Robert McChesney; that her husband was born at Asheville, N. C., and was engaged in railroad construction work, but was not an engineer, and had never been in the army. She further testified that she was very familiar with his handwriting, and that neither the signature on the check nor on the power of attorney offered by appellant was that of her husband.

Testimony given by appellant upon a former trial of the same case was introduced, from which it appeared that he then swore that he had told the bank teller that Young was born in Ireland, that he did not sign the identification card at the bank, but that he saw Young sign it, and that he did not know Young's mother, or her maiden name. Employees of the bank testified in the record before us that appellant signed the card, and drew the money from the account, and that he then stated that O'Connell was the maiden name of Young's mother. Handwriting experts compared exemplars, and testified positively that none of the writing at the bank or on the so-called power of attorney had been done by Young, but that all, including that admittedly of appellant, was beyond peradventure of a doubt the writing of one and the same person. The jury had all of these facts before them.

The brief for appellant consists largely of a repetition of the evidence presented by the transcript. Much of the argument contained in the few remaining pages is devoted to the presentation of questions of fact, to which but slight reference is here necessary.

It is first said that the signed statement of appellant, introduced at the trial, was a declaration of innocence, whereas a confession is restricted to admissions of guilt. Counsel for appellant stipulated to its introduction, and objection to its competency is not made at this time, but it is argued that, "in the whole record, there is no evidence connecting the defendant with the crime charged save and except his own statements, and these statements in every connection contain the assertion of innocence." Granting, for the sake of the argument, that appellant at all times asserted his innocence, it is obvious from the record before us that his connection with the transaction was amply established in various ways, and that his frequent assertions did not agree with each other, nor with the facts as detailed by other witnesses. This alone, not only created a conflict of evidence, but a serious question as to the innocence of the defendant. People v. Keyes, 178 Cal. 794, 175 P. 6. We have carefully reviewed the evidence in this case, and, from the brief statement herein, which by no means embraces all of the facts tending to establish the guilt of the appellant, it readily appears therefrom that the evidence, if believed by the jury, would justify a conviction; and the many conflicting statements made by appellant in his various "assertions of innocence" render it only the more imperative that an appellate court should not disturb the finding.

[2] It it next asserted that the testimony of certain handwriting experts was unworthy of belief, but the fact that different members of that profession testified on each side in the case at bar, and did not agree, is not a ground for reversal, but rather brings such question within the rule above stated.

[3, 4] Appellant tells us that it is the duty of this court to determine the facts as well as the law, and it is suggested that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution requires an appellate court to "sit as a jury and be subject to all the presumptions that govern the jury in the first instance." We cannot agree with this interpretation of that constitutional provision. Questions of fact, including the credibility of witnesses, the weight to be given to their testimony, and the guilt or innocence of a person on trial before a jury, are exclusively for the jury to decide, and, when so determined, a reversal is not authorized because of inconsistencies or disparities in the testimony, or because the testimony is susceptible of two reasonable inferences—one looking to the guilt of the defendant, and the other to his innocence; and the mere fact that there is a conflict in the evidence does not give rise to a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt. People v. Billings, 34 Cal. App. 549, 168 P. 396; People v. Slaughter, 33 Cal. App. 365, 382, 165 P. 44; People v. Keyes, 178 Cal. 794, 175 P. 6; People v. Loomis, 170 Cal. 347, 149 P. 581.

As we have shown, appellant's contention upon the trial was that he indorsed the check for $700, made the deposit, and checked out funds therefrom, under authority of a power of attorney which he claimed to have been executed by J. S. Young. He now assigns as error the refusal of the trial court to give a requested instruction to the jury that they should not consider evidence tending to show that the defendant may have committed other offenses than that for which he was on trial, and that, notwithstanding what they might believe with reference to similar offenses by other persons, the defendant was the only person on trial, was charged with but one specific offense, and, unless proven guilty thereof beyond a reasonable doubt, must be acquitted. The grounds assigned for this point are that the defendant was entitled to have the jury charged upon his theory of the case. It is said that two theories were advanced for the defense: First, that the check was issued by Urban; and, second that it was issued by Young.

[5, 6] The rule invoked by appellant is the law to this extent: That the trial court is required to instruct as to the law pertaining to each class of facts as to which evidence has been adduced. People v. Buelna, 81 Cal. 135, 22 P. 396; People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 50 P. 405. Upon the theory of the defense that Urban signed the check, there is nothing in the instruction requested which could possibly apply thereto. Besides, the court gave another instruction to the effect that, if the jury should find that the signature "Robert Urban," on the check described in the information, was the genuine signature of Robert Urban, they should acquit the defendant.

The other theory which appellant claims was presented is that the check may have been signed by Young. An examination of the entire record fails to disclose any evidence that Young affixed the signature of Robert Urban to the check. The only evidence from which such an inference could possibly be drawn is that Urban's testimony and that of others negatives the idea that Urban signed the check, and the defendant denied having signed it, and stated that it was handed to him by Young. It may be that under these circumstances the jury might, if they believed this testimony, have concluded that, inasmuch as the check had apparently been in Young's possession, there was a probability that he affixed the signature in question. Under this theory the defendant would be innocent, because his participation in the transaction in which Urban was defrauded was without criminal intent and through the inducement of Young. If this defense were accepted, it would follow that the power of attorney purporting to have been executed by Young was genuine. At the request of the defendant, the court gave the following instruction:

"You are further instructed that, if you find from the evidence that the defendant in this case, charged with this offense, was innocently drawn into the alleged transaction under such circumstances that he honestly believed that he had the right to do the things which he did then do, then that would show an absence of intent to commit the crime charged, and, if you find that there is any reasonable doubt as to whether there was an intent on the part of the defendant to defraud by the commission of a forgery, then you must acquit the defendant."

This instruction applies to the only hypothesis upon which the defendant could be held innocent, except the theory that the check bore the genuine signature of Urban. Having thus informed the jury that under either theory advanced by the defendant a verdict of acquittal must be returned, it was not error to refuse to give the further instruction, of which refusal complaint is made, even though it contained a correct statement of the law.

The further assignments of appellant relate to elementary questions of law, presented by instructions universally given, and which have been passed upon repeatedly. The citation of authority supporting the action of the trial court in these respects is unnecessary.

No error appearing, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SEAWRIGHT et al. (Cr. 1184.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 24, 1925. Rehearing Denied May 23, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 22, 1925. Opinion Modified July 10, 1925.)

1. Robbery ⊂⊃24(1)—Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction.

In prosecution for robbery, evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction.

2. Robbery ⊂⊃26—Conflict of evidence as to question of defendant's identity held for jury.

In robbery prosecution, conflict of evidence as to question of defendant's identity held for jury.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃1159(3)—Jury's conclusion on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

Jury's conclusion on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

4. Robbery ⊂⊃26—Whether defendant held up victim with pistol, while his companion accosted other victim, held for jury.

In robbery prosecution, whether defendant held up victim with pistol or revolver, while his companion accosted other victim, held for jury.

5. Robbery ⊂⊃11—Statute defining robbery in first degree construed.

Pen. Code, § 211a, defining robbery in first degree as that which is perpetrated with a dangerous or deadly weapon, in view of section 245, does not require proof to constitute offense that there was an actual assault upon the person with a deadly weapon, but that accused was armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon.

[Ed. Note—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Robbery.]

6. Robbery ⊂⊃24(1)—Evidence held to justify inference that guns used in robbery were loaded, and that defendants intended to discharge them if their commands were not obeyed.

In robbery prosecution, evidence held sufficient to justify inference that guns used were loaded, and that defendants intended to discharge them, for purpose of committing bodily injury, if their commands were not obeyed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Ben Marvin Seawright and Carl John Eberle were convicted of robbery, and they appeal. Reversed as to first named defendant, and affirmed as to second named defendant.

Lyle Pendegast, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. Appellants and one Kent were charged with the crime of robbery, a felony. Three separate verdicts were returned by a jury, convicting each defendant of robbery in the first degree. Seawright and Eberle appeal from orders denying their motions for new trial, and from the judgments based upon said verdicts.

The three defendants were tried jointly, and each one testified upon the trial. A written confession of the defendant Kent was introduced in evidence, but the jury were instructed to regard it only as against him, and that nothing therein contained should be considered as evidence against these appellants. The latter appeal upon the ground of alleged insufficiency of evidence to sustain a conviction of robbery in the first degree, as defined by section 211a of the Penal Code. Robbery, as denounced by the statute, is defined and classified as follows:

"Sec. 211. Robbery is the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear."

"Sec. 211a. All robbery which is perpetrated by torture or by a person being armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon is robbery in the first degree. All other kinds of robbery are of the second degree."

It is contended by appellants that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that they committed the offense charged, that, if committed by them, they used the firearms which were introduced in evidence, or that, if appellants were believed by the jury to have committed the robbery with firearms, the guns were loaded at the time of the holdup.

The principal facts presented to the jury were as follows: On July 4, 1924, at about 11:30 p. m., one Myron G. Stevens and a Miss Beyerle were seated in a coupé parked near the curb at the Pasadena Hospital, in Los Angeles county, where the latter was employed. Two men, later identified as defendants Eberle and Kent, approached the car, pointed guns at the occupants, and ordered them to get out, which they did. Eberle started to search Miss Beyerle, but when assured by her that she had nothing he desisted. Kent searched Stevens' pockets and took from him a watch, wallet and money, a bankbook, some keys, and certain papers. Witness Enders testified that as he drove through Fair View avenue he saw a Ford standing with lights out, just south of the front door of the hospital, and that it was occupied by one man, who was wearing a straw hat; that two other straw hats had been placed up in the back of the machine so that they were visible through the small window, from the rear. The witness made several tours around the block and on one of these occasions saw two men in the shadows of some trees near said hospital, one of whom wore a cap. He notified the Pasadena police department of the occurrence, and upon his return to the scene the Ford was moving away in a southerly direction. At about 12:15 or 12:30 a. m. a Ford car was stopped at North Broadway bridge in a direct route southerly from Pasadena, by Officers Dunn and Hackett, and the occupants thereof, who proved to be the defendants Eberle, Kent, and Seawright, were there arrested and the automobile was searched. At the time of such arrest all three men were wearing straw hats, and in their machine were found two caps, an automatic pistol and a revolver, both of which were loaded, and the property which had about an hour previously been taken from Stevens.

After the arrest, the defendant Kent signed a statement involving all three, but, this having occurred in the absence of the defendants Eberle and Seawright, it was excluded as to them. Seawright was asked where one of the guns came from, but did not reply. The caps found in the machine were tried on the defendants, and were found to be of the same sizes as the straw hats. When arrested, defendant Kent was driving the Ford, Eberle sat on the other side, and Seawright sat between them. Upon the trial, Kent and Eberle were positively identified by Stevens and his companion as the men who committed the robbery, and it was shown that they wore caps at the time.

The appellants denied participation in the robbery, and testified that they had never been in Pasadena; that they had immediately preceding their arrest left Lincoln Park, where they had spent several hours.

[1] The most that a thorough review of the record warrants with respect to appellant Seawright is, we think, that he was apprehended under circumstances which created a strong suspicion of his complicity in the offense. Enders did not see more than that some person occupied the Ford near the Pasadena Hospital, and of course did not pretend to identify him at the time of the trial. The officers arrested him when riding with the other two men, in an automobile which contained the stolen property. He wore a straw hat, as did the occupant of the car in Pasadena, but this fact alone would bear but slight significance. It is not shown that he knew anything about the stolen articles. He testified that he and his codefendants drove from Los Angeles around through Glendale, Hollywood, and Burbank, and thence to Lincoln Park, where they arrived at about 10 o'clock p. m., and remained there for a period of about two hours. It is apparent from the evidence before us that the other two defendants were in Pasadena at the time of the robbery, and that the jury disregarded this story of Seawright, but he denied having any knowledge of the loot being found in the car, or that the two caps were taken therefrom. The only evidence tending to connect Seawright with the robbery, therefore, is the testimony of the two officers that they found him in the company of Eberle and Kent, and the fact that he related an improbable story while on the stand. We do not think this was sufficient evidence to support the finding of the jury, and as to Seawright the judgment must therefore be reversed.

[2, 3] Appellant Eberle likewise denied any knowledge of the transaction, and testified that he had not been in Pasadena, but he was positively identified by Miss Beyerle, and there can be but small doubt that he changed hats before the arrest, which may well have led the jury to believe that he had not been at the park, as he claimed, and that he entertained a consciousness of guilt. As was said in a recent case:

> "The defendant's story is plausible, but the jury had the advantage of the presence of the defendant and evidently came to the conclusion that the recital of what took place lacked the essential element of truth." People v. De Verre (Cal. App.) 230 P. 197.

A conflict of evidence as to the identity of one on trial accused of having committed an offense presents a question wholly within the province of the jury, and their conclusion will not be disturbed upon appeal. People v. Connelly (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 374.

[4] The same ruling must also necessarily apply to the finding of the jury, as implied by its verdict, that appellant Eberle held up Miss Beyerle with a pistol or revolver, while his companion accosted Stevens, since the young woman testified that he used a "gun," but that she did not know its character or whether or not it was loaded.

We shall now proceed to consider the contention of appellants that, since there was no direct evidence that the firearms were loaded at the time of the robbery, the judgment should be reversed upon the ground that it was not shown that the offense was committed with a dangerous or deadly weapon.

[5, 6] Appellants cite People v. Sylva, 143 Cal. 62, 76 P. 814, which involved a charge of assault with a deadly weapon. The Supreme Court said that "the verdict shows that the jury did not believe that the gun was loaded." No such situation exists here. Section 245 of the Penal Code defines assault with a deadly weapon to be an actual assault upon the person of another with a deadly weapon or instrument, or by any means or force likely to produce great bodily injury; but robbery of the first degree, as we have indicated, consists of the felonious taking of personal property from another by means of force or fear, by a person who is armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon. There is no claim that the victims in the case at bar were not put in fear when robbed, nor is there any evidence that the weapons were not loaded at that time. Section 211a of the Penal Code does not require proof that there was an actual assault upon the person with a deadly weapon, but that the accused was armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon. An unloaded revolver has repeatedly been held to be a dangerous weapon, according to the manner in which it may be used, when in the hands of one intent upon committing crime, if capable of producing great bodily injury, and considering the proximity of the person in control to the intended victim. State v. Godfrey, 17 Or. 300, 20 P. 625, 11 Am. St. Rep. 830; State v. Hammond, 14 S. D. 545, 86 N. W. 627. In State v. Lynch, 88 Me. 195, 33 A. 978, it was said that "deadly" and "dangerous" are not equivalents; that a dangerous weapon may possibly not be deadly, but that a deadly weapon, one which is capable of causing death, must be dangerous; and in all of these cases the question of the dangerous or deadly character of the weapon was said to be one for the jury to decide.

But the jury might reasonably have believed that the guns were loaded. Appellants were arrested within an hour after the hold-up, and the officers testified that both guns were then loaded. Since the jury apparently believed that appellants committed the robbery near the Pasadena Hospital, not alone merely armed with guns, but actually by the use thereof, it was within their province also to conclude that the defendants would not perpetrate the crime with unloaded weapons, and reload them during the hour before starting upon a peaceful drive. We think all of the circumstances, including the conduct of the robbers at the time, would have amply justified the jury in finding that the guns were loaded when Stevens was compelled to give up his property.

People v. Montgomery, 15 Cal. App. 315, 114 P. 792, involved a charge of assault with a deadly weapon. Montgomery leveled a rifle at one Freeholdt, who ran behind a post and called for help; the accused was thereafter led away and finally went home. The rifle was found to be loaded when officers arrived, but there was no evidence tending to show that it was loaded at the time of the assault, and Montgomery testified that it was not then loaded, yet the jury found him guilty as charged, and its decision was upheld on appeal.

We think that in the instant case there was sufficient evidence of appellants having so conducted themselves as to justify the jury in drawing the inference that the guns were loaded and that appellants intended to discharge them, if their commands to "put them up" were not obeyed, for the purpose of committing bodily injury.

The judgment and order as to appellant Eberle are affirmed, and those of appellant Seawright are reversed.

I concur: WORKS, J.

FINLAYSON, P. J. I concur. The serious question in the case is whether either of the robbers was armed, at the time of the robbery, with a dangerous or deadly weapon. There is no direct evidence that either of the pistols which the robbers pointed at the complaining witness and his companion was loaded; i. e., no one testified that he saw some person load either weapon or that he saw cartridges in either pistol. Wherefore appellants earnestly insist that there is no evidence to support a verdict of robbery in the first degree as defined in section 211a of the Penal Code.

An empty revolver merely pointed at a person, and not used to strike him with, is neither a dangerous nor a deadly weapon, however much the person at whom it is pointed may be put in fear. A loaded revolver pointed at a person within shooting distance is a dangerous weapon as a matter of law. Though there is some conflict in the cases, the rule which in my opinion is supported by reason and by the weight of authority is this: The prosecution makes out a prima facie case from which the jury may infer that the gun or pistol was loaded, and that consequently it was a dangerous or deadly weapon, when it is proved that the weapon was pointed at the person assailed, within shooting distance, and that the act was accompanied with a threat, evidenced by words or conduct indicating an intention to fire, the person at whom the weapon was pointed not knowing but that it is loaded. Note to Territory v. Gomez, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 975. In Lipscomb v. State, 130 Wis. 238, 109 N. W. 986, a robbery case, the court says:

"A loaded revolver pointed at a person within shooting distance is a dangerous weapon as matter of law. This does not mean that it was necessary in the present case for the state to introduce proof that some person loaded the revolver or saw the cartridges in it. Under the weight of authority, when the state proves that a gun or revolver was pointed at a person within shooting distance with a threat or other words indicating intention to fire, the person assailed not knowing but that it is loaded, the state has made prima facie proof that the gun or revolver is loaded and consequently a dangerous weapon. * * * The case of Nevada v. Napper, 6 Nev. 113, holding to the contrary, seems to stand practically alone and is disapproved."

In my opinion this rule states the only practical view to be taken in the enforcement of statutes dealing with assaults or robberies, where the weapon used to intimidate the victim is a gun or a pistol.

The evidence in this case, when considered in the light of the above-mentioned rule, is amply sufficient to warrant the inference that the pistols were loaded, and that therefore the robbery was committed with dangerous and deadly weapons.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

John Conson was convicted of escaping from state prison, and he appeals. Affirmed.

N. Charles Brusatori, of San Rafael, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Defendant, upon information, was charged by the district attorney of Marin county with the crime of felony, to wit, escaping from state prison.

He is a prisoner confined at San Quentin, Cal., having entered that institution from Los Angeles county on or about the 15th day of June, 1922, to serve sentences upon two convictions of felony. Thereafter, on July 14, 1924, he was assigned to prison road camp A, located near the town of Requa, in Del Norte county. On the 22d day of July following he was found missing from the camp, and was some nine days thereafter apprehended and returned to San Quentin.

Subsequently, on the 23d day of August, 1924, at a hearing before the board of prison directors he was found guilty of a charge of escaping from prison, and all the credits to which he was entitled under the Penal Code, which he had already earned and which he would thereafter earn, were declared forfeited.

On November 14, 1924, an information was filed in the superior court of Marin county charging defendant with a violation of sections 105 and 106 of the Penal Code relating to escapes from state prison, and it was upon this information that the conviction here appealed from was had.

[1] To this information defendant entered a general plea of not guilty. He also entered the plea of once in jeopardy, claiming that he had already been convicted of the offense charged by the judgment of the state board of prison directors rendered on the 23d day of August, 1924. Defendant was found guilty, and this is an appeal from the judgment of conviction. The main question involved in the appeal is whether or not appellant was once in jeopardy for the offense charged.

[2] The question arises by reason of the rejection by the trial court of certain evidence going to prove the action of the board of prison directors in forfeiting the credits of appellant, and on the instructions of the court as to what constituted former jeopardy, and the refusal to give certain instructions on this subject as requested by appellant. It is a well-settled principle that a plea of once in jeopardy, former acquittal or former conviction, is not good, unless the second prosecution is for the same offense, both in law and fact, as that for which the first prosecution was instituted. People v. Kerrick, 144 Cal. 46, 77 P. 711; 7 Cal. Jur. p. 955. In cases of this character, where there is no dispute as to the facts, and the only question is whether the defendant has been in jeopardy, the question becomes one of law for the court, and not one of fact for the jury. People v. Wilkison, 30 Cal. App. 473, 158 P. 1067.

[3, 4] The ruling of the court upon the subject was correct. Punishment by the prison authorities for a violation of its rules, or for the enforcement of necessary discipline, does not place a defendant in jeopardy within the constitutional sense, and it constitutes no defense whatever to a charge of the character for which defendant was tried. State v. Cahill, 196 Iowa, 486, 194 N. W. 191–194;

People v. Huntley, 112 Mich. 570–577, 71 N. W. 178.

A proceeding, such as was here instituted by the prison board for the purpose of determining whether defendant should forfeit his credits, is one administrative in character, and the board, in the performance of this act, does not exercise judicial functions, nor is it a judicial body. In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 P. 958.

Its proceedings in the matter therefore did not constitute once in jeopardy of the offense charged in the information. Defendant in the instant case was accused by information with the violation of certain provisions of the Penal Code which amount to a felony. In order to be entitled to the plea he invoked, it was incumbent upon him to show that he had previously been placed on trial before a court of competent jurisdiction upon indictment or information for the same offense, namely, escaping from the state prison.

[5] The hearing before the prison board was a mere inquiry by that body under the provisions of the Penal Code for flagrant disregard of the prison rules. The board has no jurisdiction to try any one for a felony, and it is manifest that it made no attempt to do so. The sections of the Penal Code, authorizing the prison board to ameliorate the punishment of prisoners, gives it no authority to impose a penalty other than a forfeiture of credits, and are designed solely for the benefit of prisoners, who by their conduct prove that they are entitled to a reduction of their sentences by reason of their good behavior, and the right given to the board to forfeit the credits is one intended merely for the good government of the prison and to maintain discipline, and its action in forfeiting the credits of one who has attempted to escape does not place such delinquent in jeopardy within the constitutional sense. People v. Huntley, supra.

Equally without merit is the further contention that the state board of prison directors had granted appellant a parole and that his confinement in the road camp was therefore illegal.

In this connection, it appears from the record, that the board in the course of its duty in fixing the term for which prisoners shall be confined uses a printed form. This form was properly filled out, fixing the term for which appellant was to serve. Immediately following is a printed form which may be filled out in the event that the board grants a parole. This portion of the form was not filled out, and it is perfectly apparent that when his term of confinement was fixed no action was taken by the board with reference to a parole.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. EPHRAIM. (Cr. 1262.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 30, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⇐1148—Refusal of application for bail pending appeal from conviction of embezzlement, not disturbed, unless discretion abused.

After conviction for embezzlement, refusal of application for bail pending appeal will not be interfered with, except for abuse of trial court's discretion granted by Pen. Code, § 1272, in cases involving imprisonment for felony, notwithstanding certificate of probable cause had been issued.

2. Bail ⇐44—Refused by appellate court, after conviction, pending appeal, except in extraordinary cases.

Appellate court ought not to admit to bail after conviction of felony and pending appeal, except where circumstances of extraordinary character have intervened since conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

W. K. Ephraim was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. On application for admission to bail. Application denied.

TYLER, P. J. Application for an order admitting defendant to bail pending appeal. Petitioner was informed against by the district attorney of Alameda county with the crime of felony, to wit, embezzlement. He was tried and found guilty.

[1] Thereafter, on March 7, 1925, an appeal was duly taken from such conviction, and on March 9, following, the superior court made and filed its certificate of probable cause. Thereafter application was made to the superior court for an order of bail pending the appeal. The petition alleges that the court denied the application upon the sole ground that it was not the practice of said court to allow bail in cases where the matter was one of discretion with the court.

Assuming that the motion was properly presented to the lower court, the denial thereof was in effect an exercise of this discretion. Section 1272 of the Penal Code declares when a defendant, after conviction and pending appeal, may be admitted to bail. That section provides that bail may be allowed: (1) As a matter of right, when the appeal is from a judgment imposing a fine only; (2) as a matter of right, when the appeal is from a judgment imposing imprisonment in cases of misdemeanor; (3) as a matter of discretion in all other cases.

[2] The defendant having been convicted of a felony, the application was one within the sound discretion of the court, and there is nothing in the record before us to show that the discretion vested in the court was in any manner abused, or arbitrarily exercised. The mere issuance of a certificate of probable cause is not alone sufficient grounds for admission to bail, pending the appeal, as such certificate has become such a matter of common occurrence that the appellate court would not be warranted in considering it either as evidence of illegal conviction or of the existence of reversible errors. People v. Cornell, 28 Cal. App. 654, 153 P. 726. It is a settled rule in this state that the appellate court ought not to admit to bail after a conviction of a felony and pending appeal, except where circumstances of an extraordinary character have intervened since the conviction. Ex parte Turner, 112 Cal. 627, 45 P. 571. No such circumstances here appear.

Moreover, applications of this character are, as above indicated, addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its determination should not be disturbed or ignored except in an instance of manifest abuse, and no such abuse here appears. Ex parte Preciado, 30 Cal. App. 323, 158 P. 1063.

The application is denied.

Ex parte Ephraim. (Cr. 1276.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 2, 1925.)

Application for Writ of Habeas Corpus prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of Alameda County to secure release of petitioner on bail. Writ denied.

T. T. Califro and Julian H. Biddle, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

TYLER, P. J. The applicant herein heretofore on April 23, 1925, filed in this court an appeal from an order denying him bail after conviction of a felony. People v. Ephraim, 237 P. 801.

It appeared therein that the superior court had made and filed a certificate of probable cause, but denied the application for bail pending appeal upon the sole ground, so it was alleged, that it was not the practice of the court to allow bail in cases where the matter was one of discretion with it. In the opinion rendered by this court it was held that the denial of the motion was in effect an exercise of this discretion. It was there pointed out that section 1272 of the Penal Code declares when a defendant, after conviction and pending an appeal, may be admitted to bail, and that the appellate court ought not to interfere after a conviction of a felony and pending appeal, except where circumstances of an extraordinary character have intervened since the conviction.

The present application presents no such circumstances, and it is therefore denied.

2. Rape ⟸54(1)—Conviction may be had on prosecutrix's uncorroborated testimony.

One may be convicted of rape on prosecutrix's uncorroborated testimony, if believed by jury.

3. Robbery ⟸24(1)—Conviction held not sustained by evidence.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction of robbery under Pen. Code, § 211, as not showing taking of property from person or immediate presence of prosecuting witness.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Elmer Sylvis was convicted of rape and robbery, and appeals. Conviction of rape affirmed, and that of robbery reversed.

Charles R. Morfoot, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The defendant in this case was charged, by information No. 23725, with the crime of assault with intent to commit rape in count 1, and, in count 2, with the crime of robbery. He was also charged, in information No 23751 with the crime of rape. Both informations, having been issued by the district attorney of Los Angeles county, were consolidated, and the defendant tried upon all of the charges at the same time.

The jury found the defendant guilty of rape, as charged in information No. 23751, and also guilty of robbery as charged in count 2 of information No. 23725, and not guilty as to the charge of assault with intent to commit rape, as set forth in count 1 of information No. 23725.

Defendant prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of the court and from the order denying his motion for a new trial on the two counts upon which he was found guilty.

[1] It is urged, on defendant's behalf, that the evidence was not sufficient to support the verdict finding the defendant guilty of the crime of rape, as charged in information No. 23751.

From the testimony of the prosecutrix, Lulu Fuller, it appears that she, a woman of about 40 years of age, on her way to attend a moving picture theater, was waiting for a street car on Whittier boulevard at about 7:30 o'clock on the evening of October 2, 1924. The defendant, driving a Chevrolet touring car, stopped and invited her to ride; he indicating that he was driving in the direction of the theater where she desired to go. The prosecutrix accepted the invitation, and, after riding several blocks with the defendant, he turned his automobile in a direction different from that which would have taken her to the point she desired. She at once protested to the defendant that she did not desire to ride further and, opening the door of the car, attempted to alight. The defendant restrained her by taking hold of her and putting his arms about her and one of his hands over her mouth to prevent her from calling for help. She testified that she was very much frightened, and that she fought the defendant as vigorously as her strength permitted her to do, until she was entirely overcome. The defendant then drove his car out near a cemetery, where he stopped the car, and by physical force dragged and carried her from the front to the rear seat of the car, and there accomplished the act of sexual intercourse. Thereupon the defendant drove back to the main highway and let the prosecutrix out of the car. The prosecutrix was in a nervous and dazed condition, but finally wended her way to a moving picture theater, and a few minutes after entering, noticing a friend of hers, one Mrs. Brinegar, she went over to the friend and related to her the incident of the attack by the defendant.

Mrs. Brinegar, testifying on behalf of the people, stated that about 8:30 o'clock on the evening of October 2d, while sitting in a moving picture theater on Whittier boulevard, she saw Mrs. Fuller, the prosecutrix, enter; that a few minutes later Mrs. Fuller came to the witness, and, taking a seat alongside of her, related the circumstances of the attack; that the prosecutrix at that time was trembling and crying, and her clothes were dusty on one side; that the witness suggested that she take Mrs. Fuller to her home, but Mrs. Fuller protested that she wished to go to her own home, which she subsequently did.

It appears from the evidence that the prosecutrix, upon arriving home that evening, did not relate the incident of the attack to her husband, giving as a reason for her silence the fact that her husband was not well, and that for some time it had been necessary for the members of the family to withhold from him any circumstances that would tend to cause him worry. It does appear that the prosecutrix, upon the first opportunity, related the circumstances of the attack to her daughter.

The prosecutrix further testified that on the morning of October 13th, following the date of the attack, while on her way to visit a friend, she saw the defendant with a companion in the same Chevrolet touring car, and that again in the afternoon of the same day, while she (the prosecutrix) was accompanied by her daughter and a Mrs. Hayden, the defendant and his companion were observed in the Chevrolet touring car. On this occasion she was able to secure the license number of the car, which she immediately reported to the officers, and upon which information the officers made the arrest of the defendant and his companion, one Joseph F. Welch.

Joseph F. Welch, as a witness on behalf of the people, testified that on the morning of October 13th, while riding in the Chevrolet car, the defendant pointed out the prosecutrix, who was then walking along the sidewalk, and said: "I took her on the other night; I made a date with her the night I had her out." Welch further testified that on the afternoon of the same day, while riding in the same machine, the defendant pointed out Mrs. Fuller, who was in an automobile with two other women, and said: "There is that broad that I showed you this morning. * * * I said to Elmer: 'It looks like she was taking your number down.' He says: 'Yes'; I don't know—he said something about 'That is hell,' he says, or something, 'I am going to get out of here.'"

While it is true that the defendant denied the charges in toto, and went so far as to assert that he had never seen the prosecutrix, Mrs. Fuller, until she appeared in the county jail where he was incarcerated to identify him, there is no question but that there is abundant evidence in the case to support the verdict of the jury.

[2] Counsel for the defendant urges that, because there was no corroborating testimony as to the actual assault, there was insufficient evidence to support the verdict. The rule is well settled that one may be convicted of rape upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix, if the jury believes her story. People v. Mayes, 66 Cal. 597, 6 P. 691, 56 Am. Rep. 126; People v. Logan, 123 Cal. 414, 56 P. 56; People v. Benc, 130 Cal. 159, 62 P. 404; People v. Preston, 19 Cal. App. 675, 127 P. 660; People v. Bernon, 29 Cal. App. 424, 155 P. 1021; People v. Akey, 163 Cal. 54, 124 P. 718.

We have taken the pains to read with care the entire transcript of the testimony. The impression of the testimony of the prosecutrix carries a note of sincerity, and we feel that her recital of the attack could reasonably have had no other result than to convince the jury of its truthfulness.

[3] Coming now to the charge of robbery in information No. 23725: The following detailed statement of the evidence includes what is material in the consideration of this point: The complaining witness, one Mrs. Lillian Bourlis, a young married woman under the age of 18 years, on the morning of October 14, 1924, while walking along Pasadena avenue in Belvidere Gardens, on her way to work, was accosted by the defendant and his companion, Joseph F. Welch, who were riding in a Chevrolet touring car, and invited to ride with them. Being advised that they were going in the direction of her place of employment, she accepted the invitation, and sat in the front seat between the defendant and his companion. After proceeding a few blocks, the defendant, who was driving the car, turned into a side road, which was unpaved and little frequented, and which led to a sparsely settled locality along the railroad track. The complaining witness asked the reason for taking this direction, which was not the direction in which she desired to go, and the defendant replied that it was a short cut to the point of their destination. When the car arrived at a point where there were some trees along this unfrequented road, the defendant stopped the car and put his arm around the complaining witness and attempted to engage in familiarities with her. She promptly resented this conduct and resisted the defendant's efforts, even to the extent of scratching his face and striking him. It seems that the defendant then desisted and drove his car a short distance further along this unfrequented road and, again stopping the car, renewed his attempts to caress and fondle the complaining witness. Again the complaining witness vigorously resisted the defendant's attempts, and in the mêlée Welch opened the front door of the car and got out. As soon as the complaining witness could free herself from the defendant, she, too, jumped out. In getting out of the car, she either stumbled or fell, so that she lost her balance and was assisted to her feet by Welch. About the time that she alighted from the car she noticed a man, by name Chadwick, working nearby, and she called to him for help. Her cries for help alarmed the defendant and his companion, who immediately got into the car and left the complaining witness. The man Chadwick came to her assistance, and to him she related the attacks of the defendant.

The complaining witness stated that when she got into the automobile she had her hat, coat, and a handbag, in which she carried a purse containing about $10 in change. After she got out of the automobile, and the defendant and his companion had left, she, aided by Chadwick, looked about for her hat, coat, and bag. She found her hat at one point on the ground and her coat on the ground some distance from the hat; but the purse she was unable to find, although she searched carefully, and a second time went back to the point where she left the car, looking for her purse. There is no testimony in the record that explains how the hat and coat reached the points on the ground where they were found; nor does the complaining witness have any recollection of seeing either the defendant or his companion take her purse or bag; nor does she remember where she last saw her purse and bag, except that she had them with her when she got into the automobile.

The only other testimony in the record pointing to the defendant having anything to do with the purse, comes from Welch, the co-defendant of Sylvis, and who was with Sylvis in the car. On this point, Welch testified:

That he and Sylvis had gotten into the car and started away, leaving the complaining witness. That defendant Sylvis all of a sudden looked back and says, "Gee, there is her pocketbook there; get out and see what is in it." So I goes out and says, 'God, that girl won't have car fare, what are you going to do, leave her out there?' He says, 'Hell, do you think I am a damn fool to go back there?' So I opens up the pocketbook, and it was heavy, like it had a lot of loose change. It was a beaded bag. So I shoved my hand in it, and I thought I never would get through counting it; there was about a handful of dimes and nickels in there. If I am not mistaken it was pretty near all dimes. So I says, 'What do you want to do with this?' He says, 'Hell, it just comes in handy,' he says, 'I am pretty short on some money that my dad has,' he says, 'You say there is $10 there?' He thought I was kidding him; so I takes the whole thing and shoved it in my pocket; so when we got to going along I said, 'Gee, this is not a bad pocketbook; I think I will keep it myself.' He says, 'Hell, no; you don't want to be caught with that; throw it out some place there, out in the bushes.' So the first clump of bushes we come to I tossed it out."

Welch further testified that subsequently he turned over the money to Sylvis, but received back from Sylvis $1 of the amount.

It appears from the testimony that the complaining witness, at the time she missed her pocketbook, was under the impression that in some manner it had been dropped or dragged out of the car with her hat and coat. She at no point indicated that she even entertained the thought that the defendant had taken her pocketbook. The only evidence that the defendant had anything to do with the pocketbook, comes from Welch; and but one construction can be placed upon his testimony, and that is that the pocketbook was found on the ground after they had left the complaining witness. In fact, at another point in the testimony, Welch states that it was after they had gone two or three blocks from where the complaining witness was that they found the pocketbook. It does appear that the complaining witness, in response to a question from the district attorney, who asked her if it was not a fact that she failed to stop to get her purse because she was frightened, replied in the affirmative; but a full reading of her testimony clearly indicates that she made a very careful search for her purse, and that she was not deterred in any way from this search by a feeling of fear.

Section 211 of the Penal Code, defining robbery, reads as follows:

"Robbery is the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear."

A most careful consideration of the testimony on this point discloses the fact that the essential elements of robbery—that is, the taking of the property from the person or his immediate presence—are wholly lacking. Both the defendant and his companion, Welch, were clearly guilty of petty larceny, but not of robbery.

The judgment and order in case No. 23751 are affirmed; and the judgment and order in case No. 23725 are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by Charles B. Webster and another, a copartnership doing business under the firm name and style of Webster & Jordan, against Clara Parra. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, and L. E. Nathan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Walter Osborn, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This action was brought to recover $550 for services alleged to have been rendered by the plaintiffs as brokers in the sale of the furniture, fixtures, and good will of a certain hotel. The complaint contains two counts, the first alleging an express contract of employment, and agreement on the part of defendant to pay a fixed sum of $550 for the services. The second count alleges the rendering of the services by the plaintiffs at defendant's request, and that the reasonable value of the services rendered is the sum of $550.

The case, tried by the court without a jury, resulted in findings of fact and judgment thereon in favor of the plaintiffs on the second count.

[1] The appellant bases her appeal on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and the judgment of the court. In support of this contention, two particular points are urged: First, that "there was no agreement for the employment of plaintiffs as brokers, or to pay them any commissions"; second, that "the plaintiffs did not find the purchaser or render defendant any assistance in making the sale, and there was therefore no consideration for any implied or express promise to pay a commission." The evidence bearing upon these two propositions is in conflict and, under the well-established rule, if there is any evidence sufficient to support the findings, the judgment will be affirmed.

Charles B. Webster, one of the plaintiffs, testified that during the month of March, 1921, he was engaged with one J. H. Jordan as a partner in the real estate and brokerage business in the city of Bakersfield. At that time, the defendant, with whom he had an extended acquaintance, was conducting the Euclid Hotel and was desirous of selling her lease on the hotel, together with the furniture and fixtures therein contained; that on March 16, 1921, one F. W. Nighbert came to his office, representing himself as the adviser of one Mrs. Loeva A. Voll, who was desirous of purchasing a hotel or rooming house, and entered into a discussion with him (Webster) about the Euclid Hotel. Wesbter stated further that, previous to this visit of Mr. Nighbert, he had had some arrangement (what it was does not appear) with the defendant about the hotel. While Nighbert was in his office on the morning of March 16th, Webster called the defendant over the telephone and asked her price for the hotel, which she gave him; that thereupon Webster informed her that he desired to bring some one up to look at the hotel, and the appointment was made for 2 o'clock that afternoon. At the appointed hour, Webster and Nighbert called at the hotel and had a conversation with the defendant concerning its sale and purchase. They went through the hotel, examined the furniture, and generally inquired as to matters having a bearing upon the question of its sale; that upon the completion of the investigation that afternoon, Nighbert stated that he was willing to make a deposit of $500 on account of the purchase of the hotel for Mrs. Voll, the price agreed upon being $11,000. He then drew a receipt for the deposit, which was signed by the defendant. But before the deposit was made, the defendant asked Mr. Nighbert if he was in any sense an agent in the transaction, and stated to him that she wanted it understood that she did not wish to pay two or three commissions; that Mr. Webster was her agent. Whereupon Mr. Nighbert assured the defendant that he was not acting in the capacity of an agent, but merely assisting Mrs. Voll in financing the purchase of the place, and that he had no claim for a commission. Whereupon Nighbert gave his check for $500 and received the receipt from the defendant, setting forth the purchase price and the purpose of the deposit; that subsequently, after the deal was closed, Webster called the defendant over the telephone and asked about payment of the commission; that the defendant replied that she would be down to his office in a day or two and settle with him. A few days later, the defendant not having settled with Webster, he met her at the Euclid Hotel and again spoke to her about payment of the commission; that the defendant again stated that she would be down to see him in a day or two. A third time, upon Webster meeting the defendant, he raised the question of the payment to him of his commission, and she replied, as she had previously, that she would see him in a day or two. Finally, apparently with some impatience, Webster called the defendant over the telephone and asked her if she did not intend to pay the commission; whereupon she stated that she thought $550, which was 5 per cent. of the purchase price, was too much; that she thought $500 was sufficient. In reply, Webster stated that he would not have a controversy over $50, and that he would be willing to accept $500 in settlement of his claim for commission. However, the defendant never sent her check; nor did she make any payment to plaintiff on account of his claim.

Mr. F. W. Nighbert, a witness on behalf of the plaintiffs, testified that he, as a friend and adviser of Loeva A. Voll, called at the office of Webster & Jordan on the morning of March 16th and discussed with Mr. Webster the matter of the purchase by Mrs. Voll of the Euclid Hotel; that he (Nighbert), prior to the morning of March 16th, had been informed that the hotel in question might be purchased, and in order to acquire further information he had called on the defendant at the Euclid Hotel and made some inquiries of her; that on that occasion the defendant had stated that her price was $12,000, and, after looking over the hotel he (Nighbert) stated that he left and did nothing further about buying the hotel at that time. At the time he was in the office of the plaintiffs on the morning of March 16th, Webster called the defendant and talked with her over the telephone about a sale of the hotel, and stated that he would like to bring some one, at an appointed time, to look over the hotel with a view to its purchase. The hour was fixed at 2 o'clock that afternoon, and he, together with Webster, went to the hotel. After some continued conversation with the defendant and a more detailed examination into the hotel and the furnishings, he (Nighbert) stated that he was willing to make a deposit on behalf of Mrs. Voll for the purchase of the hotel and furnishings at $11,000, which was the price agreed upon. In accordance with this proposal, he gave a check to the defendant and received a receipt therefor; that subsequently, on behalf of Mrs. Voll, he paid the balance of the purchase price and the transaction was completed.

Loeva A. Voll, a witness on behalf of the plaintiffs, testified that Mr. Nighbert had made some inquiry for her concerning the purchase of the hotel several days previous to March 16th, when the deposit was made; that he advised her prior to that date that he had seen the defendant, and that she would not talk of any price less than $12,000. Later and prior to March 16th, she had seen Mr. Jordan, one of the plaintiffs, who told her that he thought the hotel could be purchased for $11,000; that on the morning of either March 15th or March 16th—it is not clear from the transcript—plaintiffs, Webster & Jordan, called upon Mrs. Voll at her home, and there discussed the matter of her purchase of the hotel; that subsequent to the making of the deposit in her behalf by Mr. Nighbert she, with plaintiffs, Webster & Jordan, went to the Euclid Hotel and made an inventory of all the furniture and furnishings; that on this occasion she met and talked with the defendant at the hotel; that subsequent to the completion of the transaction she testified that she talked with the defendant with regard to the payment of a commission to the plaintiffs, and that in that conversation she (the defendant) stated that she owed plaintiffs the money for the commission. The witness, Mrs. Voll, stated that she definitely asked the defendant, if she was paying the plaintiffs a commission, and that she stated that she "supposed she was"; and when she (the witness) stated that Mr. Webster had evidently been up to the hotel looking for her (the defendant), the defendant replied:

"I suppose he will hound me to death until he gets the money."

The defendant was the sole witness on her own behalf, and denies that she made any agreement with the plaintiffs or either of them requesting them or employing them to act as brokers for her in the sale of the hotel. She testified that Mr. Nighbert called on her one morning and made some inquiry concerning the hotel. She states that she told Mr. Nighbert the hotel was for sale for $11,000. She seemed to think that Mrs. Voll accompanied Mr. Nighbert on the occasion of this visit. The defendant, giving her conversation with Mr. Nighbert on the morning of March 16th, testified:

"I didn't figure I wanted to sell, had decided not to sell. I think he said for whom he was inquiring. The morning of the 16th he was there. But I am sure Mrs. Voll was there, but she is just as sure she was not; I don't know. I told him I would sell for $11,000, but I had already told Mr. Webster to bring his party at 2 o'clock, so that after 2 o'clock

I would see them, if Webster's party didn't take it. Just before that, he (presumably Webster) told me, he called me, said he would bring a party at 2 o'clock. That is all he said, asked if it was for sale, said he would bring a party at 2 o'clock. I told him the price was $11,000. Nothing was said about commission. Nothing was said about his being an agent. I didn't know he was an agent."

The defendant, testifying further, stated that when Webster came to keep his appointment and brought Mr. Nighbert with him, she stated that Mr. Nighbert had been to see her before, and that she expected Webster to bring some one else. Thereupon Mr. Webster and Mr. Nighbert asked if they could look through the hotel, and the defendant accompanied them, taking them and showing them various rooms and the furniture. The defendant admitted having one conversation over the telephone with plaintiff Webster concerning a commission; but denied the other three conversations testified to by Webster. On the occasion that she talked with him over the telephone, she stated that she refused to pay him a commission, alleging that she did not think she owed him anything, and that he had not earned a commission. She also denied the conversation testified to by Mrs. Voll in which she (the defendant) was alleged to have made the statement that she owed Webster a commission.

[2] Considering appellant's first proposition, the query arises: Is there sufficient evidence to support the court's finding that the "plaintiffs rendered services to the defendant at defendant's special instance and request"? There is evidence that, first, plaintiffs were licensed brokers; second, that they talked with the defendant concerning the matter of the sale of her hotel, and secured her price therefor, and informed her that they had a prospective purchaser for the same, and made an appointment with her, at which time they brought to her hotel a prospective purchaser, who subsequently did purchase upon terms satisfactory to the defendant; third, that she stated to the purchaser and to her adviser that plaintiff Webster was her agent, and that she expected to pay him a commission; and, fourth, that subsequent to the consummation of the deal she made statements that she would pay the plaintiffs a commission for their services in the transaction. Manifestly there is sufficient evidence to support the finding of the court that the plaintiffs rendered services to the defendant at her special instance and request.

[3] A mutual consent is necessary to the existence of an agreement. When the plaintiff Webster talked with the defendant over the telephone concerning the sale of her hotel, and gave the price for which she was willing to sell, and made an engagement with him to go over the property with the prospective purchaser, the only reasonable deduction to be made is that the defendant was desirous of having the plaintiff secure for her a purchaser for her property, and her conduct was in effect a proposal that he find a customer for her. In turn, Webster accepted her proposal to find a customer for the hotel at the price of $11,000, and pursuant to an appointment made therefor, he brought the prospective customer to the defendant, and the sale was immediately consummated, and the defendant received the benefits of the purchase by the customer brought by the plaintiff.

[4] While appellant admits the circumstances of the conversation with the plaintiff on the morning of March 16th relative to the sale and her price and the appointment for the afternoon, she contends that she did not know that plaintiffs were brokers. A careful examination of the defendant's testimony could not possibly justify a construction or inference that the defendant believed, in her conversation or negotiations with the plaintiffs, that she was dealing with them as customers. It appears clearly from her testimony that she understood the inquiry made by the plaintiffs and their efforts were in behalf of a prospective customer, and that she understood the appointment with her for the afternoon was for the purpose of meeting a prospective customer. At no point in her testimony does it appear that she considered that Mr. Webster was making inquiries with a view to purchasing the hotel himself.

[5] Furthermore, it appears from the testimony that before the deposit was accepted by the defendant on behalf of Mrs. Voll, she made inquiry to ascertain whether or not Mr. Nighbert, who was making the deposit for Mrs. Voll, considered himself an agent in the transaction and by reason thereof would make a claim for a commission. When Mr. Nighbert replied that he was not acting as an agent, but simply as a friend of the purchaser, the defendant replied that Mr. Webster was her agent, and that she did not wish to find herself in a position where she would be obligated to pay more than one commission.

"A voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to be known, to the person accepting." Civ. Code, § 1589.

It is a well-known custom in the matter of listing properties for sale with brokers that owners simply inform the brokers that they wish to sell and the price for which they will sell. It is true, in the matter of a sale of real property a written memorandum of employment is necessary under our statute, but this provision does not apply to a sale of personal property. Where the listing is made, whatever may be the method, and subsequently the broker brings to the owner one who purchases on terms satisfactory to the owner, the only reasonable inference to be drawn from such facts is that there was an employment by the owner of the broker to procure a purchaser for his property.

[6] And, of course, where such an employment appears, even though there be no agreement as to the amount of the compensation, the law implies that a reasonable compensation will be paid. This principle is so fundamental and well established that no authorities need be cited in support of it. It is not urged by the appellant that the amount of the judgment is an unreasonable amount of compensation for the services

We have examined the authorities cited by the appellant in her brief in support of her contention, but none of these authorities hold contrary to the views here expressed; in fact, most of them deal with the question of a written agreement or memoranda involved in the sale of real estate.

[7] Appellant further contends that the plaintiffs did not find a purchaser, nor did they render the defendant any assistance in making the sale. It does appear from the evidence that Mr. Nighbert, having had information from other sources that the hotel in question was for sale, called at the hotel on the Monday previous to March 16th and at that time interviewed the defendant relative to a sale of the hotel. It appears also from the testimony of Mr. Nighbert that the price the defendant quoted to him was $12,000, and that after a short interview he left and did nothing further about it. It seems that subsequently he, as well as Mrs. Voll, learned from Mr. Jordan, one of the plaintiffs, that the property could be purchased for $11,000, and on the morning of March 16th Mr. Nighbert went to the office of the plaintiffs for the purpose of taking up with them the matter of securing the property for $11,000, or, perchance, for a less sum. The well-established rule is that a broker, before he is entitled to compensation for his services, must show that he produced a purchaser who was ready and willing to make the purchase on terms satisfactory to the owner, and that he was the efficient agent or procuring cause of the sale. Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 512, 17 P. 642. Under this well-established rule, it is unnecessary for the broker to prove that he was the first one to bring to the attention of the purchaser the fact that the property in question was for sale and the price thereof. What is required is that he shall be the efficient agent or procuring cause for the sale. In other words, it must appear that his efforts had to do with the meeting of the minds of the seller and buyer. The evidence of this case clearly brings the plaintiffs within that rule; for it appears that plaintiffs went to the home of Mrs. Voll, and also had interviews with Mr. Nighbert, her adviser, for the purpose of inducing Mrs. Voll to purchase and Mr. Nighbert to advise her to purchase; that they made the appointment for the purchaser and accompanied him to the hotel and continued with him until Mr. Nighbert agreed to buy and made a deposit.

[8] Appellant urges in support of her contention that the plaintiffs did not render her any service in closing the deal after the deposit was made; that the deal was finally consummated, as far as payment of the balance of the purchase price is concerned, without the presence of the plaintiffs; this being accomplished at a bank. We do not understand that the law requires the broker to render any particular service after he has brought the minds of the parties together, and the contract has been entered into for the purchase and sale.

From the foregoing, it appearing that there is sufficient evidence to support the findings and judgment of the court, the judgment is affirmed.

CAWSTON OSTRICH FARM v. SALOMON et al. (Civ. 4160.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 8, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 6, 1925.)

1. Subrogation ⟹31(3)—Lessee by payment of its assignee's obligation held entitled to sum deposited with lessor.

Where, on assignment of lease by lessee, it guaranteed payment of rent reserved when due, and faithful performance of lease by its assignee, and, where existing judgment against lessee represented total amount of liability, secured to lessor by sum deposited with him, and payment of judgment by lessee would be payment by it as guarantor or surety on behalf of its assignee, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 2831, 2849, lessee by making such payment was entitled to be subrogated to and have benefit of deposit which lessor may have obtained from assignee.

2. Judgment ⟹735—Right of subrogation not res judicata.

Where, in action by lessor against lessee to recover sums alleged to be due under lease, lessee's right of subrogation to sum deposited with lessor was not involved, and existence of right was not submitted, nor were circumstances such that failure to demand its enforcement in that action created an estoppel against lessee, judgment in former action was not res judicata as to lessee's right to subrogation.

Action by the Cawston Ostrich Farm, a corporation, against Walter J. Salomon, sometimes known as Walter J. Salman, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

B. P. Woodard, of Glendale, and Grant Jackson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Donald Barker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This action is described by the plaintiff as a suit in equity to enforce a right of subrogation in favor of the plaintiff as equitable owner of a $1,500 fund.

On the 31st day of May, 1912, Salomon executed to the plaintiff, Cawston Ostrich Farm, a California corporation, a five-year lease of a storeroom in the city of New York. At that time the plaintiff deposited with the defendant $1,500 in accordance with a paragraph of the lease which read as follows:

"Twentieth. And the said tenant hereby deposits with the said landlord the sum of fifteen hundred dollars as part security for the faithful performance of all the conditions and covenants of the said lease, which security is to remain in the possession of the said landlord until the expiration of the within lease, and then returned to the said tenant if all the considerations and covenants of the within lease have been complied with, but this deposit shall not be considered in any sense as liquidated damages."

Under date January 6, 1914, a written agreement was entered into between Salomon, party of the first part, Cawston Ostrich Farm, party of the second part, and Cawston Ostrich Farm Corporation, a New York corporation, party of the third part. In that agreement the party of the second part assigned the lease to the party of the third part, and Salomon consented thereto. This agreement referred to said $1,500 fund as follows:

"V. The party of the second part hereby transfers and assigns to the party of the third part the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, now deposited with the party of the first part as security under the terms and conditions of clause number twenty of the said lease and hereby authorizes and directs the party of the first part to pay same to the party of the third part whenever the same may be due under the terms of this lease."

In said agreement of January 6, 1914, it was also provided:

"The party of the second part hereby guarantees to the party of the first part the prompt payment of the rent reserved in said lease when due by the party of the third part, as well as the prompt and full and faithful performance of all the terms and conditions contained in said lease by the party of the third part."

In September, 1914, Cawston Ostrich Farm Corporation, with the written consent of Salomon, assigned said lease to one Frances Cohen, and also assigned to her said sum of $1,500 deposited with Salomon as security under the terms and conditions of said clause No. 20 of the lease, and at the same time authorized and directed Salomon to pay the same to Cohen "whenever the same may be due under the terms of the said lease." Cawston Ostrich Farm had no knowledge of said assignment to Cohen, and did not consent thereto. Cohen entered into possession of the leased premises, and remained in possession for about two months, when she was dispossessed under a judicial proceeding for nonpayment of the rent for October, 1914. Thereupon Salomon went into possession and made certain alterations in the store premises. Thereafter Salomon leased the premises (from and after November, 1914), and received certain sums as rental therefor.

In April, 1915, Salomon brought an action (No.B.–24138) against Cawston Ostrich Farm in the superior court of Los Angeles county, to recover various sums alleged to be due from said Cawston Ostrich Farm to Salomon, by reason of nonpayment of certain taxes and nonpayment of the rent of October, 1914, and by reason of the fact that the rents received by him from November, 1914, to March, 1915, were less than the amount due to him under the lease contract. This action resulted in a judgment entered January 8, 1917, in favor of Salomon and against Cawston Ostrich Farm in the sum of $2,197.68 and costs.

On October 21, 1920, the plaintiff made tender to Salomon of the sum of $849.55 on account of said judgment, and demanded that he apply said sum of $1,500 and interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the date of the deposit, toward the satisfaction of the judgment. The court, in the case at bar, found in favor of Salomon on the issue relating to his alleged obligation to pay interest on said deposit, and determined the amount which plaintiff shall pay, which sum, together with said sum of $1,500, will satisfy the said judgment.

According to the findings in the present action (and there are no assignments of error as to the findings), the judgment recovered by Salomon against Cawston Ostrich Farm (plaintiff and respondent in the present action) represented all of the indebtedness or liability due or payable from this plaintiff to Salomon under said lease, or otherwise, either at the date of the judgment or thereafter. Said fund of $1,500 has remained in possession of Salomon at all times from and after the time of its deposit when the lease was executed. The plaintiff herein alleged, and the court found, that said sum is so held by Salomon, "subject only to the right of said Salomon to apply said moneys and the accrued interest thereon toward the indebtedness of said Frances A. H. Cohen to said Salomon for rental and taxes arising out of the assumption by her of the obligations of the lessee under said lease from and after the date of the assignment thereof to her as aforesaid and subject to the right of this plaintiff to be subrogated in the place of said Frances A. H. Cohen and to her rights with reference to said fund of $1,500 and interest, then and there held by said Salomon as security for the obligations of the lessee under said lease as aforesaid."

The defendant Salomon alleged, and the court found herein, that it is the law of the state of New York that, while the execution of a final warrant of dispossess, such as that obtained by Salomon in New York against the tenant Cohen, terminated the relation of landlord and tenant between Salomon and Cohen, it did not terminate the obligation imposed by that paragraph of the lease wherein the lessee agreed to pay the damages sustained by Salomon, to wit, the difference between the rent reserved in the said lease and the amount of rent received by the defendant Walter J. Salomon on a reletting of the said premises, and that such obligation and covenant survived the severance of the said relation of landlord and tenant between the defendant Walter J. Salomon and the said Frances A. H. Cohen, as aforesaid. But the court further found as follows:

"The defendant Walter J. Salomon did not, in reletting the said premises in pursuance of paragraph 28 of the said lease attached as Exhibit A to the complaint herein, or by reason of any breach of obligations of the lessee under said lease, sustain any damages except those included in the judgment in the former action of Walter J. Salomon, plaintiff, v. Cawston Ostrich Farm, defendant, numbered B–24138, records and files superior court, Los Angeles county."

In action No. B–24138 said damages were determined as follows: The court found that in said action of Salomon against Cohen, which was a summary proceeding in the municipal court of the city of New York, judgment was entered against Cohen for the sum of $1,455, being the rent for the month commencing October 1, 1914, and costs; and that said judgment was wholly unpaid except the sum of $304.78, which Salomon received on account from the trustee in bankruptcy of Cohen. The court in said action B–24138 determined that by the institution of the said summary proceedings, and the recovery of judgment therein, and the subsequent acts of the plaintiff (referring to the changes made by Salomon in the leased premises and his reletting of the premises to other tenants), the lease to which this action relates was terminated. Thereupon the court gave judgment in favor of Salomon and against Cawston Ostrich Farm in said sum of $2,197.68, which was a sum equal to the unpaid balance of the New York judgment, plus a certain amount covering taxes paid by Salomon (to repayment of which he was entitled by an agreement in the lease), together with certain stated interest and costs. In its conclusions of law the court stated "that he is not entitled to recover any other sum or sums."

From the judgment in said action B–24138, Salomon appealed. On that appeal the judgment was affirmed. 43 Cal. App. 465, 185 P. 314. The contention of Salomon on that appeal was that the judgment should have been for a larger sum, and should have included the difference between the rental specified in the lease and that received, between November 1, 1914, and April 1, 1915, on the reletting of the premises.

At the trial of the present action it was stipulated:

"That by reason of alleged severance of the relation of landlord and tenant between the defendant Walter J. Salomon and the said Frances A. H. Cohen, as averred in the answer herein, and by reason of alleged reletting of the said premises thereafter, the defendant Walter J. Salomon claims damages amounting to $14,012.28, for which amount the defendant Walter J. Salomon on or about the 18th day of October, 1920, brought an action against the said Cawston Ostrich Farm Corporation, the assignor of the said Frances A. H. Cohen and the assignee of the plaintiff herein, in the supreme court of the state of New York, which action is now pending and undetermined."

It was further stipulated that said deposit of $1,500 is held by Salomon under claim of right to hold it to await the result of his said action against Cawston Ostrich Farm Corporation in New York. The first question to be determined on this appeal relates to this asserted right. In giving consideration to this question it is first necessary to define the nature of the obligation on which the judgment of Salomon against Cawston Ostrich Farm is founded. Originally, when the lease was executed, this obligation was that of a principal promisor. But immediately upon execution of the assignment to the Cawston Ostrich Farm Corporation, by the agreement contained therein, to which Salomon was also a party, the obligation of Cawston Ostrich Farm became that of "a surety or guarantor." This is so by the very terms of that contract which we have quoted; and this construction of the contract has been finally affirmed as between the parties to this action by the findings and judgment in said action B–24138. For in that action the court found that the allegations of paragraph X of the answer to the amended complaint were true. In that paragraph it was alleged that the agreement containing said guaranty had been executed, and that "thereafter defendant occupied the position only of a surety or guarantor according to the provisions of said written agreement, and that the liability of the defendant was thereafter limited as in and by the terms and provisions of said written agreement set forth."

Based upon the new relation thus established between Salomon and Cawston Ostrich Farm, it was held in said action B–24138,

Salomon v. Cawston Ostrich Farm, that Salomon was not entitled to recover against said defendant the difference between the rental specified in the lease and that received between November 1, 1914, and April 1, 1915, from the new tenants to whom he leased the premises after Mrs. Cohen had been ejected. This was the very point involved in the appeal (Salomon v. Cawston Ostrich Farm, 43 Cal. App. 465, 185 P. 314), wherein it was decided that appellant Salomon was not entitled to recover said alleged amount of lost rentals. This decision was based upon the finding of the court below summarized by the Court of Appeal as follows:

"After taking possession, he made no effort to rent the premises as a whole, but removed the entire front, and by the removal of the two pilasters increased the glass area four or five feet in width. He also divided the store in two by a longitudinal partition two inches thick and put two doors in the front instead of one, thus changing the demised store into two new stores, each somewhat less than eight and a half feet wide. None of the changes were made because of needed repairs or for the preservation of the premises. * * * Upon conflicting evidence, the trial court found that certain affirmative allegations of the answer were true. Among these were that by the alterations the premises were so changed that they were not adapted to the use of one tenant; that the premises were more valuable for rental purposes and more readily rentable as one store than as two, and that, if the alterations had not been made, the plaintiff could have obtained in the reletting an amount of rental equivalent to the rental payable under the lease. There was sufficient evidence to sustain these findings. Upon them the trial court concluded that by the summary proceedings and the subsequent acts of the plaintiff the lease was terminated, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the net amount of rents, with surcharges unpaid for the month of October, 1914, in which the plaintiff resumed possession. The implication necessarily follows that the plaintiff was not entitled to the difference between the rents collected and those reserved in the lease after the lease was terminated. The only real question presented on this appeal is whether or not, despite the evidence and the findings, the conclusion of law upon this subject was correct."

It was held that in New York, as well as in California, the obligations of the guarantor are strictly construed; and that, because the described changes in the premises were made by Salomon without the knowledge or consent of the guarantor, the latter was released.

Appellant Salomon contends herein that the decision of the California courts in his said former action is not res adjudicata as to his claims against either the Cawston Ostrich Farm Corporation, a New York corporation, or Frances A. H. Cohen of New York city. It must be conceded that the California judgment could not be used by said New York parties as a bar to Salomon's claims against them in the New York court. The two actions are not between the same parties. But it is equally true that Cawston Ostrich Farm would not be bound by a judgment establishing Salomon's demands against those parties in the New York court. As between Salomon and Cawston Ostrich Farm the issues concerning said liability must be directly determined in an action between the parties now before this court. This is precisely the thing that has been done in said action of Salomon against Cawston Ostrich Farm.

Appellant next makes the following contention: That, because the Cawston Ostrich Farm specifically directed Salomon to pay said deposit to the New York corporation when all of the terms and conditions of paragraph 20th of the lease had been fully complied with, and because the New York corporation made a like specific direction and authorization to Salomon to pay said deposit to Cohen, and because Cawston Ostrich Farm assigned to Cawston Ostrich Farm Corporation, together with said lease, the said deposit of $1,500, said Cawston Ostrich Farm has no further interest in said deposit, and the said deposit now belongs to said Cohen as sole owner thereof, but subject to the terms and conditions of said paragraph 20th of the lease.

[1] It is not disputed that the assignment was made, and directions given, exactly as appellant states them. Nevertheless, we are of the opinion that these facts do not affect in any way the rights of respondent Cawston Ostrich Farm asserted in this action. So far as the rights of the Cawston Ostrich Farm as guarantor are concerned, it is now settled that the existing judgment against it represents the total amount of liability secured to Salomon by the sum deposited with him. Payment of this judgment by the Cawston Ostrich Farm will in reality be a payment by the guarantor or surety on behalf of its principal. On the facts of this case Cawston Ostrich Farm is a surety for the principal obligor, and it is of no consequence that the word "guarantees" was used in making the promise. Upon making such payment, the surety "is entitled to be subrogated to and to have the benefit of all securities which may at any time have been put into the creditor's hands by the principal debtor, or which the creditor may have obtained from the principal debtor." Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) § 1419.

"A surety is entitled to the benefit of every security for the performance of the principal obligation held by the creditor, or by a cosurety at the time of entering into the contract of suretyship, or acquired by him afterwards, whether the surety was aware of the security or not." Civ. Code, § 2849.

"A surety is one who at the request of another, and for the purpose of securing to him a benefit, becomes responsible for the performance by the latter of some act in favor of a third person, or hypothecates property as security therefor." Civ. Code, § 2831.

[2] Finally appellant contends that the judgment in Salomon v. Cawston Ostrich Farm is res adjudicata as to the right of the plaintiff to apply said sum of $1,500 towards the satisfaction of that judgment; in other words, that, because that right was not affirmed in that action, therefore it cannot be asserted in this action. But, on the contrary, we think that respondent's right of subrogation was not involved in the decision of the former action. As is pointed out by respondent, the indebtedness for which Cawston Ostrich Farm was held liable in that action was an unliquidated amount, and until the rendition of that judgment the defendant therein could not know the amount, payment of which would entitle it to assert its right of subrogation. The existence of that right was not submitted for decision in said former action, nor were the circumstances such that failure to demand its enforcement at that time created an estoppel against the plaintiff in the present action.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GONZALES. (Cr. 1171.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 12, 1925. Rehearing Denied June 5, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⟹1159(2)—Verdict, supported by sufficient testimony, if accepted as true, not disturbed on appeal.

Jury's conclusion from testimony sufficient to justify verdict, if accepted as true, cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. Criminal law ⟹409—Defendant's rights held not violated by admission of testimony as to admissions by him.

Where witness, testifying to admissions by defendant, stated that no threat, force, or violence was used, nor any hope of immunity or promise of reward held out, but that statement was free and voluntary, and defendant's counsel examined witness fully on voir dire, defendant's rights were not violated.

3. Criminal law ⟹409—No foundation necessary for admission of statements not amounting to confession.

No foundation need be laid for admission in evidence of statements by defendant not amounting to a confession.

4. Indictment and information ⟹196(7)—Objection that information charged more than one offense waived by failure to demur.

Under Pen. Code, §§ 1004, 1012, defendant, interposing no demurrer to information as charging more than one offense, waives objection.

5. Weapons ⟹4—Criminal intent need not be shown to warrant conviction of convicted felon for possessing firearm.

When act is made indictable in general terms, as by St. 1923, p. 695, making possession of firearm by one convicted of felony a crime, criminal intent need not be shown, unless purpose to require it can be discovered from language or effects of law.

6. Weapons ⟹17(5)—Whether convicted felon knowingly possessed firearm fact question for jury.

Whether convicted felon knowingly possessed firearm, in violation of St. 1923, p. 695, is question of fact for jury.

7. Weapons ⟹4—Concealment on person not necessary to conviction of felon for possessing firearm.

To warrant conviction of convicted felon for carrying firearm in violation of St. 1923, p. 695, weapon need not have been concealed on his person; mere possession or control and custody thereof being sufficient.

8. Criminal law ⟹1137(3)—Defendant cannot complain of omission of matter eliminated from instruction at his request.

In prosecution of convicted felon for possessing firearm, in violation of St. 1923, p. 695, defendant could not complain of failure to instruct that, if possession was unknown to him, he would not be guilty, in view of instruction, given at his request, expressly excepting count containing firearm charge from rule as to necessity of guilty knowledge.

9. Criminal law ⟹1137(3)—Defendant cannot complain of giving of part of instruction offered in his own behalf.

Defendant cannot complain of giving of part of instruction offered in his own behalf.

10. Criminal law ⟹829(1)—Refusal of instruction, covered by instructions given, not error.

Refusal of instruction, fully covered by instructions given, is not error.

11. Criminal law ⟹1137(2)—Party cannot complain of error he helped bring about.

Party cannot complain of error he was instrumental in bringing about.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Louis Gonzales was convicted of second degree burglary and violation of the firearms act, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John S. Cooper and Caesar A. Roberts, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. On each of two counts of an information defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary of the second degree, and on the fourth count of the same information defendant was found guilty of a violation of the so-called firearms act (Stats. 1923, p. 695; Deering's Gen. Laws [1923 Ed.] Act 1970). He appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The first point made by appellant for reversal of the judgment is that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. The argument, however, deals with the credibility which appellant claims should have attached to the testimony of the several witnesses. Appellant's counsel does not suggest that such testimony, if accepted as true by the jury, was not sufficient to justify the verdict. In such circumstances, the authorities are uniformly to the effect that the conclusion reached by the jury cannot be disturbed on appeal.

[2, 3] On the trial of the action, evidence of certain admissions by defendant was presented to the jury, and it is contended by appellant that the proper foundation therefor was not laid prior to the introduction thereof. The record, however, shows that the witness, testifying to such admissions by defendant, stated that no threat or force or violence had been used against defendant, nor was any hope of immunity or promise of reward held out to him to induce him to make any statement, but, on the contrary, that such statement by defendant was free and voluntary on his part, and that thereupon counsel for defendant examined the witness fully on voir dire as to each of such conclusions. Thereafter, without objection by defendant, his several admissions were introduced in evidence. In such circumstances, it is clear that none of defendant's rights in the premises was violated. In addition thereto, the law is well settled that no necessity exists for laying such foundation for the admission in evidence of statements made by defendant not amounting to a confession. People v. Ford, 25 Cal. App. 388, 418, 143 P. 1075.

[4] Appellant charges error in that two or more offenses not connected in their commission were contained within the information against defendant. By section 1004, Penal Code, a defendant is given the right to demur to the information on the ground (3) "that more than one offense is charged, except," etc. In view of the fact that no demurrer was interposed by defendant, it is clear that he waived the objection. Section 1012, Penal Code; People v. Connor, 17 Cal. 354; People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 394; People v. Garnett, 29 Cal. 622; People v. Chadwick, 4 Cal. App. 63, 87 P. 384, 389.

[5] Appellant also suggests as a reason why the judgment should be reversed and the motion for a new trial granted to defendant, that the statute heretofore referred to as the "firearms act" is unconstitutional in that it makes criminal the mere possession of a firearm by certain designated persons without requiring that such possession be accompanied by criminal knowledge and intent. No reference is made by counsel representing appellant to any article or section of the Constitution of which he claims the act in question is violative, nor, so far as can be determined from the argument and the authorities submitted on the point, is the constitutionality of the statute involved. With reference to the necessity of showing criminal intent on the part of the person charged with the offense of unlawfully having a firearm in his possession, the authorities appear to be in accord to the effect that:

"When an act, in general terms, is made indictable, a criminal intent need not be shown, unless from the language or effects of the law a purpose to require the existence of such intent can be discovered."

See People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, 31 P. 45, where the subject is treated at length and the adjudicated cases bearing thereon are reviewed, including State v. McBrayer, 98 N. C. 623, 2 S. E. 755, which is quoted as follows:

"It is a mistaken notion that positive, willful intent to violate the criminal law is an essential ingredient in every criminal offense, and that, where there is an absence of such intent, there is no offense. This is especially so as to statutory offenses. When the statute plainly forbids an act to be done, and it is done by some person, the law implies conclusively the guilty intent, although the offender was honestly mistaken as to the meaning of the law he violates. When the language is plain and positive, and the offense is not made to depend upon the positive, willful intent and purpose, nothing is left to interpretation."

See, also, People v. Hartman, 130 Cal. 487, 62 P. 823; Matter of Application of Ahart, 172 Cal. 764, 159 P. 160; People v. Tomalty, 14 Cal. App. 230, 111 P. 513; People v. Phillips, 27 Cal. App. 412, 150 P. 75; People v. Iden, 24 Cal. App. 627, 142 P. 117.

In the case of People v. Worfrom, 15 Cal. App. 732, 115 P. 1088, it is said:

"When the intent is not made an affirmative element of the crime, the law imputes that the act knowingly done was with criminal intent, and it need not be alleged nor proven."

[6] A perusal of the statute which is the subject of appellant's attack shows that the mere possession of a firearm by any person described in the act is sufficient to constitute a criminal offense. The language of the statute is that:

"* * * No person who has been convicted of a felony against the person or property of another or," etc., "shall own or have in his possession or under his custody or control any pistol, revolver or other firearm capable of being concealed upon the person."

By the statute, intent on the part of a defendant accused of the commission of the offense is not made an essential to the completion of the criminal act; and whether or not the act was committed knowingly would necessarily be a question of fact for determination by the jury.

[7, 8] In this connection, defendant also assigns as error the giving of the following instruction, at the request of the people:

"You are further instructed that, under the offense charged in said count 4, it is not necessary that the weapon should have been carried concealed upon the person of the defendant; the mere having in his possession, or under his control and custody, of such weapon being sufficient."

While the instruction correctly states a principle of law applicable to the case, it is possible that it might have contained an additional statement to the effect that, if the possession of the firearm by the defendant was unknown to him, he would not be guilty of a violation of the statute. But by an examination of the instruction given to the jury at the request of defendant, we find that the very matter, in substance, which he now suggests should have been given to the jury was eliminated from the instruction at his own request. The instruction to which we refer is as follows:

"You are instructed that in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent, and the criminal intent is the essential element. A person may aid in the commission of an offense by doing innocently some act essential to its accomplishment, and you are instructed that merely aiding or assisting in the commission of the offense charged in this information, without guilty knowledge or criminal intent on the part of the defendant, is not criminal and would not justify you in finding him guilty. This instruction implies only to the first three counts of the information."

The "firearm" charge against defendant was contained in the fourth count of the information, and was therefore, at defendant's suggestion, expressly excepted from the operation of the rule as announced in the instruction just quoted. In the circumstances, defendant has no just cause for complaint.

[9, 10] As a final complaint by appellant, he asserts that the trial court erred in giving a certain instruction to the jury. It is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that the credibility of the witnesses is a question exclusively for the jury; and the law is that, where a number of witnesses testify directly opposite to each other, the jury are not bound to regard the weight of the evidence as evenly balanced."

[11] The instruction was a part of one offered by defendant in his own behalf. The remainder of the instruction which was refused by the court was fully covered by other instructions which the court gave to the jury. If the instruction states an incorrect principle of law applicable to a criminal case, it constitutes an error of which defendant is in no position to complain. The rule affecting such a situation is correctly announced in the case of People v. Goulding, 60 Cal. App. 542, 213 P. 277, where it is said:

"It is a sound principle, as well as a most salutary one, that a party cannot be heard to complain of an error which he himself has been instrumental in bringing about. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Fox, 60 Neb. 531, 83 N. W. 744."

We find no error in the record prejudicial to defendant's substantial rights.

The judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

We concur:

ANSO v. ANSO. (Civ. 2895.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 6, 1925.)

1. Evidence ⊂=594—Uncontradicted testimony not disregarded.

Generally uncontradicted testimony of witness to a particular fact may not be disregarded, but should be accepted as proof.

2. Evidence ⊂=594—Uncontradicted testimony not disregarded unless improbable.

Rule that uncontradicted testimony cannot be arbitrarily rejected is subject to fact that it is not inherently improbable.

3. Evidence ⊂=594—Testimony held not inherently improbable.

In husband's action for divorce for wife's alleged cruelty, nothing in record indicated that his testimony and that of his witnesses was inherently improbable, or that surrounding circumstances were such as to render testimony incredible or unworthy of belief.

4. Divorce ⊂=27(18) — Husband's testimony when taken with other facts, held sufficient to constitute cruelty.

Wife received endearing letter from another man stating, "You ask me, dear, to write and tell you that I love you," and "with all my love and lots of kisses that I wish were real." When confronted with letter she said, "What of it?" Held, this taken with other testimony, was sufficient to constitute cruelty within Civ. Code, § 94.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action of divorce by Leo Felice Anso against Lillian Holda Anso. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. L. Meyers, of Fresno, for appellant.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff for divorce. The decree of divorce was denied, and the plaintiff appeals. It appears from the transcript that the cause of action set forth in the plaintiff's complaint is that of cruelty. The complaint, after setting forth the necessary jurisdictional facts, alleges that the defendant on numerous occasions told the plaintiff that she was sorry she had married him; that she wanted to get a divorce; that there would be no more married life for her; that she wanted to be free so that she could do and have whatever she wanted; that the defendant also refused to do any household work whatever, refused to cook any meals for the plaintiff, and stated that she would not wait on any man; that the defendant also received love letters from other men. Personal service was had of the summons and complaint in the action. The defendant made no appearance.

The plaintiff testified, in substance, as follows:

"Shortly after we arrived here [Fresno], about a month, my wife refused to do any of the household work, refused to cook any meals or do any of the duties of a housewife, and as a result of this I was compelled to eat my meals in town. She assumed a very indifferent and independent attitude, and continually told me she was sorry she had married me, that she didn't like housework, and that she wouldn't wait on any man, and that she wanted to be free, so that she could do and have whatever she wished. Her actions in this way led me to believe she was unfaithful to me, so I kept a closer watch for signs of infidelity, and on December 11th I discovered two love letters, received from other men, in her vanity box. I confronted her with the letters and she asked, 'What of it?' "

The witness testified further that, as a result of the trouble, he became and was at the time of the trial still very nervous. A sister of the plaintiff, a witness called in corroboration, testified as follows:

"The defendant was dissatisfied with married life; she was sorry she married him; she wanted to be free; she wanted him to get a divorce; she did not want to be married any longer; she refused to cook his meals or to do anything, and while I was there I had to do the cooking, in order to have anything to eat in the house. She just said she was dissatisfied with married life. She said these things in the presence of the plaintiff and myself several times."

The plaintiff and the defendant separated on the 5th of December. On the 11th of December the plaintiff discovered the letters referred to, one of which was introduced in evidence, and reads as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., December 10, 1923.

"Dear little girl, I have only just got in from Needles and went to the post office and got your letter and am going to answer it right away. I sure am all tired out and am going home to have a good sleep as I have to go back to Needles tomorrow. You ask me dear to write and tell you that I love you, I only wish that I could show you really how much I do care for you, I thought of you all the time that I was in Needles and I was wishing you were there instead of in Fresno although I can't say that I like that town at all. I am indeed very sorry that you are so lonesome dear and I wish that I might be there with you, it is too bad that things have to be the way that they are with you but then it is all in a lifetime so try to cheer up and be a good little girl, and you know that I am thinking of you all the time little girl if no one else is. * * * I hope that you will be able to send me a picture the next time that you write me and although I know how things are with you try to write as soon as possible as I will go to the post office when I return and hope that there will be a letter there for me.

"With all my love and lots of kisses that I wish were real, Dal.

"Dated: San Bernardino, December 10, 1923."

No findings were filed in the case, and it does not appear why and upon what grounds the decree of divorce was not granted. There does not appear anything in the record tending to discredit the testimony of any of the witnesses. The defendant failed to answer the charges, allowed default to be entered against her, and it therefore must be assumed that, so far as she was concerned, the allegations contained in the complaint were true.

[1] The question then is presented to this court as to the effect of the uncontradicted evidence. In 10 California Jurisprudence, 1143, § 362, this subject is stated as follows:

"It is a general rule that the uncontradicted testimony of a witness to a particular fact may not be disregarded, but should be accepted as proof of the fact."

This rule is approved in the concurring opinion to Stewart v. Silva, 192 Cal. 405, 221 P. 192; Gage v. Billing, 12 Cal. App. 688, 108 P. 664.

[2, 3] The rule, however, that uncontradicted testimony cannot be arbitrarily rejected by the court, is subject to the fact that it is not inherently improbable. If there is anything in the testimony which makes it inherently improbable or affecting its accuracy contained in the witness' own statement, or appearing from a consideration of all the surrounding circumstances, then and in that case it is proper to disregard such testimony. 10 Cal. Jur. p. 1145, § 363. We do not find anything in the record indicating that the testimony which we have set forth is inherently improbable, or that the surrounding circumstances of the case, as disclosed by the record, were such as to render any of the testimony incredible or unworthy of belief.

[4] With these considerations in view, do the facts disclosed by the record constitute extreme cruelty, as that term is defined in section 94 of the Civil Code? The fact that the defendant refused to attend to the usual household duties common to people living and occupying their station in life, and such as a right-thinking woman would ordinarily perform, cannot be said, as a matter of law, to constitute cruelty, even though it does tend to impose considerable hardship and additional burdens upon the husband, who is unfortunate enough to be married to a woman having so little regard for the usual wifely duties. Such facts, however, and such failure on the part of the wife to conform to the husband's station in life and to assist him in meeting and solving the usual daily problems of managing a properly conducted household, which present themselves to married people from day to day, may very properly be considered, however, for the purpose of determining the mental attitude of the wife, and whether she did or did not entertain such an attitude toward her husband as might reasonably show that she did not intend to fulfill her marriage obligations, and whether she was seeking elsewhere for either diversion, pleasure, or happiness. In other words such facts may be considered in determining whether all the circumstances disclosed constitute extreme cruelty. There is no allegation of physical pain or suffering inflicted upon the plaintff by the defendant, and the question is simply one of whether the conduct of the wife was reasonably calculated to, and did, cause grievous mental suffering. The testimony shows that the defendant stated to the plaintiff a great many times that she was sorry that she married him; that she wanted to be free, so that she could do what she wanted and go where she pleased; that she was dissatisfied with married life; and, in substance, that she was through with the plaintiff. This testimony alone might or might not show sufficient grounds for a charge of cruelty, depending in large part upon the sensitiveness of the one to whom such remarks were addressed, but there appears something further in this case which we think is in and of itself sufficient to show conduct utterly subversive of the marital relation. No right-thinking man, and we may say no man worthy of the name, would or could be other than agitated, and mentally disturbed by the knowledge of the fact that his wife was receiving endearing letters from other men. The concluding part of the letter is, in and of itself, sufficient to produce great mental agitation and suffering—"With all my love and lots of kisses that I wish were real." It is true that the defendant did not write these words, but when confronted with the letter she simply asked, "What of it?" The letter shows upon its face that it is a reply to one from the wife, in which she must have made statements eliciting the words which we have quoted from the letter signed by the man who calls himself "Dal." Correspondence of the kind to which we have referred is certainly subversive of the purposes of the marital relation as ordinarily understood. We think this testimony, when taken with other facts, to which we have adverted, sufficient to constitute cruelty, as defined by the Civil Code of the state.

The judgment of the trial court is hereby reversed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

In re JOHNSON'S ESTATE. (Civ. 2975.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 14, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 13, 1925.)

1. Wills ⟹53(9)—Fact that will is unnatural may be considered with other evidence of mental unsoundness, in determining mental capacity of testator.

Though person has legal right to make an unnatural will, fact that it is so made may be considered with other evidence of mental unsoundness, in determining mental capacity of the testator.

2. Wills ⟹53(2)—Evidence that testator was mentally incapacitated to make will is not limited to direct evidence of mental condition at time will was made.

Burden is on contestants of will to show mental incapacity of testator at the very time will was executed, but incompetency need not be proved by direct evidence of his mental condition at that time, and nature of disease with which afflicted, his mental condition, acts, and conduct, both before and after execution of will, and terms thereof, may be considered.

3. Wills ⟹55(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that testator was of unsound mind at time he signed will.

Evidence held sufficient to support finding that testator was not of sound mind at time will was signed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Application by F. G. Bremer and another for the probate of will of J. W. Johnson, deceased. From a judgment for contestants Henry Johnson and others, refusing to admit the will to probate, Hattie M. Sligar, beneficiary, appeals. Affirmed.

Ray Manwell and J. E. Ebert, both of Marysville, for appellant.

Arthur Coats, of Yuba City, and W. H Carlin, of Marysville, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. A document purporting to be the last will of the above-named decedent was duly offered for probate. Three of the heirs of decedent duly appeared and filed their opposition to the probate thereof, upon the grounds that the same was not executed by the decedent and that at the time of the purported execution thereof the decedent was not of sound and disposing mind. The contest was tried by the court without a jury. The court found that at the time the instrument was executed the decedent was not of sound and disposing mind. Judgment was entered upon the findings denying probate of the purported will. From this judgment Hattie M. Sligar, one of the beneficiaries under the purported will, has appealed. The only ground urged for a reversal of the judgment is that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding to the effect that the decedent was mentally incompetent to make a will. The provisions of the purported will, material here, are as follows:

"1. I direct my executors, hereinafter named, to convert into money all real and personal property owned by me at the time of my death.

"2. I give, devise and bequeath my entire estate as follows, to wit: To my son, Arthur Johnson, the sum of ten thousand dollars, to my daughter, Lillie Johnson, the sum of ten thousand dollars; to my son, Henry Johnson, the sum of four thousand dollars; to my grandchildren, Clara Burton and Elna Burton children of my deceased daughter, each the sum of ten thousand dollars; to my grandchildren, Dorothy May Johnson and Laura Johnson, children of my said son, Henry Johnson, each the sum of ten thousand dollars; to my friend Hattie M. Sligar, the sum of ten thousand dollars; to my friends W. E. Tucker and A. C. McLaughlin, each the sum of two thousand dollars; and to my friend, Elizabeth Conant, of Marysville, California, the sum of one thousand dollars; and all the rest, residue and remainder of my property I give, devise and bequeath to my said son, Arthur Johnson, and my said daughter, Lillie Johnson, share and share alike.

"3. In the event that my estate, after payment of my just debts, expenses of my last illness and funeral expenses, and the expenses and charges of administration of my estate, should be less than the aggregate of the above bequests then said bequests shall be reduced proportionately."

The evidence bearing upon the mental capacity of the decedent, in addition to the terms of the will itself, consists of the testimony of witnesses as follows:

M. J. Wilcoxon: "I am the warden in the Sutter County Hospital. * * * I have known the testator, J. W. Johnson, all my lifetime, but was never personally acquainted with him. I * * * am one of the subscribing witnesses to the instrument purporting to be his will. The will was executed at the hospital on the 1st day of July, 1922. * * * At that time J. W. Johnson, testator, was of sound and disposing mind. * * * Mr. Johnson arrived at the Sutter County Hospital on June 29th, 1922, in the evening. He was quite sick, and I think he was delirious the first day. On the next day * * * he remained in the hospital in bed. The document * * * was by him signed on the 1st day of July, 1922, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Mr. Johnson * * * remained there until July 5, 1922, when he left. He again returned to the hospital on July 12, 1922, and remained until July 17, 1922, when he again left. During this last time, from July 12th to July 17th, I observed his condition. His mental condition was very bad. I considered him insane. * * * I don't know that I would call him insane, but he seemed to be awful delirious. He wouldn't keep any clothes on himself. He just ran around like a crazy man."

Walter L. Barrett: "I was present at the time the will was executed and the testator, who could neither read nor write, asked me to subscribe his name thereto, and he made his mark in my presence, and I also subscribed his name thereto."

Mrs. Elizabeth Conant, a beneficiary under the will: "I * * * nursed him [testator] from said 30th day of June, 1922, until the 5th day of July of the same year. * * * I saw the testator when he came to the hospital on the 29th day of June. * * *

"Q. On the 30th day of June, what was his physical condition? A. Rather bad. * * * He seemed to have hemorrhages of the bladder, and he had a high temperature at the time, * * * on the evening of the 30th. * * * The first thing he asked me was to call Mr. McLaughlin and I said, 'Don't you think you better wait until morning? It is rather late.' * * * He said, well, that would be all right, and he was restless more or less all night. * * * The first thing in the morning he asked me if I would call Mr. McLaughlin, and I told him I would as soon as breakfast was over, and after breakfast he asked me again if I would call Mr. McLaughlin. He said he was very anxious to see him because he wanted him to fix some papers, and so I called Mr. McLaughlin."

Allen E. Gray: "I am a physician and surgeon. I have known Mr. J. W. Johnson by sight for a long time, but had never known him intimately, except that I had talked to him and examined him once previous to the 29th day of June, 1922. I attended the testator * * * from the time he came to the Sutter County Hospital until the 5th of July. * * * At the time he was brought in, the man was a sick man. He had a running fever. He had no hallucinations or delirium or any signs of insanity at the time, except he was suffering with pain at the time. I would not say he was of unsound mind. I was not treating him for that at all, and did not pay much attention to his conversations that I had with him. For the first few days he was in pain, and was a little delirious the first day that I saw him, the first evening. After that his condition seemed to improve. I talked with him every day that I saw him. I would say that from the 29th day of June until the 5th day of July, 1922, he was in as sound mind as any person under his physical condition that he had at that time. I did not discuss any business matters with him at all."

A. C. McLaughlin, who drafted the will and was named as a beneficiary thereunder: "I have known decedent for over 30 years. I suppose I have rendered favors to Mr. Johnson in his lifetime, but not such as I would call particular favors. I was attorney for his son in a little matter that came up a number of years ago, and he consulted me on various occasions, particularly at that time when he had some one arrested for taking a shot at him. I was called to the hospital on July 1st, at the request of Mr. Johnson, and was informed by Mr. Johnson that he desired to execute his will, and I was then and there informed of the terms and provisions he desired placed therein. * * * I discussed the terms and provisions with the decedent at that time, returned to my office in Yuba City, and prepared the document, * * * and returned with it to the hospital, where the terms and provisions thereof were thoroughly explained to the testator, and it was immediately thereafter duly executed by the testator. * * * At the time of the execution of this will the said decedent was of sound and disposing mind and memory."

Charles Da Kosse: "I have known J. W. Johnson personally for the last 7 years. During said time I have worked for him and frequently talked with him. During the 6 months prior and up to the 1st day of July, 1922, Mr. Johnson frequently came to my home, and we talked together, and during that period there were times when Mr. Johnson acted as if he was not in his right mind, and at other times he would carry on a conversation fairly well."

J. H. Barr: "I am a physician and surgeon. * * * I was one of the physicians who examined Mr. J. W. Johnson concerning his sanity on the 17th day of July, 1922. * * * Possibly I had known Mr. Johnson personally for about 29 years in this vicinity. I frequently saw him and met him. * * * On the 17th day of July, 1922, I found that he was insane, suffering from acute mania, also from paresis, which is a form of softening of the brain, a general gradual breaking down of the brain tissue. * * * We found Mr. Johnson suffering from paresis, and, as far as the period of time is concerned, that would depend altogether on the amount of lesion taking place in the brain. It may be fast, or it may be of long duration, depending on the individual himself, as to how long he is in breaking down. * * * It is quite probable that it existed at that time (July 1st), * * * because that would be very rapid. His physical condition was not bad; it was not poor as it might be. Mr. Johnson had stripped himself, and I was surprised that the physical condition was as good as it was under the mental condition. * * * He was in a maudlin condition. * * * I will say that it could be this mental condition which we found * * * did not exist 2 or 3 weeks before, but it is more than likely that that trouble occurred in not a less period than 2 or 3 weeks, and it gradually came up to this breaking point. That is the shortest period that I gave you and the longest period might extend over 3 or 4 years."

Samuel Gray: "I have known Mr. J. W. Johnson for more than 40 years. * * * We very frequently talked together, on the ranch, in town, and on the roads, and in different places. * * * I saw him July 2, 1922, in the Sutter County Hospital. It was in the evening, and I then considered him of unsound mind. I had with me his cousin, a Mr. Tom Hutchinson, who was here from Iowa for 3 or 4 days. * * * I introduced Mr. Hutchinson to Mr. Johnson, and told him who he was, and asked him if he recognized Johnnie Hutchinson, his cousin, and he said, 'Yes,' and we took chairs alongside of him. * * * Mr. Hutchinson was a grown man. * * * When we sat down, Mr. Johnson said to me, 'Where did you get that boy?' * * * I tried to introduce him again, and told him who he was, and I didn't seem to attract his mind, and he went on talking about something else. * * * He said, 'My head hurts like everything.' * * * He told me that he had made his will, he didn't say when, and he said he left his boys well fixed. I said to him, 'I see by the papers that you sold your ranch,' and he said, 'Yes; I sold the ranch for $120,000, and the papers are all fixed up, and we are going to sign them tomorrow.' * * * I ascertained shortly afterwards the fact that he had not sold his ranch at all."

Thurlow Dowell: "I knew Mr. J. W. Johnson prior to his death for a period of 4 or 5 years. During a period of 6 or 7 months up to the time of his death I saw him often, probably once a week on an average, and talked with him. I usually saw him at my garage in Yuba City, and during that time some days he would be regular and some days irregular, but I don't believe that during any of said time that he was of sound mind. * * * Just before he went to the Sutter County Hospital he gave me the names of a dozen or so men around the courthouse here that he thought were not doing their official capacity, and that they should be removed from office, said he was a Deputy United States Marshal, and was going to have them all taken out. * * * During that period he came to my garage there one day, he was in there, and took the water hose and opened up the front of his shirt, and let the water run there for a period of 3 hours off and on, most all the time on."

Morris Peters: "I knew Mr. J. W. Johnson for a period of approximately 30 years up to the time of his death, * * * and during all that time frequently talked with him and observed his condition. For a period of 1 year prior and up to the 1st day of July, 1922, I did not consider Mr. Johnson of sound mind. At times he would talk rational. During that time a disease came on him along about the 1st day of May, 1922. He would stop at my house 4 or 5 nights a week * * * and talk with me. * * * When he would be at my place talking, he would talk along rationally, and all at once he would cry out, and was going after this fellow and that fellow, and on one occasion he stopped me on the highway * * * and run his automobile in front of me, and I stopped and asked him, 'What is the matter, Billy?' * * * He said, 'I am going to arrest you; * * * run your machine out to the side of the road, and go along with me.' * * * He said, 'I will let you go this time, but I want you tomorrow.' * * * He said, 'There is a fellow I am after, and I am going to get him; I am a United States Marshal now.'"

W. E. Tucker: "I am one of the persons named as beneficiaries in the document offered for probate here. * * * I had some personal dealings with Mr. Johnson, collecting some bills for him and something like that when he was in the butcher business. I have not had much dealings with him in the last 4 or 5 years. Afterwards he would meet me. I would stop and talk and possibly pass the time of the day. There is no blood relation existing between him and me. I did not charge him for collecting bills except one large bill. There were no social relations existing between us. My family did not visit his family."

July 17, 1922, the decedent was adjudged to be insane and committed to the state hospital at Napa, where he died 5 days later. The evidence does not show the value of decedent's estate, but in the petition for the probate of the alleged will the estimated value of the estate is given as $95,000. The bequests aggregate $79,000. The alleged will is drafted upon the theory that the assets of the estate may be insufficient to pay the legacies in full, for it provides that in such case the "bequests shall be reduced proportionately." The evidence does not show that there was any estrangement between the decedent and his children. It does not appear that any of the legatees who were strangers in blood had any claim upon the bounty of decedent, and it affirmatively appears that some of them had no such claim.

[1] Under all the circumstances it clearly appears that the will is unnatural in its provisions. While a person has the legal right to make an unnatural will, the fact that it is so may be considered with other evidence of mental unsoundness in determining the mental capacity of the testator. Estate of Gallo, 61 Cal. App. 163, 175, 214 P. 496, and cases there cited.

[2, 3] The burden was upon contestants to show the mental incapacity of the testator at the very time the will was executed, but this does not mean that his incompetency must be proved by direct evidence of his mental condition at that time. The nature of the disease with which he was afflicted, his mental condition, and his acts and conduct, both before and after the execution of the will, and the terms of the will itself, may all be considered in determining whether he was of sound mind when he signed it. Intimate acquaintances testified that the testator was of unsound mind shortly before and after the day that the instrument was signed. On the day following its execution, he could not be made to understand that his cousin from a distant state was visiting him and in his presence, and within a few days thereafter his mental affliction developed into pronounced and hopeless insanity. In view of all the foregoing facts and circumstances, it cannot be held that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the decedent was not of sound and disposing mind at the time he signed the instrument offered for probate as his will.

The judgment is affirmed.

KELLEY v. CAMERON et al. (Civ. 2878.)

1. Partnership ⟸327(1)—Complaint held to contain allegations entitling plaintiff to relief.

Where plaintiff and defendant agreed to engage in oil filling station business, defendant advancing money to plaintiff to acquire leases on such stations, allegations of complaint, in suit for accounting, that plaintiff was conducting seven service stations, leases of which had been acquired by him when defendant assumed control of such stations, held sufficient as against general demurrer to entitle plaintiff to some relief, independent of their agreement.

2. Partnership ⟸327(1) — Complaint held good as against general demurrer.

Where complaint, in suit for accounting, alleged facts entitling plaintiff to relief from time defendant assumed control of oil filling stations, leases of which had been acquired by plaintiff, it stated a cause of action good as against general demurrer.

3. Pleading ⟸205(2)—General demurrer raised only question as to whether complaint stated cause of action.

General demurrer raised question only as to whether complaint stated cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Franklin Kelley against J. D. Cameron and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with direction to overrule demurrer to petition.

A. M. Drew, of Fresno, and Feemster & Cleary, of Visalia, for appellant.

Russell & Heid, of Tulare, for respondents.

JONES, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff brought this action to obtain an accounting from the defendant J. D. Cameron, who interposed a general demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint, which demurrer was sustained by the court without leave to amend. From the judgment thereupon rendered against the plaintiff, he has appealed.

From the allegations of the amended complaint, it appears that the plaintiff and the defendant Cameron entered into an agreement, the contents of which may be generally stated as follows: That, whereas, the first party (Cameron) was engaged in the business of manufacturing and refining oils and gasolines and of selling said products to wholesale or retail trade, and whereas, the second party (Kelly) desired to engage in the retail oil and gasoline business in the city of Fresno, and desired to operate what are commonly called "filling stations"; and, whereas, the first party had advanced and was about to advance various sums of money to the second party for the purpose of purchasing such stations: It was, therefore, agreed that the first party should advance such sums to the second party as they may mutually agree upon for the purpose of acquiring the lease, stock in trade, business, and good will of service stations in the city of Fresno, for which advancements the second party should execute to the first party his promissory note. The second party should purchase and operate the stations in his own name, without obligating the first party in any way, and, upon securing an assignment of the lease of any filling station, the second party should transfer such lease to the first party; the lease thereupon becoming his absolute property. The second party should operate the stations to the satisfaction of the first party, and should promptly pay all bills or indebtedness incurred in operating the stations; should keep all stock and property used in connection with said stations insured, which insurance should be payable to each of the parties, according to their interest in the property; should keep accurate books of account, which books should be subject to the inspection of the first party at all times; should purchase all gasoline and lubricating oils sold in said stations from the first party. It was further agreed that the first party should not be obligated to pay any loss incurred in the transactions of the business, or to pay any bills of any kind or character contracted by the second party in the transaction thereof.

Plaintiff alleged that, pursuant to this agreement, he acquired five stations in the city of Fresno and in addition thereto "turned over" two stations already owned and operated by him, and commenced and carried on the business of selling at retail gasoline and other automobile supplies furnished by the defendant, at said stations in the name of Kelley Service Stations.

It is alleged that the defendant later refused to be bound by the terms of the agreement and "did assume control of the business of the said Kelley Service Stations, and of the books, papers, and records kept by this plaintiff, under and pursuant to the aforesaid agreement, and demanded of and took from said plaintiff herein * * * the funds received and on hand and in the bank in the name of said Kelley Service Stations and of this plaintiff in the sum of $2,500, and did assume control of said service stations and directed the management thereof;" and further allegations are that, following the breaching of the agreement by the defendant Cameron, he assumed the control of the said service stations and conducted the same jointly with this plaintiff, and directed the management and conduct thereof, and required the men employed to report directly to him, said defendant, and compelled the payment of the funds to him, and took the said funds from plaintiff for his own use and benefit, and in all manner conducted the said business jointly with plaintiff, and the said defendant asserted a right, title, and interest in and to said property leased as aforesaid and in and to the business conducted as "Kelley Service Stations, and in and to the management and control of said business."

There is a further allegation to the effect that plaintiff offered to transfer to the defendant the leases acquired by plaintiff to all of the filling stations, but the defendant rejected said offers, and refused to accept said leases pursuant to the terms of the agreement.

Plaintiff prayed for the appointment of a receiver; for an accounting of all the dealings and transactions under the agreement and of the money received and paid by plaintiff and defendant in relation thereto; for the restraint of the defendant from interfering with the properties, moneys, or effects of the said business; for the sale of the property and business, the payment of the debts and liabilities, and the payment of the surplus, if any, to the parties according to their respective interests; and for general relief.

[1] Respondent contends that "upon the construction of that agreement and the rights and liabilities assumed by the parties thereto depends the decision of the sole question involved in this case." With this contention we do not agree, for, it it be conceded that the agreement did not create such a relationship between the parties as would entitle the appellant to maintain an action for an accounting thereunder, yet the amended complaint does contain allegations which entitle him to relief, even though that relief may not be as extensive as that for which he prays, and which is not dependent upon the construction to be given the agreement. According to these allegations, the plaintiff was conducting seven service stations under the name of Kelley Service Stations, the leases of which stations had been acquired by him, when the defendant assumed the control of the business of said stations, requiring the men employed to report directly to him, compelled the payment of the funds to him, and took the funds for his own use and benefit.

[2, 3] While it must be admitted that there are inconsistent allegations with reference to the action of the defendant in assuming the control of the stations, yet the demurrer interposed by defendant was a general one, and raised the question only as to whether the complaint stated any cause of action. We are of the opinion that facts are alleged at least entitling the appellant to an accounting from the time that the respondent assumed the control of the stations, and, appellant being entitled to that relief, it would follow that the amended complaint does state a cause of action, and was not subject to general demurrer.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to overrule the demurrer.

CRAVEN v. DOMINGUEZ ESTATE CO. et al. (Civ. 4323.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 21, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 20, 1925.)

1. Trusts ⇐11(2)—Trust created by declaration of trust held express trust to sell real property and dispose of proceeds.

Trust created by declaration of trust held an express trust, within Civ. Code, § 863 (unaffected by sections 864–866), to sell real property and dispose of the proceeds of sale pursuant to the terms of the declaration, in view of section 857.

2. Trusts ⇐134—Generally, express trust in realty vests whole estate in trustee, subject only to execution of trust.

Generally an express trust in realty, valid in its creation, vests whole estate in trustee, subject only to the execution of the trust.

3. Trusts ⇐140(1)—Trustee of express trust to sell realty and distribute proceeds has absolute title to trust property, and beneficiary, as against trustee and those claiming under him, has no interest in the land.

Trustee of express trust to sell realty and distribute proceeds has absolute title to trust property, and beneficiary, as against trustee and those claiming under him, has no interest in the land itself, but only in the proceeds thereof.

4. Trusts ⇐147(1)—Attempted transfer by beneficiary of trust property conveyed no interest therein as against trustee or its grantee.

Where a beneficiary conveyed the absolute title in realty to a trustee, under an express trust to sell it and distribute the proceeds according to declaration of trust, an attempted transfer of the trust property by the beneficiary, either in the form of a deed or lease, conveyed no interest in the trust property as against the trustee or its grantee.

5. Trusts ⇐39—Declaration of trust to hold realty for sale and distribution of proceeds held to bind beneficiary and all persons claiming under it.

Declaration of trust, creating express trust to hold realty for the purpose of sale and distribution of the proceeds pursuant to declaration, bound the beneficiary and all persons claiming under it, whether they had actual notice of it or not, where the record title to the land was in the trustee.

6. Trusts ⇐171—Trustee has all authority necessary to carry out objects and purposes of trust.

A trustee has all authority necessary to carry out objects and purposes of trust, even though the instrument creating the trust may not directly confer such power upon him.

7. Trusts ⇐135—Trust to hold realty for purpose of sale and to distribute proceeds pursuant to declaration of trust held not "simple trust" or "dry trust"; "passive trust."

A trust, under which a company held the absolute title to lands for purpose of sale and distribution of proceeds thereof pursuant to the terms of a declaration of trust, the land to be sold through an agent of the trustee, who was invested with discretion of subdividing some of the lots, held more than a "simple" or "dry" trust; a trust being "simple," "passive," or "dry" when the trustee has no active duty to perform, or the trust serves no purpose, or none that would not be equally served without it, the trustee being the mere beneficiary of the record title, charged with no duty and without power to take possession or exercise any control over the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Dry Trust; Passive Trust; Simple Trust.]

8. Trusts ⇐147(1)—Lessee of beneficiary of trust to sell realty held to have acquired no interest in trust property as against trustee or its grantee.

Lessee of a beneficiary of a trust to hold title to realty for the purpose of selling it and to distribute the proceeds held to have acquired no interest in the trust property as against the trustee holding the record title, or its grantee, despite grantee's notice of such lease, in view of Civ. Code, § 865.

9. Trusts ⇐147(1)—Attempted ratification by trustee of realty, of beneficiary's lease, held not to affect interest of grantee of trustee, acquired subsequent to execution of lease, but before attempted ratification.

Where trustee held the legal title to land for the purpose of sale and distribution of the proceeds according to the declaration of trust, trustee's attempted ratification of beneficiary's lease of part of the land to defendant's assignor held not to affect the interest of plaintiff grantee of the trustee, acquired subsequent to the execution of the lease, and with knowledge thereof, but before the trustee attempted to ratify it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Emma E. Craven against the Dominguez Estate Company and others. From an adverse judgment, defendant George F. Carson and others appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Houser, Justice pro tem., did not participate.

Joe Crail and Harold C. Morton, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Goodwin & Morgrage, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. The Dominguez Estate Company, a corporation, was, on the 21st day of March, 1917, the owner of a large tract of land situated in the county of Los Angeles. On that day it executed and delivered a grant deed to all of said real property to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation. This deed was recorded on the day it bore date, and on the same day the Title Insurance & Trust Company executed a declaration of trust, stating that the real property was held in trust, and setting forth the terms of said trust. This declaration of trust was not recorded. On March 20, 1920, and while said land stood of record in the name of the Title Insurance & Trust Company, the Dominguez Estate Company executed an oil and gas lease covering some 140 acres of the same land conveyed to the Title Insurance & Trust Company. This lease was executed in favor of defendant George F. Carson, and was thereafter assigned and transferred to the defendant the Carson Oil Company, and later by said company to the defendant Joe Crail. This lease, however, was not recorded until October 26, 1921. On August 21, 1921, the Title Insurance & Trust Company executed a paper in which it ratified, or attempted to ratify, said oil and gas lease, made as aforesaid by the said Dominguez Estate Company. On April 19, 1920, the Title Insurance & Trust Company executed and delivered to plaintiff a grant deed to about 4 acres of the 140-acre tract covered by the lease in favor of George Carson, and it was stipulated that plaintiff, at the time she acquired this conveyance, had notice of the execution and delivery of the lease by the Dominguez Estate Cmpany to George F. Carson, dated March 20, 1920. Upon this state of facts the trial court gave judgment in plaintiff's favor, quieting her title to the land described in her complaint, being the land described in her deed, and from this judgment the defendants George F. Carson, the Carson Oil Corporation, and Joe Crail have appealed. The Dominguez Estate Company, although made a party defendant in said action and served with process, never appeared therein, and judgment by default was entered against it.

It is appellants' contention: (1) That the trust executed by the Dominguez Estate Company to the Title Insurance & Trust Company was but a dry trust; the beneficiary and trustor, the Dominguez Estate Company, being the real owner, whose conveyance binds the plaintiff, who acquired her interest in said real property from the trustee with notice of the previous lease executed by the trustor and beneficiary. (2) That there was sufficient estate in the trustor and beneficiary to enable it to make a lease in favor of appellants, which lease was binding upon the plaintiff who had notice thereof. (3) That ratification by the trustee of the lease made by the trustor and beneficiary was binding upon the grantee from the trustee; such grantee having had notice of the lease.

The portions of the declaration of trust material to the decision of the questions involved herein are as follows:

"Know all men by these presents: That the Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation, organized under the laws of the state of California, with its principal place of business at Los Angeles, California, hereinafter called the trustee, has received a deed dated March 21, 1917, executed by the Dominguez Estate Company, a corporation, filed for record March 21, 1917, conveying to it that certain real property described as follows, to wit: [Then follows a description of the property.] That whereas, it is understood that the consideration paid for said real property, hereinbefore described, * * * was paid by said Dominguez Estate Company, a corporation, hereinafter sometimes called the beneficiary, no part of said consideration having been paid by said trustee hereinunder." The declaration then recites that a portion of said real property had been subdivided into 5-acre lots under the mutual agreement of the trustee and the beneficiary, and was known as tract No. 3218, and that the remainder of said real property may be subdivided "in such manner as may hereafter be agreed upon by said trustee hereunder, said beneficiary and the agent hereinafter named.

"Now, therefore, said Title Insurance & Trust Company, trustee, hereby certifies and declares that it holds and will hold the real property hereinbefore described * * * in trust under the terms and conditions, and for the uses and purposes set forth in this declaration, namely: [It is then provided that lots in tract No. 3218 might be sold for not less than $2,000 each, and that the balance of said tract might be sold upon such terms and conditions as said trustee might deem best, by lot or lots if subdivided, or by parcel or parcels if not subdivided, and "the sale prices thereof to be not less than those hereinafter to be agreed upon by said trustee, said beneficiary and said agent, to be indicated by schedule or schedules to be filed with said trustee." The proceeds of said lots in tract No. 3218 were to be distributed by said trustee, first, to the payment of the costs, fees, and expenses of said trustee; second, the sum of $1,750 to the beneficiary; third, the balance to H. H. Cotton, the said agent. The proceeds from the sale of the balance of said real property were to be distributed by said trustee, first, to the payment of its costs, fees, and expenses; second, to the said beneficiary "such sum, or sums, and at such times as may hereafter be agreed upon by said Dominguez Estate Company and H. H. Cotton"; third, the balance to the said H. H. Cotton]. H. H. Cotton is appointed agent of the said trustee in making a sale of the real property covered hereby, to collect and disburse all rents (if any) thereof and to generally assume the care and custody of said real property. * * *

"It is distinctly understood that all deeds, contracts of sale, and other instruments affecting the property covered hereby, or any part thereof, shall be executed solely by the said trustee. The costs, fees and expenses of the said trustee hereunder are hereby fixed as follows: [The usual fees for preparing, executing and recording instruments and issuing guarantees showing title are to be paid to said trustee, also the sum of $250 for drawing and executing the declaration of trust; also 2 per cent. of all moneys received and disbursed under the trust, and the sum of $2 for each deed or contract executed by the trustee and a reasonable compensation for any services rendered and not covered by the above fees.]

"This trust shall not cease or terminate in any event until all of the costs, fees and expenses of said trustee hereunder shall have been fully paid. The conditions and provisions hereof shall inure to and bind said trustee, said beneficiary, said agent, their heirs, legatees, devisees, administrators, executors, successors, and assigns."

[1, 2] The trust thus created was an express trust to sell real property and dispose of the proceeds of such sale, and was authorized by the statutes of our state.

"Express trusts may be created for any of the following purposes: 1. To sell and convey real property and to hold or reinvest or apply or dispose of the proceeds in accordance with the instrument creating the trust." Civ. Code, § 857.

As a general rule every express trust in real property, valid as such in its creation, vests the whole estate in the trustee, subject only to the execution of the trust. The beneficiary takes no estate or interest in the property, but may enforce the performance of the trust. Civ. Code, § 863.

[3] Certain exceptions or limitations to this general rule are made by sections 864, 865, and 866 of the Civil Code. The provisions of these sections of the Civil Code, however, have no particular bearing upon the trust under consideration in this action. In our opinion this trust comes within the general rule expressed in section 863. As we have seen, by the terms of this section, the absolute title to the trust property is vested in the trustee, and the only interest the beneficiary has therein is to enforce the trust. As against the trustee and those lawfully claiming under him, the beneficiary has no interest in the property itself, but only in the proceeds thereof after the property has been sold by the trustee. This was so held by the Supreme Court in construing a trust similar to the one before us. In this action the court said:

"It is true that plaintiff has proceeded upon the theory that Waterman [one of the beneficiaries] had, at the time of the attachment, and still has, an equitable interest in that property, and that the claim of Stanford is in the nature of a mortgage upon that equitable interest. * * * But this is a mistaken theory which has run all through the discussion of this case, and led to much confusion. The trust created in Smith [the trustee] is an express trust, under subdivision 1, of section 857, of the Civil Code. It vests in Smith the whole title, legal and equitable. Civ. Code, § 863. By the very terms of the trust, whether we read it as originally written or as revised, Waterman had no interest in the property, and could never acquire any interest, unless he purchased it, as any stranger might do. The only right that any beneficiary under the trust had or has was to share in the proceeds of the rents and profits when realized, and of the sale of the land when sold, and the only remedy that of proceedings to enforce the execution of the trust." Ward v. Waterman, 85 Cal. 488, 506, 24 P. 930, 934.

[4, 5] The beneficiary, the Dominguez Estate Company, therefore, having no interest legal or equitable in the trust property, an attempted transfer thereof by it, either in the form of a deed or lease, as against the trustee or its grantee, would not convey any interest in the trust property. On the other hand, the trustee, being vested with both the legal and equitable title, not only could convey by deed a good title to the trust property, but it is the only person clothed with such power. The parties to the trust in this proceeding did all in their power to make this clear and definite. By reference to the declaration of trust, it will be seen that the very object and purpose of the trust was to give to the trustee the sole power to convey title to the trust property. To carry out this purpose, a grant deed to the property was executed and delivered by the Dominguez Estate Company to the trustee. This deed was absolute in form, and was, on the date of its execution, recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the property is situated. The trustee thereby became the record owner of the absolute title to the property. In the declaration of trust (which is binding upon the beneficiary and all persons claiming under the beneficiary, whether they had actual notice of it or not, for the reason that the record title was in the trustee) it was provided that all deeds, contracts of sale, and other instruments affecting the trust property should be executed solely by the trustee.

[6] A trustee has all the authority necessary to carry out the objects and purposes of the trust. This is true, even though the instrument creating the trust may not directly confer upon him such power. As was said by the court in the case of Morffew v. S. F. & S. R. R. Co., 107 Cal. 587, at page 595, 40 P. 810, 813:

"The quantity of interest which passes to the trustee in case of an express trust is commensurate with the necessities of his office; the trustee shall have an estate in fee, if that is necessary, to enable him to perform the duties imposed upon him, although it is not in terms given to him by the instrument creating the trust; on this principle a devise of lands in trust to sell clothes the trustee with the fee, because necessary to the execution of the trust.

The rule being compendiously stated that the trustee 'will take an estate adequate to the execution of the trust—no more nor less' "—citing Perry on Trusts, § 320; Young v. Bradley, 101 U. S. 787, 25 L. Ed. 1044.

[7] The Title Insurance & Trust Company as trustee, therefore, took an estate in the trust property adequate to the execution of the trust, and, as the trust was to convey an absolute title to the lands and to distribute the proceeds of all sales thereof, it was necessary for it to own and hold the absolute title to the trust property. This was clearly provided for in the instruments executed by the parties and creating the trust. According to the trust, the trustee was to have the care and custody of the real property through H. H. Cotton, its agent. It was to sell the lots in tract No. 3218 and to distribute the proceeds of such sale according to the terms of the declaration of trust. As to the balance of said property, it was invested with the discretion of subdividing the same and selling it in lots, or, without subdivision, to sell it in parcels, and at such prices as might be agreed upon by its agent, the said H. H. Cotton, and the beneficiary, and to distribute the proceeds of said sale. This amounted to far more than a simple or dry trust in the trust property.

"A trust is simple, passive, or dry when the trustee has no active duty to perform, or when the trust serves no purpose, or none that would not be equally served without it; the trustee being the mere depositary of the naked title, charged with no duty and without power to take possession, or manage, or exercise any control over the property." 39 Cyc. 219.

"On the other hand, the creator (of a trust) may, by the provisions of the instrument creating the trust, be divested of an estate or interest in the trust property. Thus where a trust deed creates a valid trust and gives a power of sale to the trustee at the request, and for the benefit of, the beneficiary under the deed, no power of revocation being reserved, no estate in the premises is left in the grantor, which is capable of being transferred." 39 Cyc. 245.

See, also, Marvin v. Smith, 46 N. Y. 571; Kopp v. Gunther, 95 Cal. 63, 30 P. 301; Wilhoit v. Cunningham, 87 Cal. 454, 25 P. 675.

[8] It follows, therefore, that the Dominguez Estate Company had no interest in the trust property which it could transfer by deed or otherwise, and that the appellants acquired no interest in said property adverse to the trustee or its grantee by the lease in favor of the appellant George F. Carson. It is true respondent took her deed with notice of this lease, but, as the lease was taken subject to all of the terms of the trust, the lessee therein acquired thereby no interest in the trust property as against the trustee. Civ. Code, § 865. The lessee would, of course, have no better title as against the grantee of the trustee than he had as against the trustee.

[9] As to the contention of appellants that the subsequent ratification of the lease by the trustee gave it validity as against the trustee and its grantee, we are not able to entirely agree with appellants. Conceding that such ratification was within the power of the trustee, and bound any interest of the trustee in the lands covered by the lease, yet it could affect only such interest in said lands as was held by said trustee at the time of the ratification. The fact of the case, however, is that, at the time said trustee executed the paper purporting to ratify said lease, said trustee had no interest in the property claimed by respondent, as it had conveyed the same to respondent over a year prior to the time of its attempted ratification of said lease. The act of the trustee, therefore, in this regard was but an idle act in so far as respondent's rights in said property were concerned.

In our opinion the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; HOUSER, J.

PEOPLE v. REID. (Cr. 1183.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 11, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⊜706—Prosecuting attorney's request that defendant's counsel produce certain documents held not improper, where willingly produced, and no objection thereto made.

Action of district attorney, in requesting that defendant's counsel produce a certain contract of purchase of furnishings and assignment of lease, held not to have been improper, where no objections were made thereto, and it appeared that defendant was eager to produce documents desired and have them read into evidence.

2. Witnesses ⊜246(1)—Well-established custom for presiding judge to ask witness question to elucidate obscure points.

It is well-established custom for presiding judge to ask questions of any witness for purpose of elucidating points that might otherwise remain obscure.

3. Criminal law ⊜1036(2)—Witnesses ⊜246(1)—Presiding judge within his rights in questioning witnesses to clarify matters, and, no valid objection having been made, defendant cannot complain on appeal.

Presiding judge held to have been well within his rights in asking witnesses questions dealing with figures for purpose of making more clear matters that had previously been subject of testimony, but in any event, defendant having offered no valid objection, cannot complain on appeal.

4. False pretenses ⊜44—Testimony that defendant rented apartment without charge held properly admitted on question of misrepresentation as to occupancy by bona fide tenants.

It being alleged that defendant, in selling lease to apartment house, represented that two vacant apartments were rented by bona fide tenants and deposits made thereon, held that testimony that defendant had permitted certain persons to occupy apartment free of rent was relevant and material and properly admitted.

5. False pretenses ⊜44 — Assignment of lease by defendant held pertinent on question of defendant's alleged representation of ownership thereof.

In prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, based partly on alleged misrepresentations as to ownership of lease sold by defendant, evidence as to assignment of lease by defendant to another prior thereto and release of garnishment in reliance thereon, and payment of rent to assignee, held properly admitted as being pertinent to representation of ownership.

6. False pretenses ⊜44—Testimony as to ownership of furniture held pertinent on question of false representations by defendant that it was clear of any lien.

In prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, based partly on alleged misrepresentation of unincumbered ownership of certain furniture sold by defendant, testimony that defendant purchased furniture under installment plan, and that title to most of it was in another, held pertinent and properly admitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Robert H. Reid was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; HOUSER, Justice pro tem., not participating.

Mulligan & Ryzek, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. In this case the defendants Robert H. Reid and Izeyl W. Reid, his wife, were charged by an information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county with the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses.

The allegations of misrepresentation as set forth in the information may be briefly summarized as follows: First, that defendants represented that they were the owners of a certain lease on an apartment house in the city of Los Angeles, which lease was free from any lien or incumbrance, and that the said defendants had the legal right to sell and assign said lease; second, that they were the owners of the furniture and furnishings situate in the apartment house in question, free from any lien or mortgage; third, that, during the occupancy of the apartment house by the defendants under said lease, the several apartments had at all times been rented and occupied by the permanent guests, with the exception that at the time of the negotiations between the defendants and the complaining witness two of the apartments were temporarily unoccupied, but that deposits had been made upon these two vacant apartments by prospective tenants; fourth, that all the tenants who were then occupying the apartments were permanent tenants; fifth, that the apartments had been and then were producing a total cash rental of $940 per month.

The information then proceeds to allege that each and all of the foregoing representations were false and untrue, and were made by the defendants and each of them to the complaining witness, knowing such representations to be false and untrue, and made for the purpose of inducing the complaining witness to purchase the lease and furnishings, and by reason thereof the defendants obtained from the complaining witness the purchase price by false representations.

Upon the trial, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty as to the defendant Izeyl W. Reid, and a verdict of guilty against her husband and codefendant, Robert H. Reid. Defendant Robert H. Reid now appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial and from the judgment of the court.

The defendant, in urging his appeal, does not contend that there is not sufficient evidence to support the verdict of guilty, but contents himself with urging three grounds of error occurring during the trial: First, certain misconduct on the part of the district attorney during the course of the trial; second, errors committed by the court in examining certain witnesses; and third, errors committed by the court in admitting certain evidence.

It appears from the evidence in the case that the defendant Robert H. Reid and his wife were in possession of a certain apartment house situate in the city of Los Angeles, together with the furnishings therein contained. The defendants, desiring to sell their lease and furnishings, listed the same with a real estate agent, and, as a result of such listing, the complaining witness entered into negotiations with the defendants for the purchase of the lease and furnishings. The complaining witness testified to several conversations had with the defendants, during which the alleged misrepresentations were made by the defendants, and that she, the complaining witness, believing these representations to be true, and, relying upon them, entered into a contract for the purchase of the lease and furnishings, and on April 1st consummated the negotiations by delivery of the contract, payment of the money and entry into possession of the leased premises and furnishings.

Subsequently she testified that she discovered that the defendants did not own any of the furnishings, and that certain parts of the furnishings, consisting of the linoleum and the stoves, belonged to the owner of the building, while title to practically all of the remaining furnishings was in the Morris Plan Bank. Also that the tenants occupying the premises were not permanent tenants; that the two apartments that were alleged to have been rented and deposits made thereon were not rented at all; that the other tenants were not permanent tenants, but temporary tenants; that the apartments had not been producing, and were not producing $940 per month, but only $885 per month; and that at no time during the occupancy of the premises by the defendants had all of the apartments been occupied by tenants.

[1] As to the first allegation of error, that of misconduct of the district attorney, this contention is predicated upon the request or alleged demand made by the district attorney in the presence of the jury upon defendant's counsel for a certain contract of purchase of certain furnishings, and also for a certain assignment of the lease of the apartments. It is the contention of defendant that the making of such request in the presence of the jury was prejudicial error, in that it violated the rule that the defendant shall not be compelled to testify against himself. It appears from the transcript that when Leo J. Neeson, a witness for the people and an employé of the Broadway Department Store, was on the witness stand, he was questioned with regard to a certain contract between the Broadway Department Store and the defendant relating to certain furniture and furnishings sold by the Broadway Department Store, and which constituted a part of the furnishings in the apartment house. After the witness had been interrogated as to the nature of the furniture and furnishings in question, he was asked if he had the contract in his possession. Upon his replying that he did not, that it was his understanding that it had been delivered to the defendant Reid, the court asked if Mr. Reid had the contract in court, and the attorney for Mr. Reid replied that they would make search for it during the noon hour; whereupon the district attorney made a request that the contract be produced. Thereupon the defendant's attorney replied:

"We will be glad to produce it, if we have it."

Upon reconvening of the court after the noon recess, the defendant's attorney produced the contract and delivered it to the district attorney, and the district attorney remarked:

"I wish, your honor, the record to show that counsel, Mr. Mulligan, is now delivering the contract to me."

After its identification by the witness on the stand, it was offered in evidence; whereupon the defendant's attorney remarked:

"The only thing about that is this: I don't think it is material, although we can't have any special objection to it, excepting the question of the materiality."

It will be noted from the foregoing that neither the defendant nor his counsel at any time made any objection to the request of the district attorney or the suggestion of the court that the lease contract in question be produced. In fact, the only reasonable construction that can be placed upon the language used during the episode, and particularly upon the language used by counsel for the defendant, is that the defendant was ready and willing, yes and even desirous of having the contract in question offered in evidence.

On another occasion a witness on behalf of the people, one G. Allen Mason, was on the stand. It appears that he is a brother-in-law of the defendant Reid. There was evidence in the case that on or about the 1st of February, previous to the sale of the lease and furnishings, both the defendant Reid and the witness Mason made the assertion that Reid had assigned the lease in question to Mason and that Mason was then the owner of the lease. There was also testimony from one of the tenants in the apartment house, Mrs. Muller, that defendant Reid had told her that he had assigned and transferred the lease to his brother-in-law (Mason) and that she (Mrs. Muller) should pay her rent to Mason, that, in accordance with such instruction, Mrs. Muller did pay the rent for the months of February, March, and April to Mr. Mason, and there is evidence, in addition to Mrs. Muller's statement, that Mason received these checks for the rentals of this apartment.

It also appears from the evidence in the case that the furniture in the apartments in question was sold early in July, following the sale of the lease and furnishings to the complaining witness, and that the sale was made by the witness Mason under an assignment which he claims to have had from his brother-in-law (the defendant) of the furniture in the apartment. All of these matters were pertinent to the issues in the case; and, when the witness Mason was on the stand, he was asked by the district attorney if he had in his possession the assignment made to him by the defendant and concerning which there had been testimony. The witness replied that he did not have the assignment, that it was in the hands of the lawyers; whereupon the district attorney inquired of the attorneys for the defendant if he might have the assignment, and one of the attorneys for the defendant replied: "I have the pleasure of handing it to you." The assignment in question was identified by the witness on the stand, and, when the district attorney offered it in evidence, one of the attorneys for the defendant remarked:

"We will consent to it. We were going to put it in ourselves, and it will save us the trouble; and we will ask counsel to read it to the jury, and the date of it."

It will be noted from the foregoing excerpts from the transcript that in neither instance was there any compulsion exercised in securing the lease contract for the furniture, or the assignment. The assignment, it appears, was in the possession of one of the defendant's attorneys, and for the purpose of the consideration of the question we may consider it in the hands of the defendant himself. There was absolutely no objection offered by defendant's counsel when the inquiry was made by the district attorney as to the whereabouts of the two documents in question, or when the request was made by the district attorney of defendant's counsel for their production. Moreover, it clearly appears from the replies made by defendant's counsel to the queries and request of the district attorney and the suggestion of the court that the defendant was quite willing and even eager to produce the documents desired and have them read into evidence.

Upon this point counsel for defendant have indulged in extended quotations and arguments in support of the general proposition that a defendant cannot be compelled to testify or to furnish evidence against himself. The evidence, however, clearly shows that the defendant does not come within that rule, inasmuch as, through his counsel, he voluntarily and really eagerly presented the documents himself. In the light of the view which we take of the evidence on this point, it is unnecessary for us to consider, or even discuss, the authorities cited by the defendant on this point, except perchance to say that, in all of the cases cited, it appears that the person from whom the document was requested or evidence sought, or his counsel, made vigorous objection to the request or demand.

[2, 3] The second ground urged for reversal is based upon the assertion that substantial error was committed by the court when the court asked questions of certain witnesses. It does not appear from counsel's contention on this point that the questions asked by the court were incompetent or immaterial, or, in themselves, improper; but defendant seems to be aggrieved because of the fact that the court saw fit to ask any questions at all. It is a well-established custom, supported by both reason and practice, for the judge presiding at a trial, from time to time to ask questions of any witness that may be on the stand, for the purpose of elucidating or making clear any points that might otherwise remain obscure. We have carefully examined the record in this case, and it appears clearly that most of the questions asked by the court had to do with figures, as, for instance, the different amounts paid at different times, and also as to dates. Manifestly, the purpose in all of the questions was to make more clear matters that had previously been the subject of testimony, and, as frequently occurs, in dealing with figures a confusion often arises and the real bearing of the figures is not made clear. Furthermore, there was no valid objection made by counsel for the defendant at any time during the questioning by the court. It is true, at one place, counsel for the defendant does make the statement that, "for the purpose of the record, we wish to object to the court questioning the witness"; but no ground of objection was made and, under the well-established rule, the objection had no force. Hence, not only, in our opinion, was the court well within its rights in propounding the questions which were asked of the witnesses, but there being no valid objection offered, the defendant cannot now be heard to complain.

[4] The third specification of error has to do with the introduction of certain evidence. The witnesses Lon A. Schimpf and his wife, Irene Schimpf, were permitted to testify to the circumstances under which they entered into and occupied one of the apartments. It appears that on or about the 3d day of April the Schimpfs moved into one of the apartments that was not occupied at the time that the complaining witness took over the apartments, but which, according to the testimony of the complaining witness, the defendant represented to her had been leased and a deposit made thereon. The Schimpfs both testified that, a day or two before they moved into the apartment, the defendant, through a mutual acquaintance, had proposed to them that they come over and occupy one of the apartments while he and his wife were temporarily absent, which absence was necessary on account of the ill health of his wife; that the defendant stated to them that there would be no financial obligation on their part, except to pay for the gas and electricity used by them—in other words, they were to have the apartment free of rent for the period of a month—that, pursuant to this invitation, the Schimpfs moved into the apartment on April 3d and remained there for one month.

They further testified that they made no payment for rental, and that they had not signed any check in payment of the rental. There was evidence in the case that, several days after the complaining witness had moved into the apartment house, the defendant came to her with several checks which purported to be payments by tenants for the April rentals, and that among these checks was one for $110 which purported to be the April rental from the Schimpfs for the apartment occupied by them. There is some conflict in the testimony as to whether this check was signed by Mr. Schimpf or not. Mr. Schimpf positively denies that he signed such a check, and there would appear to be no motive on his part to deny the writing of the check if he had given it. The Schimpfs further testified that when they moved into the apartment the defendant gave to them a receipt which purported to show that the Schimpfs had paid rental for the month of April for the apartment. The understanding on the part of the Schimpfs in receiving the receipt was that it might be necesary to show that they had paid their rent if any one should raise the question. Defendant urges that error was committed by the court in permitting this testimony, as all of the circumstances testified to occurred after April 1st, and that only circumstances involving the representations made prior to April 1st and which were made as inducements to the complaining witness to enter into the contract in question were competent and material.

It will be kept in mind that one of the alleged misrepresentations set forth in the information was that the defendant represented the two vacant apartments as having been rented by bona fide tenants and deposits made thereon. Inasmuch as the Schimpfs appeared and occupied one of these apartments, it was a pertinent question as to whether or not they were bona fide tenants as represented by the defendant. It was a proper question for the jury to determine whether the Schimpfs' occupation of the apartment for the month of April was a subterfuge or not. Manifestly the Schimpfs were not bona fide tenants.

[5] The defendant also contends that the court erred in permitting the witness William Jennings Bryan, Jr., to testify concerning a certain civil action in which the defendant here was made a defendant, and out of which certain garnishments were issued and levied upon tenants occupying the apartments in question. That action was filed about February 1st, previous to the time when the complaining witness purchased the apartments. The witness Bryan was allowed to testify, over the objection of the defendant, as to certain conversations he had relative to the ownership of the lease covering the apartments. These conversations, it appears, occurred early in February, and were had with the defendant, and one conversation with the defendant's brother-in-law, G. Allen Mason. The witness Bryan testified that, acting as attorney for a Hollywood bank which was a creditor of the defendant, he had brought the action and levied garnishments on the tenants in the apartments on the theory that the lease belonged to the defendant here; that, immediately following the levying of the garnishments, the defendant appeared in his office and asserted that he was not the owner of the apartments; that the lease belonged to Mr. Mason, and urged that the garnishments be released so that Mr. Mason could collect the rentals from the tenants. The witness Bryan further testified that subsequently Mr. Mason appeared at his office, in company with the defendant, and made the assertion that he was the owner of the lease and entitled to collect the rents. Relying upon these assertions that Mason was the owner of the apartments, the witness Bryan testified that he caused the garnishments to be released. Manifestly this testimony went directly to the question of the ownership of the lease in question, and this testimony, together with the testimony of Mrs. Muller, a tenant of one of the apartments, that she had paid the rent for her apartment for the months of February, March, and April to Mr. Mason, and made these payments upon the direction of the defendant, he (the defendant) informing her that Mason was the owner of the lease, is clearly pertinent to the alleged representation of ownership.

[6] Another specification of alleged error relates to the testimony of the witnesses Sprague, Morrison, and Alton with reference to the ownership of the furniture and furnishings in the apartments. From the testimony of these witnesses, it appears that a large portion of the furniture situate in the apartment house was purchased in October, 1923, from the Moneta Furniture Company and the Morrison Furniture Company. The purchases were made on contract which provided for installment payments. Some time prior to April 1, 1924, an arrangement was made whereby the Morris Plan Bank took over the obligation of the defendant for the payment of the balance due on the furniture, and as a part of that transaction, what in effect was a bill of sale was made of the furniture to the Morris Plan Bank. According to the testimony of these witnesses, on April 1st, and immediately prior thereto, and during the period of the negotiations between the defendant and the complaining witness which led up to the sale, the title to most of the furniture in question was in the Morris Plan Bank. This testimony was pertinent to the question as to whether or not the defendant did own the furniture free and clear of any lien, as he claimed, if the jury believed that he made the representation.

It furthermore appears from the testimony in the case that subsequently, payments being in default on account of the contract with the Morris Plan Bank, steps were taken, which, early in July, resulted in the sale and removal of the furniture from the apartment house. These proceedings had their foundation in the contract and bill of sale which had been executed by the defendant to the Morris Plan Bank.

We have covered all of the points urged by counsel for the defendant on behalf of his appeal. It might be further added that we have carefully read the voluminous transcript of the record, and feel that the evidence is abundantly sufficient to support the verdict.

For the foregoing reasons, the order and the judgment appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

PEOPLE ex rel. GOODELL v. GARRETT.
(Civ. 5000.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 27, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 25, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃102—Order sustaining demurrer is not appealable, hence appeal therefrom will be dismissed.

Order sustaining demurrer to complaint in quo warranto, is not appealable, hence appeal therefrom will be dismissed.

2. Quo warranto ⊂⊃33—Attorney General may, upon information of private party, institute proceeding in name of people to settle title to public office.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 803, Attorney General may, upon complaint or information of private party, institute proceeding in name of people to settle title to public office.

3. Officers ⊂⊃55(2)—Office, incumbent of which is elected or accepts appointment to, another public office, becomes vacant immediately, if two offices are incompatible.

Where an individual is an incumbent of a public office, and during such incumbency is appointed or elected to another public office and enters upon the duties of the latter, the first office becomes vacant at once, if the two offices are incompatible.

4. Officers ⊂⊃55(2)—Office of justice of the peace held to become vacant upon acceptance by incumbent of appointment to "police judge."

In view of public policy exhibited in Pol. Code, § 4014 (read in connection with section 4428), and in Const. art. 4, § 20, office of justice of the peace of Santa Monica township held to become vacant upon acceptance by incumbent thereof, of appointment as "police judge" of the city of Santa Monica, operating under freeholders' charter (St. 1915, p. 1724), notwithstanding inhabitants never availed themselves of the two township justices of the peace to which they were entitled under Pol. Code, § 4014; a "police judge" whose eligibility to and duties of which office are therein prescribed and St. 1907, pp. 1043, 1044, art. 14, §§ 3—5, 10, and generally in Code Civ. Proc. § 103, being sometimes known as a city justice of the peace as contradistinguished from a township justice of the peace.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Proceeding in quo warranto by the People, on the relation of Thomas Henry Goodell, against W. R. Garrett. From an order sustaining defendant's demurrer, and from a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Appeal from order dismissed, and judgment reversed, with directions.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; SHENK, J., dissenting.

Shapleigh, all of Santa Monica, C. E. Salisbury and Alfred Black, Sr., both of Los Angeles, and N. D. Miller and A. E. O'Flaherty, both of Santa Monica, amici curiæ.

WORKS, J. This is a proceeding in quo warranto instituted for the purpose of testing the right of defendant to hold the office of justice of the peace. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment went for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the order sustaining the demurrer and from the judgment.

[1] The order sustaining the demurrer is not an appealable one. The appeal from the order must therefore be dismissed.

The complaint alleges that respondent was elected a justice of the peace of Santa Monica township, in Los Angeles county, in November, 1922, and that he qualified as such justice on January 4, 1923; that at all times since the date last mentioned he has been such justice except as in the complaint later alleged; that Santa Monica township is a judicial township, created under the Constitution and laws of the state; that the city of Santa Monica is a municipal corporation, operating under a freeholders' charter adopted and ratified as provided in the Constitution; that the freeholders' charter of the city of Santa Monica provides for a police judge; that the civil jurisdiction of the police court of Santa Monica is coextensive with that of the Santa Monica township court, but that the former has "exclusive jurisdiction over all high grade misdemeanors as provided by law"; that on April 21, 1924, a vacancy, having arisen in the said office of police judge, by the death of the incumbent theretofore exercising the duties of the office, respondent was appointed police judge to fill such vacancy; and that respondent accepted said appointment, thereafter qualified as such police judge and has ever since acted as such. The complaint contains other allegations, but with the view which we entertain of the law as applied to those already set forth, there is no necessity for referring to other averments of the pleading. The prayer is that it be decreed that respondent unlawfully holds the office of justice of the peace, that the office be adjudged to be vacant, and for general relief.

[2] It is contended by the friends of the court—and several authorities are cited to support the contention—that: "No private citizen has any right to compel an officer to show title (to an office) until he has shown his own right in the first place to attack it" (Vrooman v. Michie, 69 Mich. 42, 36 N. W. 749), and that therefore the complaint is insufficient. The case from which the language of the point is taken was one in which a relator claimed title to an office as a holdover, because of an alleged defect in the title of the defendant, or respondent, whom he sought to displace. No such claim is made here. The relator in the present instance cuts no figure in the litigation, evidently, except as an informant to the Attorney General, who institutes the proceeding in the name of the people for the purpose of settling a question in which the public appears to have an interest. At any rate, the complaint will bear no other construction. Such an action is provided for by the terms of section 803 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the enactment is by express provision made mandatory upon the Attorney General whenever a proper case is shown him. While the name of this officer of the state is not upon the briefs on this appeal, it is appended to the copy of the complaint which appears in the record brought up from the trial court. The point made seems therefore to have no application here. Lamb v. Webb, 151 Cal. 451, 91 P. 102, 646, has no bearing upon the present case.

[3, 4] The rule is settled with unanimity that where an individual is an incumbent of a public office and, during such incumbency, is appointed or elected to another public office, and enters upon the duties of the latter, the first office becomes at once vacant if the two are incompatible (Mechem, Public Officers, § 419; 22 R. C. L. tit. "Public Officers," § 63). It is contended by appellant that the two offices now held by respondent are incompatible, and that under the rule stated he is an interloper in the first office entered by him, that of justice of the peace, because of his occupancy of the second office, that of police judge. The question whether the two positions are incompatible is the question of moment to be determined on the appeal.

The doctrine arising from attempts by single individuals to exercise the functions of incompatible offices springs out of considerations of public policy (Mechem, Public Officers, § 422; 22 R. C. L. tit. "Public Officers," § 55; Bryan v. Cattell, 15 Iowa, 538; State v. Buttz, 9 S. C. 156; State v. Jones, 130 Wis. 572, 110 N. W. 431, 8 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1107, 118 Am. St. Rep. 1042, 10 Ann. Cas. 696; State v. Wait, 92 Neb. 313, 138 N. W. 159, 43 L. R. A. [N. S.] 282; State v. Wittmer, 50 Mont. 22, 144 P. 648), such considerations arising naturally from the view that two offices cannot be held by one person when, from the divergent character of the offices, the public interest will suffer thereby. In a leading case, which deals with the doctrine, the following dogmatic and apparently exclusive language is employed:

"Incompatibility between two offices, is an inconsistency in the functions of the two; as judge and clerk of the same court—officer who presents his personal account subject to audit, and officer whose duty it is to audit it. The case of Bryant (4 T. R. 715, and 5 Id. 509), cited by appellant, does not conflict with this view. It was decided upon the meaning of the particular statute, which required the personal presence of the officer at the prison. Where one office is not subordinate to the other, nor the relations of the one to the other such as are inconsistent and repugnant, there is not that incompatibility from which the law declares that the acceptance of the one is the vacation of the other. The force of the word, in its application to this matter is, that from the nature and relations to each other, of the two places, they ought not to be held by the same person, from the contrariety and antagonism which would result in the attempt by one person to faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of one, toward the incumbent of the other. Thus, a man may not be landlord and tenant of the same premises. He may be landlord of one farm and tenant of another, though he may not at the same hour be able to do the duty of each relation. The offices must subordinate, one the other, and they must, per se, have the right to interfere, one with the other, before they are incompatible at common law." People v. Green, 58 N. Y. 295, 304.

It is not meant by this decided language that offices will not be incompatible unless they fit or come within some expression contained in the language quoted.

"It is extremely difficult to lay down any clear and comprehensive rule as to what constitutes incompatible offices." 22 R. C. L. tit. "Public Officers," § 55.

"It seems to be supposed that, in order to render two offices incompatible, there must be some such relation between them as that of master and servant—that the one must have 'controlment of the other,' or that the one must be charged with the duty of auditing or supervising the accounts of the other, or that the one must be chosen by or have the power of removal over the other. Now, while authorities have been cited to show that offices bearing such relations to each other have been held to be incompatible, they merely afford instances of incompatible offices, and do not furnish, nor do they pretend to furnish, definitions; and therefore it does not by any means follow that these are all the instances in which offices can be said to be incompatible. For example, the case of Rex v. Jones, 1 B. & Adol. 677 (20 E. C. L. R. 467), is cited apparently for the purpose of introducing what is called 'a definition' of incompatible offices by Lord Tenterden. But it is apparent, not only from the context, but from the very phraseology quoted, that his remark was not intended as a definition but merely as an instance or an illustration of what would be incompatible offices." State v. Buttz, supra.

These expressions of the South Carolina court and others of a like character, which are to be found in the opinion from which the quotation is taken, apply as well to People v. Green, supra, as they do to Rex v. Jones. It is evident from this circumstance, as well as from the general nature of the subject involved, that the New York court intended merely to specify particular situations which would stamp two offices, when considered together, with the quality of incompatibility, not that the situations named by the court furnished an all-inclusive guide for the ascertainment of incompatibility. The relationship between offices, which will lead to a judicial determination that they are incompatible, and cannot therefore be held by one person, will always appear when, to quote from a standard text-book:

"The nature and duties of the two offices are such as to render it improper, from consideration of public policy, for one incumbent to retain both." Dillon, Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 419.

The nature and the duties of two offices, asserted to be incompatible, may be found, as a matter of course, in legislative enactment or constitutional provision. For example, the Constitution of Indiana either provides, or formerly did provide, that no man may hold two lucrative offices, either state or national, at the same time (Foltz v. Kerlin, 105 Ind. 221, 4 N. E. 439, 5 N. E. 672, 55 Am. St. Rep. 197), and the organic law of Texas inhibits the holding by one person at one time of more than one office of emolument (Odem v. Independent School Dist. [Tex. Civ. App.] 234 S. W. 1090). Our own Constitution provides (article 4, § 20):

"No person holding any lucrative office under the United States, or any other power, shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this state."

Many inhibitions of a kindred character are to be found in the Constitutions and statutes of the various states. Leaving such positive declarations, it is obvious that less direct provisions may be found in legislative enactments, necessarily to be construed as so operating as to prevent the holding of a plurality of offices by one and the same individual. In other words, the public policy which dictates that two offices should not be held by the same person may be ascertained from statutes the effect of which is to render such offices incompatible. State v. Anderson, 155 Iowa, 271, 136 N. W. 128, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 523; Howard v. Harrington, 114 Me. 443, 96 A. 769, L. R. A. 1917A, 211.

With this introduction we proceed to inquire into the expressions of the legislative will concerning the two offices which are in question here. The officer to whom we have heretofore referred as a police judge is sometimes known in the legislative parlance of the state as a city justice of the peace, as contradistinguished from a township justice of the peace, the latter office being that to which respondent had been elected before he accepted an appointment as "police judge," and of which he has been performing the duties since such appointment, despite the objections of appellant as to his right so to do. City justices of the peace (police judges) can be selected, under the general law, only from that class of persons who have been admitted to practice law. Code Civ. Proc. § 103. The same test of eligibility is found in the freeholders' charter of the city of Santa Monica. Stats. 1915, p. 1724. No such requirement applies to township justices of the peace. It is required by the freeholders' charter that all elective officers of the city of Santa Monica, among which is the "police judge," shall have resided in the city continuously one year next preceding their election. Stats. 1915, p. 1724. The law contains no provision as to the place of residence of one who would become a township justice of the peace. It is provided in the freeholders' charter of the city of Santa Monica that the police court of the municipality shall have exclusive jurisdiction of criminal proceedings for the violation of city ordinances, of all civil actions and proceedings arising out of such violation, and for the collection of any license required by ordinance, except when jurisdiction exists in other courts under the Constitution. Stats. 1907, p. 1043, art. 14, § 3. By the charter the tribunal is also given exclusive jurisdiction of certain public offenses against the statutes of the state, when not prosecuted under indictment or information (Id. p. 1044, art. 14, § 4), and it is given concurrent jurisdiction with the justice court of Santa Monica township of civil cases arising in the city which would be cognizable under the law by the justice court. Id. § 5. By the organic law of the city, the police court is required always to be open for the transaction of business, except on legal holidays. Id. § 10. No such provision of law exists as applied to township justice courts. The foregoing will exhibit some of the differences between the two tribunals over which respondent now presides, and it must be admitted that under the many authorities bearing upon the subject they probably furnish little, if any, weight in impelling to the view that the two offices are not compatible.

There is, however, one enactment which in our view is of controlling moment in a determination of the question before us. Section 4014 of the Political Code provides, in part, italics, of course being ours:

"The officers of a township are, two justices of the peace, * * * and such subordinate officers as are provided by law. In townships containing cities, or parts of cities, of the second, third, fourth, or fifth class, in which city justices (police judges) or recorders are elected or appointed, there shall be but one justice of the peace."

It is conceded in the briefs that these provisions apply to Santa Monica township. To our minds they appear to be plain in their application and to require but little comment. They import to us that the people of Santa Monica, speaking of the place as both a city and a township, are entitled, but for the interposition of the freeholders' charter, to two officers known as township justices of the peace, not to two township justice courts which might be presided over by one and the same person. This view, if not plain from what has been quoted from the section, is rendered impregnable by reference to a provision of the enactment which follows soon after the portion above set forth. The provision alluded to reads that "in townships containing cities of the first and one-half class there shall be four justices of the peace." Could these four justices be one person? If they could not, how could the two which are provided for townships like Santa Monica be one person? If the four could be one and the two could be one, what sense is there in the enactment? What efficient administration of justice is by the law then provided for townships of differing populations, classification, of course, being made according to population? The answers to all these questions seem obvious. Then to the next step: It appears certain that section 4014 intends that, when a police judge is to be appointed in a city like Santa Monica, he is to take the place in the scheme of things of one of the township justices of the peace. It appears to us idle, under the language of section 4014, to suppose that, having been entitled to two officers, two township justices, before the adoption of a charter providing for a police judge, the people of Santa Monica must be satisfied under the law with one officer exercising two offices after the adoption of the charter. It appears to us that the provisions of section 4014 exhibit a public policy which is violated by the attempted retention of both offices by respondent. In our opinion, the two offices are incompatible. Not only do we entertain that view upon a reading of section 4014, but it is supported by State v. Hadley, 7 Wis. 700, and by State v. Anderson, supra. The office of township justice, now being attempted to be exercised by respondent, is therefore vacant under the law.

Our attention is called by respondent to the fact that the people of Santa Monica never availed themselves of the provision of section 4014 allowing them two township justices of the peace, and that there never has been in the township more than one such justice. This circumstance boots nothing in an endeavor to ascertain the meaning of the law. The question here involved is purely one of statutory construction, and that question cannot be affected by the mere fact that the statute has not been put to its full use. There the section is. The question is, merely, what does it mean?

Section 4428 of the Political Code provides that when a police judge is disqualified, ill or absent from the city of his jurisdiction he may "by written request call in any justice of the peace of the same county to act in his place and stead." It is contended by the friends of the court that this language indicates a legislative intent that a person, who is a justice of the peace, may at the same time take a police judgeship and permanently hold both posts. We cannot follow our friends in this contention. The section must be read in connection with section 4014 of the same Code, which we have already construed. Section 4428 means only that, despite the provisions of section 4014, a justice of the peace may temporarily occupy the bench of a police judge, to the end that the administration of justice may not be impeded by the disqualification, illness or absence of the incumbent magistrate. Exactly this view of the law, under similar circumstances, is taken in at least one case (In re Corum, 62 Kan. 271, 62 P. 661, 84 Am. St. Rep. 382). The section in no way casts light upon the question before us.

The judgment must be reversed, but, under the circumstances of the case, we cannot direct the trial court to overrule the demurrer to the complaint. The demurrer was both general and special, and it is stated in the briefs that the court sustained it upon the theory that the general demurrer was good, without reference to the special demurrer. This situation is also indicated by the court's refusal to permit an admendment of the complaint. The question, as to the integrity of the complaint, when tested by the special demurrer, has not been argued in the briefs, and we have not, of course, considered it. The special demurrer may be good or it may not. If it is good, the complaint doubtless may be perfected by amendment. All we decide is that the pleading states a cause of action.

The appeal from the order sustaining the demurrer is dismissed. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to proceed with the action in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

72 Cal. App. 468

RILEY et al. v. BROWN. (Civ. 4384.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 29, 1925.)

1. Evidence ⊜70—Presumption of correctness does not attach to entries in private books of one of partners.

Presumption of correctness, which, as between partners, attaches to entries in partnership books to which all partners have access, does not attach to entries in private books of one of partners, which entries must be established by extrinsic proof.

2. Partnership ⊜332—Stipulations ⊜14(11)—Stipulation and order for accounting of partnership held to include all account books kept by defendant.

In action for dissolution of partnership and an accounting, stipulation and order, for reference to accountant, of all books kept by defendant to take an account therefrom, held to include all account books kept by defendant.

3. Appeal and error ⊜883—Stipulation, referring all books kept by liquidating partner to accountant to take account, held no ground for complaint by plaintiff on appeal.

In suit for dissolution of partnership and an accounting, both parties having expressly stipulated to refer all books kept by liquidating partner to an accountant to take an account therefrom, and reference having been made and account taken, it was too late on appeal for plaintiff to complain thereof.

4. Partnership ⊜333—Liquidating partner held entitled to credit for disbursements made from his personal funds while liquidating partnership affairs.

Liquidating partner was entitled to be credited with disbursements made by him from his own personal funds while engaged in liquidating affairs of partnership, though they were made after expiration of time during which partnership was to continue and after action for an accounting was commenced.

5. Evidence ⊜376(12)—Generally, entries of disbursements made by liquidating partner during liquidation in books kept by him are not admissible in his favor, as against copartners.

Though a liquidating partner is entitled to be credited with disbursements made by him during liquidation, entries of such disbursements in books kept by him, within his possession and under his sole control, and to which his partners have no access, are not generally admissible in his favor, as against his copartners.

6. Stipulations ⊜18(6)—Partners could not object to use of liquidating partner's books as evidence, in view of stipulation.

In suit for dissolution of partnership and an accounting, both partners, having expressly stipulated to refer all books kept by liquidating partner to an accountant to take an account therefrom, could not thereafter object to use of such books as evidence.

7. Estoppel ⊜83(1)—Liquidating partner not estopped to claim credit for items shown on accountant's report by statements rendered to copartners.

In suit for dissolution of partnership and an accounting, with stipulation by both parties for reference to an accountant of all books kept by liquidating partner to take an account therefrom, liquidating partner held not estopped to claim credit for any item shown on report submitted by accountant because statements rendered by him to copartners showed a greater sum of money to be due than was shown by accountant's report, where neither of such statements was rendered or accepted as a final settlement and copartners were not misled to their prejudice or to liquidating partner's benefit by anything contained in either of statements.

8. Estoppel ⊜52—Each and every element must be present to constitute.

Each and every element must be present to constitute an estoppel.

9. Estoppel ⊜52—What essential to "quasi estoppel" stated.

To constitute "quasi estoppel," it is essential that party invoking it shall have been misled by prior conduct or prior inconsistent claim of other party, and that he shall have changed his position in reliance thereon, and that either he shall have been prejudiced or other party shall have been benefited by such conduct or inconsistent claim.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex B. Goodcell, Judge.

Suit by George B. Riley and another, doing business under the firm name and style of Armacost, Riley & Co., against C. M. Brown. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, and Harry C. Wesley, for appellants.

Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action for the dissolution of a partnership and for an accounting of its affairs. Plaintiffs, at the times herein mentioned, were copartners doing business in the state of Ohio under the firm name of Armacost, Riley & Co. Defendant was engaged in business at the city of Redlands, in this state, where he maintained an office. Some time prior to July 1, 1917, plaintiffs and defendant formed a partnership for the growing, packing, and marketing of cantaloupes during the 1917 season. The cantaloupes were to be grown in the Imperial valley. It was for the purpose of securing a dissolution of this partnership and an accounting of its affairs that the action was brought. The appeal is by the plaintiffs, who claim that the judgment awards them a smaller sum than is due them.

The trial court found that the partnership for the growing, packing, and marketing of the cantaloupes was entered into by plaintiffs on the one side, and as one of the parties thereto, and by defendant on the other side, and as the other party thereto; that under their agreement plaintiffs, as one party, were equal partners with defendant, as the other party; that the profits and losses were to be shared and borne equally by and between the two parties; that plaintiffs, as the one party, and defendant, as the other, were to furnish an equal amount of capital; that the business of the partnership was to be conducted by defendant, and that it was to be under his direction and control. An accounting was had during the course of the trial, as the result of which the court further found that plaintiffs are entitled to be paid by defendant the sum of $107.58. A final judgment was entered accordingly on January 11, 1922, decreeing a dissolution of the copartnership as of December 24, 1921, and adjudging that plaintiffs recover from defendant the above-mentioned sum. Appealing from that judgment, plaintiffs claim that the trial court committed error in taking the account, and that but for such error a much greater sum would have been found to be due them.

The precise nature of the partnership agreement and of the respective rights and obligations of the parties thereunder could be determined only from a consideration of a mass of correspondence passing between plaintiffs and defendant over a considerable period of time. Following the introduction of this correspondence, and after the learned trial judge had announced from the bench that he would find the partnership agreement to be as above stated, an informal conversation ensued between court and counsel relative to the accounting which the parties desired should then be taken in order to determine the balance, if any, which might be due from one party to the other. This colloquy resulted in a stipulation in open court, whereby it was expressly agreed by plaintiffs and defendant:

"That a reference of the accounts involved in this action may be made to the firm of R. E. Parr & Co., certified accountants, with directions to ascertain from the books and accounts of the defendant [italics ours] the amount and date and source of receipts and the individual items of disbursements, and what the same were for, and to whom paid, making a report in detail to the court, furnishing one copy thereof to plaintiffs and one copy thereof to defendant, reserving to either party the right to object to the allowance of any item as a matter of law."

Thereupon the court made an order in accordance with the terms of this stipulation, referring the accounts to R. E. Parr & Co. to ascertain "from the books and accounts of the defendant" the items of receipts and disbursements, and ordering the accountants to make a detailed report to the court, reserving to either party when the matter should come before the court the right to object to the allowance of any item as a matter of law. As a part of this order the court further directed that—

"All books of original entry, and all books, documents, checks, papers, or memoranda whatsoever, pertinent to the transaction or the partnership business between plaintiffs and defendant, now in the possession or control of the defendant [italics ours], be furnished to the referee for the purpose of this reference."

Defendant, who was interested in a number of business ventures in California, personally attended to all of the partnership affairs in this state. Subsequently to the formation of this partnership with plaintiffs he entered into a partnership with a man of the name of Ford, who advanced for defendant some of the moneys which the latter put into the business of his partnership with plaintiffs. No set of books was ever opened which related exclusively to the transactions in which the partnership between plaintiffs and defendant was interested. Instead, defendant opened and kept, at his office in Redlands, a set of books in the name of "Brown & Ford," which, in addition to entries of the transactions of the partnership between himself and Ford, also contained the principal items pertaining to the business of defendant's partnership with plaintiffs. These books, however, did not contain entries of all of the transactions growing out of defendant's partnership with plaintiffs. Though counsel for appellants are pleased to refer to these books as the "partnership books," they were not partnership books in any true sense of the term; that is, they were not books pertaining exclusively to the business of the partnership between plaintiffs and defendant, nor was any set of books ever opened which contained only items relating to defendant's partnership with plaintiffs.

In addition to the books kept by defendant in the name of Brown & Ford, there was also a set of books kept by him in the name of "C. M. Brown, Agent," and another set in the name of "Gold Banner Association"—a corporation with which defendant was connected. Some of the items pertaining to the business of the partnership between plaintiffs and defendant were entered in each of the two last-mentioned sets of books, and did not appear in the books kept in the name of Brown & Ford. The sums advanced by plaintiffs, and by Ford on behalf of defendant, and which were to meet the expenses of growing, packing, and marketing the cantaloupes, were entered in the Brown & Ford books; but of those sums which defendant disbursed from his own moneys in the business of his partnership with plaintiffs, some were entered in the books which he kept in the name of C. M. Brown, agent, and some in those which he kept in the name of the Gold Banner Association.

Following the court's order of reference, the accountants made an audit of the books which defendant kept in the name of Brown & Ford—the books which counsel for appellants have termed the "partnership books." No audit was at that time made by the accountants of the other books kept by defendant, notwithstanding these other books showed the disbursements made by defendant from his own moneys in his conduct of the partnership business. Having made this partial audit, the accountants filed their report with the court, showing a balance due from defendant to plaintiffs considerably in excess of the sum which the court found to be the amount due plaintiffs. After the filing of this report, the trial was resumed; it having previously been continued to enable the accountants to audit the books and to make their report. On resuming the trial, and upon learning that the accountants had audited only the Brown & Ford books, the court made an order, over plaintiffs' objection, re-referring the matter, with directions, to the accountants to comply with the original order of reference. Pursuant to this order of re-reference, the accountants audited the books which defendant kept in the name of "C. M. Brown, Agent," and likewise those which he kept in the name of the "Gold Banner Association." Later a report (hereafter referred to as the supplemental report) was made to the court by the accountants, showing the result of the audit made by them on this re-reference. Thereafter the trial again was resumed, and plaintiffs' counsel specifically objected to certain items shown on the original report and likewise to certain items shown on the supplemental report. Thereupon defendant introduced evidence showing the propriety of the items thus objected to and that they should be allowed. On the two reports of the accountants, and on the evidence adduced by defendant to support the items specifically objected to by plaintiffs, the court found that the amount due from defendant to plaintiffs was that which we have already stated—$107.58.

Prior to the commencement of the action, namely, on August 20, 1917, defendant rendered a statement to plaintiffs which showed that at that date there was due to the latter, as a result of the partnership venture, a balance of $1,104.28. Defendant testified that at that date it was not possible to render a complete statement, and that the one rendered by him gave only an approximate statement of the condition of the partnership affairs at that time. Again, on July 13, 1918, which was prior to the commencement of the action, defendant rendered another statement to plaintiffs, showing that at that date the balance due the latter was $4,555.72. Defendant testified that this statement was prepared by his bookkeeper, and he pointed out what he claimed were manifest errors appearing on the face of the statement and which improperly augmented the true balance due plaintiffs.

Appellants earnestly contend that the court erred in ordering the re-reference, in receiving the supplemental report in evidence, and in considering the items shown thereon. This objection is based upon the theory that the original report, showing, as it does, the result of an audit of the Brown & Ford books, is the only report which is founded upon an audit of the "partnership books," and that, therefore, no item shown on the books kept in the name of "C. M. Brown, Agent," or in the name of "Gold Banner Association" should be considered.

[1-3] Unquestionably it is true, as appellants claim, that the presumption of correctness which, as between the partners, attaches to entries in partnership books to which all of the partners have access, does not attach to entries in the private books of one of the partners. Entries in other than partnership books to which all the partners have access must be established by extrinsic proof. Wheatley v. Wheeler, 34 Md. 62; Adams v. Funk, 53 Ill. 219. But in this case we are confronted with a stipulation the terms of which are so broad that it includes all account books kept by respondent, and it expressly dispenses with extrinsic proof as to all items shown by such books, excepting only such items as might be specifically objected to by one of the parties. Indeed, in the instant case there were no partnership books. The books of the firm of Brown & Ford were not the books of the partnership between appellants and respondent. At any rate, they were no more the books of that partnership than were the books kept by defendant in the name of "C. M. Brown, Agent" and "Gold Banner Association." The entries which related to the affairs of the partnership between appellants and respondent were scattered through these three different sets of books, and were there interspersed with numerous other items relating to the different enterprises in which respondent was interested. This situation evidently was recognized by court and counsel when the stipulation was made, for, when that arrangement was entered into, it was expressly agreed, not that an audit should be made of the "partnership books"—there were none—but that the accountants should "ascertain from the books and accounts of the defendant" the partnership receipts and disbursements. And in the original order of reference, which was based upon this stipulation, it was ordered that—

"All books of original entry, and all books, documents, checks, papers, or memoranda whatsoever, pertinent to the transaction of the partnership business between plaintiffs and defendant, now in the possession or control of the defendant, be furnished to the referee for the purpose of this reference."

The terms of the stipulation and of the order were broad enough to include, as it doubtless was intended that they should include, all of the several sets of books from which the supplemental report was made. It is now too late for appellants to escape the consequences of a stipulation to which they thus solemnly committed themselves.

To protect the parties from any implication that the report of the accountants might be accepted as conclusive evidence of the correctness of the items shown therein, the stipulation included a provision to the effect that there was reserved to either party, when the report should be made and filed, "the right to object to the allowance of any item as a matter of law." From the remarks made by the court and by counsel at the time when the stipulation was being entered into, it is evident that the right thus reserved to object to the allowance of any items "as a matter of law" was understood to mean the right to object to any item which the objecting party for any reason might deem to be an improper credit or an improper charge. Immediately preceding the definite formulation of the stipulation, counsel for appellants employed this language:

"All we want is what the books show, saving our right to object to items which we do not think are proper charges."

And the court, when framing the stipulation and proposing it to counsel for their acceptance or rejection, said:

"If the books show an item that you think is not a proper charge, you have a right to object to it; and Mr. Brown will deliver everything he has in the shape of books of account."

The net result of all that was said by court and counsel at the time when the stipulation was being framed is therefore substantially this: The accountants to whom the matter was to be referred were to audit all the books and documents in respondent's office or under his control, relating to the partnership's affairs, and were to make a report thereon; and all items shown on such report were to be deemed to be correct, and were to be admitted by the parties, save alone such as might be specifically objected to as improper charges. This was the course which was pursued, and properly pursued, by the learned trial judge throughout the trial after the parties had entered into the stipulation. Pursuant to this understanding, appellants did specifically object to a few of the items shown on the two reports, upon the ground that those particular items were not proper charges against them; and thereupon respondent introduced extrinsic evidence to sustain each and every item to which objection was thus made.

[4-6] The next ground of assault upon the supplemental report is that it shows items in respondent's favor which were records of disbursements made by him after the expiration of the term during which the partnership was to continue and after this action was commenced. There is no merit in this contention. Respondent acted as the liquidating partner. After the expiration of the cantaloupe season of 1917—the season during which the partnership was to continue—respondent was engaged, over a considerable period of time, in winding up the affairs of the partnership business. Without doubt, his right to be credited with every item of disbursement made by him from his own personal funds while thus engaged in liquidating the affairs of the copartnership is as unimpeachable as is his liability to be charged with all collections made by him on behalf of the firm during that period. But, though a liquidating partner is entitled to be credited with all disbursements made by him during the period of liquidation, entries of such disbursements in books kept by him in his possession and under his sole control, and to which his partners have no access, are not, as a general rule, admissible in his favor as against his copartners. 52 L. R. A. p. 846, note to Chick v. Robinson. Where, however, as in the instant case, the parties have expressly stipulated to refer all books kept by the liquidating partner to an accountant to take an account therefrom, it does not lie in the mouth of either party thereafter to object to the use of such books as evidence. Cameron v. Watson, 10 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 64.

[7] As a further ground of objection to the supplemental report, it is urged that respondent is estopped to claim credit for any item shown thereon, for the reason that each of the statements rendered by him on August 20, 1917, and on July 13, 1918, shows a greater sum of money to be due to appellants than is shown on the supplemental report. The circumstances testified to by respondent support the conclusion that neither of these statements was rendered or accepted as a final settlement and agreement fully settling the right of the parties. Neither statement was intended to show a final balance reached upon consideration of all of the partnership affairs. Prepared, as they were, during the period when respondent was engaged in liquidating these affairs, the statements necessarily were intended to show only a partial or approximate settlement. Indeed, it is often, if not generally, the case that a statement rendered by one partner to another, prior to the complete liquidation of the partnership affairs, is rendered and received merely as a tentative basis for the subsequent ascertainment of the proper balance to be struck. In this respect, an account rendered by one partner to his copartner stands upon a different basis from an account rendered between a debtor and his creditor. The inherent difference between the two situations and the reason therefor is clearly pointed out in Hughes v. Smither, 23 App. Div. 590, 49 N. Y. S. 115, affirmed without opinion in 163 N. Y. 553, 57 N. E. 1112, where the court says:

"The doctrine, as between debtor and creditor, of an implied promise resulting from the preparation and rendition of an account by one party, which is received and retained by the other in silence, cannot reasonably be applied to a partnership account. In the one case the account is rendered for the specific purpose of informing the debtor of the creditor's demand, and of obtaining payment. It is expected that such an account will, with reasonable promptitude, be scanned, and either paid, if found to be accurate, or disputed, if found to be inaccurate. * * * An entirely different attitude is assumed with regard to a partnership account. That is simply one partner's summary of the partnership dealings, and his version of the partnership status. The receipt of such an account suggests no immediate demand. The implication is that it is offered merely as a basis for subsequent liquidation. It has no element of finality. [Italics ours.] It leaves the person who receives it entirely free to seek further information before questioning his partner's figures. Both parties naturally understand that the account as rendered is tentative, and is but the first step in the direction of an accounting. Before there is a final settlement, they must go over their partnership affairs, arrive at a mutual understanding with regard thereto, and reach an agreement as to the proper balance to be struck."

[8, 9] It has been said by our Supreme Court that a party is not precluded from asserting a claim merely because it is inconsistent with some claim previously advanced by him. Lackmann v. Kearney, 142 Cal. 115, 75 P. 668. See, also, Pearson v. Hendrick, 13 Cal. App. 732, 110 P. 586; Frank v. Crescent Wharf, etc., Co., 50 Cal. App. 276, 195 P. 79. The principle which underlies this pronouncement governs here, unless there be some special reason why the doctrine of estoppel should be applicable to the facts of this case. Manifestly, in order to sustain appellants' claim that respondent is estopped, it must appear that each and every essential element of estoppel is present in the case. The estoppel which appellants invoke is of the kind commonly known as "quasi estoppel." 21 C. J. p. 1202. To constitute such estoppel, it is essential that the party invoking it shall have been misled by the prior conduct or the prior inconsistent claim of the other party; also that he shall have changed his position in reliance thereon (Muller v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 63 N. Y. 353); and that either he shall have been prejudiced or the other party shall have been benefited by such conduct or inconsistent claim (21 C. J. p. 1205; Stein v. Leeman, 161 Cal. 502, 119 P. 663). As was tersely said by the learned author of the opinion in Allen v. Hance, 161 Cal. 196, 118 P. 529:

"Whatever may have worked the estoppel, whether the estoppel rests in judgment, deed, contract, or in pais, in its essence it amounts to but this, that a man is forbidden to show the existence of a fact because by his past conduct, his declarations, his agreement, his deed or a judgment, it would work an injustice and an injury to his adversary to permit him to do so."

The appellants in this case were not misled to their prejudice or to respondent's benefit by anything contained in either of the statements. Indeed, appellants were not misled at all, for they never acted upon either statement, nor did they change their position by reason thereof; on the contrary, they brought this action praying for an accounting by the court of all the affairs of the partnership and for a recovery of such sum as that accounting might show to be due them. To attain the purpose of their suit, they expressly stipulated, in substance and effect, that accountants to be appointed by the court should "ascertain from the books and accounts of the defendant" all of the items necessary to enable the court to strike a correct balance, irrespective of what might be disclosed by either of the statements previously received by them.

The judgment is affirmed.

RUSH v. LAGOMARSINO. (S. F. 10654.)

1. Negligence ⟸138(2)—Instruction erroneous as requiring plaintiff to prove freedom from contributory negligence.

Instruction that it must appear to jury's satisfaction that plaintiff was without fault or negligence, which may in any wise have contributed to the accident, was erroneous, as requiring plaintiff to affirmatively establish that he was not guilty of contributory negligence.

2. Negligence ⟸135—Contributory negligence defense to be established by defendant.

Defense of contributory negligence must be established by defendant by a preponderance of the evidence, unless such negligence is shown by or can be inferred from evidence adduced in support of plaintiff's case.

3. Negligence ⟸141(8)—Instruction on contributory negligence erroneous as ignoring qualification plaintiff's negligence must proximately contribute to injury.

Charge that any fault or negligence on part of plaintiff, which may in any wise have contributed to the accident, would preclude his recovery was erroneous, as it ignored the qualification that, in order to defeat a recovery, the negligence of the plaintiff must have contributed proximately to the cause of the injury.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸706(8)—Instruction on automobile driver's right to assume pedestrians would exercise ordinary care held erroneous.

In action for personal injuries, instruction given at request of defendant that operator of automobile on a street had right to assume that other persons on street would exercise ordinary care and would not negligently expose themselves to danger held misleading in view of other instructions.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸705(2)—Persons using highway must exercise care for conservation of correlative rights.

The right of automobile drivers to use public highway is not superior to that of pedestrians, and, in exercise of common right, all persons using same must exercise constant care and caution, commensurate with special hazard, for conservation of their correlative rights.

6. Municipal corporations ⟸705(2)—Automobile driver must be vigilant and anticipate presence of others.

Automobile driver has no right to assume that the road is clear, but under all circumstances and at all times must be vigilant and anticipate presence of others, and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid collision with other persons using proper care and caution, and that driver did not know that any one was on street is no excuse for conduct which would have been regarded as reckless had he known that another person or vehicle was on highway.

7. Trial ⟸253(4)—Instruction held erroneous as ignoring conditions and theories favorable to defendant's case, and question of plaintiff's negligence as cause of injury.

Instruction to find for defendant if jury believed from evidence that plaintiff suddenly appeared in path of defendant's automobile, under circumstances where his sudden presence could not have been reasonably foreseen by defendant, or defendant by reasonable care, could not have avoided accident, held erroneous as ignoring question of whether situation referred to was brought about by negligence of plaintiff or his violation of Motor Vehicle Act, and wholly ignoring every condition and theory favorable to plaintiff's case.

8. Trial ⟸253(7)—Instruction conditionally directing a verdict should mention every condition necessary to verdict.

Instructions conditionally directing verdict for defendant should mention every condition necessary to verdict, and were erroneous where omitting charge as to duty of defendant, at time and place of accident, to have lights (St. 1919, p. 206, § 13), to sound warning (St. 1915, p. 405, § 12), and to drive automobile at speed of not more than 15 miles per hour (St. 1919, p. 220, § 22).

9. Municipal corporations ⟸706(8)—Instruction as to sounding warning, under Motor Vehicle Act, improperly refused.

In an action for personal injuries sustained by being struck by defendant's automobile, refusal to instruct as to the necessity of sounding warning held erroneous, in view of Motor Vehicle Act, as amended by St. 1919, p. 206, § 13, and St. 1915, p. 405, § 12.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Abe Rush against George Lagomarsino. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. Maxwell Peyser and Elliott M. Epsteen, both of San Francisco (Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries to the plaintiff which were inflicted by an automobile owned and operated by the defendant. The appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment entered, upon the verdict of a jury, in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff's complaint alleged that while plaintiff was walking on Market street in the city of San Francisco at about 6:10 o'clock a. m. of the morning of the 22d day of December, 1921, the defendant operated and ran an automobile owned by him recklessly and carelessly, at an unlawful rate of speed, and without lights thereon, and without giving warning of its approach, and that by reason of such negligence the automobile struck and injured the plaintiff to his damage in the sum of $52,500.

The defendant, answering plaintiff's complaint, did not deny that his automobile, while operated by him, struck and threw the plaintiff to the ground. The defendant did, however, deny that the automobile was driven recklessly or carelessly, or at any unlawful rate of speed, or without lights, or that defendant failed to give any warning of its approach, or that defendant was guilty of any carelessness whatsoever. The defendant's answer further denied that the plaintiff was lawfully walking upon the street at the time of the accident, and, as an affirmative defense, alleged that the accident was caused by the negligence and carelessness of the plaintiff in negligently and carelessly crossing the street where the accident happened, in carelessly and negligently failing to observe the approach of the defendant's automobile, in carelessly and negligently placing himself within the path of the automobile, in carelessly and negligently failing to take any care for his own safety.

The only point urged in support of the appeal is the claimed error of the trial court in giving certain instructions of its own motion, and refusing to give certain other instructions at the request of the plaintiff. It seems appropriate that a succinct statement of the evidence pertinent to the point presented should be made.

The evidence adduced in support of the plaintiff's case, substantially stated, is as follows: The plaintiff, as he testified, was a clerk in a cigar store. On the morning of the accident and just prior thereto he had been to a nearby restaurant for breakfast. Shortly after 6 o'clock a. m. he left the restaurant. Arriving at the corner of Market and Brady streets, he proceeded across Market street toward his place of business which was located at the corner of Gough and Market streets. The morning was dark and stormy. It was raining heavily, and the street was wet and slippery. Before attempting to cross Market street the plaintiff looked up that street toward Valencia street for possible approaching vehicles, and, not seeing any, he proceeded on his way; as he stepped from the curb, and while walking across the street, he again looked up the street. He saw no vehicle of any kind approaching, no automobile headlights were visible, and no automobile horn was sounding. Just as he approached the south street car track he was struck down by the defendant's automobile. The testimony of the plaintiff as above outlined is fully corroborated in all of its material and substantial details by the testimony of a witness for the plaintiff who witnessed the accident at a point about 18 feet distant from where it occurred. This witness testified, among other things, that he saw the defendant's automobile a fraction of a second before it struck the plaintiff; that it was without any lights at all; that no warning horn was sounded; that the impact of the automobile threw the plaintiff a distance of 20 or 25 feet from the point where the collision occurred and that the defendant's automobile traversed a distance of 50 or 60 feet before stopping after it struck the plaintiff.

The defendant, as a witness in his own behalf, testified, in substance, that, at the time of the accident, he was riding in an open car. He turned from Valencia street into Market street. Thence he proceeded down Market street between the curb and the first street car tract—that is to say, the south street car track on Market street. He maintained that position until the happening of the accident. At the time of the accident his lights were burning, and he was driving at a speed estimated by him to be from 15 to 16 miles an hour. It was very dark and raining hard at the time of the accident. The defendant first saw the plaintiff just as the plaintiff stepped in front of his right headlight 3 or 4 feet in front of the defendant's automobile. At that time the plaintiff was walking rapidly. When plaintiff stepped in front of the defendant's car the plaintiff was looking north. He was not looking at defendant's automobile. The defendant threw on his emergency brake and his foot brake as fast as he could, but there was no chance to avoid hitting the plaintiff. At the time of the accident there was no other traffic on the street. On seeing the plaintiff the defendant did not blow any horn or sound any warning. The defendant did not see plaintiff as plaintiff stepped off the sidewalk. At the time of the accident the defendant was traveling in a straight line on Market street towards the ferry building, and there was nothing to obstruct his vision in front of him. Defendant had a straight path in front of him and could see 75 feet ahead. At the time of the accident there were three or four automobiles standing at the curb line. There were two automobiles near the corner, and there was one a little further down, near the curb. The defendant did not see plaintiff come out from the sidewalk. He saw him first in the middle of the street when plaintiff stepped in front of defendant's automobile. At the time of the accident it was 6 o'clock in the morning. The street lights were out. It was very dark, and the defendant could not see a man coming out between any of the automobiles at the curb.

[1, 2] The trial court, after correctly charging the jury as to the degree and burden of proof required of the plaintiff to establish his case, then proceeded to instruct the jury that, "It must also appear to your satisfaction, that the plaintiff was without fault or negligence on his part which may in any wise have contributed to the accident." The instruction thus given was manifestly erroneous, because, in effect, it instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover unless he affirmatively established that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, and that any fault or negligence on the part of the plaintiff, no matter how slight or remote, which "in any wise" contributed to the accident would warrant a verdict for the defendant. The pleaded defense of contributory negligence was a defense to be affirmatively established by the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence, unless such negligence is shown by or can be inferred from the evidence adduced in support of the plaintiff's case. Whatever negligence there may have been on the part of the plaintiff must, in order to prevent his recovery, have contributed directly or proximately to the accident, and it was not necessary in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover that he should show that the accident occurred without his fault. Green v. Southern Pacific Co., 132 Cal. 254, 257, 64 P. 255; Schneider v. Market Street Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 482, 487, 66 P. 734; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 241, 116 P. 513; Bidwell v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 169 Cal. 780, 783, 148 P. 197; Hall v. San Francisco, 188 Cal. 641, 643, 206 P. 459; Howard v. Worthington, 50 Cal. App. 556, 559, 195 P. 709.

The evidence adduced in support of the plaintiff's case in nowise carried any imputation of negligence on the part of the plaintiff. On the contrary it negatives even the suggestion of any contributory negligence on his part. The court nowhere instructed the jury that the burden of proving the contributory negligence of the plaintiff was on the defendant, or that the plaintiff, upon the showing of the negligence of the defendant, was entitled to recover unless the plaintiff's negligence as a proximate, contributing cause of the accident was affirmatively shown. No instruction in any wise alleviating the error of the instruction above quoted was given to the jury, and the trial court refused, upon the request of the plaintiff, to give other instructions which, standing alone, or when read in conjunction with instructions elsewhere given by the court, would have formulated a clear, correct, and consistent statement of the law relative to the rule covering and controlling the doctrine of contributory negligence.

The instruction in question, having in effect charged the jury that the plaintiff could not recover unless he had established to the satisfaction of the jury that he was free from contributory negligence, placed a burden upon the plaintiff not sanctioned by the law, and, in view of the conflict of the evidence adduced upon the entire case, the error of the instruction must have prejudiced the plaintiff and contributed to the verdict found for the defendant.

[3] The trial court further erred in the same instruction when it charged the jury that any fault or negligence on the part of the plaintiff, "which may in any wise have contributed to the accident," would preclude a recovery by the plaintiff. The vice of this instruction is that it ignores the important qualification that, in order to defeat a recovery, the negligence of the plaintiff must have contributed proximately to the injury. Fernandes v. Sacramento City Ry. Co., 52 Cal. 45. The error of this instruction was accentuated by the further charge of the trial court that:

"When the negligence of the injured party contributed to the injury complained of the law will afford no redress, and if, therefore, you find in this case that plaintiff was negligent and such negligence contributed to the injury complained of, I instruct you that the plaintiff cannot recover against the defendant."

The negligent act or omission of a plaintiff which will exculpate a defendant from responding to the plaintiff in damages resulting from the plaintiff's negligent act or omission must be a contributing, proximate cause of the damages. Flynn v. S. F. & S. J. R. R. Co., 40 Cal. 14, 19, 6 Am. Rep. 695; Basler v. Sacramento Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 514, 519, 111 P. 530, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 642. "The formula is, not that any degree of negligence on the part of the plaintiff which directly concurs in producing the injury * * * will constitute a defense; but if the negligence of the plaintiff, which amounts to the absence of ordinary care, shall contribute * * * proximately to the injury, the plaintiff shall not recover." Robinson v. W. P. R. R. Co., 48 Cal. 409, 422, 423; Strong v. S. & P. R. R. Co., 61 Cal. 326, 328.

While it is true that the trial court, prior to the giving of the instructions immediately under consideration, gave a definition of contributory negligence which included the element of proximate cause, nevertheless, the instructions complained of were so specifically and emphatically at variance with the requirements of the rule relating to contributory negligence that there is, we think, no escape from the conclusion that they must have confused and misled the jury to the prejudice of the plaintiff.

[4] The trial court at the request of the defendant charged the jury that:

"The operator of an automobile upon a street or public highway has a right to act upon the presumption that others thereon are exercising due care and will not negligently expose themselves to danger, and that they will attempt to avoid danger. I therefore instruct you that the defendant in this case had a right to assume that persons upon the street would exercise ordinary care, and that they would not negligently expose themselves to danger, and that they would exercise ordinary care to ascertain the approach of motor vehicles, and before you hold that the defendant was negligent in this case, you must take into consideration these assumptions which the defendant had a right to rely upon."

[5] Applied to the facts of this particular case the instruction last quoted was likely to mislead the jury. Coupled with the trial court's instruction previously given that the defendant, while operating his automobile, was required to exercise only ordinary care, the last quoted instruction practically told the jury that the defendant, rightfully relying upon the assumption that pedestrians would take care of themselves, was exercising ordinary care even though he ignored or was not aware of the fact that a pedestrian was crossing the street. The right of drivers of automobiles to use public highways is not superior to that of the humblest pedestrian, and, in the exercise of a common right to the use of the public highways, all persons using the same must exert constant care and caution for the conservation of their correlative rights, commensurate with the special hazard which is peculiar to and nowadays ever present in the use of public highways.

[6] Accordingly, the driver of an automobile "has no right to assume that the road is clear, but under all circumstances and at all times he must be vigilant and must anticipate and expect the presence of others. * * * The fact that he did not know that any one was on the highway is no excuse for conduct which would have amounted to recklessness if he had known that another vehicle or person was on the highway." Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 159, 201 P. 471. Even though the operator of an automobile may be rigidly within the law, "he still remains bound to anticipate that he may meet persons at any point of the street, and he must, in order to avoid a charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid a collision with another person using proper care and caution, and if the situation requires he must slow up and stop." Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 340, 208 P. 125, 127.

The instruction immediately under consideration in effect declared the law to be that "it is not a part of the duty of an operator of a motor vehicle to keep his machine always under control, or that it is his duty to keep it under control only a part of the time; that he has the right to assume that the road is clear, and under no circumstances and at no time must he be vigilant or anticipate or expect the presence of others; and if he does not know that any one else is on the highway, he is excusable for conduct that would amount to recklessness if he did know that another was using it." Of course such is not the law. Meyers v. Bradford, supra.

Having instructed the jury that the defendant had a right to drive his automobile in the security of the assumption that the roadway was clear, the statement of the court elsewhere in its charge to the jury to the effect that it was generally the duty of drivers of automobiles to look out for foot passengers can hardly be said to have sufficed to relieve the instruction in question of its misleading and its injurious effect upon the minds of the jury.

[7] The trial court instructed the jury:

"If you believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff suddenly appeared in the path of defendant's automobile, under circumstances where his sudden presence could not have been reasonably foreseen by the defendant, and that the defendant by the exercise of reasonable care could not have avoided the accident, your verdict in this case must be in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff."

This instruction ignores all reference to the question of whether or not the situation therein referred to was brought about by any negligence of the plaintiff, or was due wholly to the negligence of the defendant, and in effect tells the jury that the mere fact that if the defendant was suddenly confronted with a situation demanding immediate action, and "in the excitement he decided to do and did do what seemed best at the time," then the defendant was not liable. In other words, the jury was practically told that regardless of whether or not the injuries of the plaintiff were caused by the reckless, careless, and unlawful driving of the defendant, he was not liable for plaintiff's injuries, if he was not aware of plaintiff's presence until the automobile was almost upon him. Moreover this instruction ignores every condition and theory favorable to the plaintiff's case, including the evidence which tends to show that the sudden appearance of plaintiff in front of defendant's automobile was caused by the defendant's disregard of the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act. In effect the court by the instruction last referred to told the jury that, without regard to any question as to whether or not the defendant may have been driving his automobile recklessly and carelessly, and without a light or warning of any kind, and by reason thereof the plaintiff while crossing the street without knowledge or reason to expect the approach of the defendant's automobile, was suddenly confronted by defendant's automobile, the defendant was entitled to a verdict if the defendant did his best to avoid the accident, after such situation was brought about by defendant, and when it may have been too late to avoid injuring the plaintiff.

[8] A review of the several instructions which the trial court gave in response to the issues presented and tried shows that each in effect conditionally directed a verdict for the defendant. When such is the effect of an instruction the instruction should mention every condition necessary to the verdict. Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 184, 118 P. 700. Under the general laws it was the duty of the defendant, at the time and place of the accident, to have at the front of his automobile two lighted lamps (Stats. 1919, p. 206, § 13); to have thereon a horn, and to sound it whenever necessary "as a warning of danger but not at other times, or for any other purpose" (Stats. 1915, p. 405, § 12); and it was his duty to drive the automobile at a rate of speed not to exceed 15 miles per hour (Stats. 1919, p. 220, § 22.) If any one of these provisions of the statute was violated by the defendant at the time mentioned, such violation became negligence per se. Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 P. 663. While the issue presented by the pleadings and the theory upon which the case was tried involved the elements above enumerated which constituted negligence per se, the trial court failed to mention them in any one of the instructions complained of. Admittedly, the presence of lights or no lights and the rate of speed at which the automobile was being driven were, under the evidence adduced upon the entire case, matters of much importance, and the omission of all mention thereof in the particular instructions now under consideration was prejudicial error.

[9] The trial court refused the plaintiff's request to instruct the jury as follows:

"Under the California Motor Vehicle Act, as amended in 1919, § 12 (Stats. 1915, p. 405, § 12) every motor vehicle shall be equipped with bell, gong, horn, whistle, or other device, in good working order, capable of emitting an abrupt sound adequate in quality and volume to give warning of the approach of such vehicle to pedestrians, and to the riders or drivers of trains, and to the riders or drivers of animals or of other vehicles, and to persons entering or leaving the street, interurban or railroad cars. Every person operating a motor vehicle shall sound bell, gong, horn, whistle, or other device, whenever necessary as a warning of danger, but not at other times or for any other purpose."

Under the issues and evidence presented in this case, we are of the opinion that it was error for the trial court to refuse the above-quoted instruction. While it may be true, as defendant contends, that when he saw the plaintiff it would have been useless to have sounded his horn as a warning because in all probability it was then too late to avoid the accident, and that therefore the failure to give the requested instruction was not prejudicial error, nevertheless the statute provides that "whenever necessary" a warning of approaching danger shall be sounded by every person operating an automobile. Keeping in mind the facts, as were shown in evidence, that there were three automobiles parked on the side of the street at the point at which the plaintiff attempted to cross the street, and where pedestrians would be likely to cross, that the defendant was driving his automobile without lights at a speed of 15 to 16 miles per hour on a very dark morning and in a heavy rain over a wet and slippery street which was without lights, it was certainly a matter for the jury to determine whether or not, under all the circumstances, it was necessary for the defendant to sound his horn as a warning of danger, and the failure to submit that question to the jury as requested was error which doubtless redounded to the prejudice of the plaintiff.

Judgment is reversed.

In re WALKER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 11362.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1925. Rehearing Denied July 23, 1925.)

1. Wills ⊂⊃858(1)—When property passes to heirs at law on failure of bequest stated.

Where property was not intended to be included in the residuum on a bequest of such property failing, it passes to heirs at law and not to residuary legatee.

2. Wills ⊂⊃858(2)—Property, on failure of bequest, held to pass to residuary legatee.

Testatrix bequeathed to W. and C. each an undivided one-half in land. She provided that if land was sold by her, proceeds of sale on hand at her death should go to W., C., and L., but if L. negotiated sale for her, and received commissions, he was to receive no part of proceeds. Residue of estate was bequeathed to L. Held, in view of Civ. Code, § 1332, that C. having predeceased testatrix, his lapsed bequest became part of residuum.

3. Wills ⊂⊃858(2)—Lineal descendants of deceased residuary legatee held entitled to residuum.

Where testatrix bequeathed property to W. and C., and will impliedly provided that, should either predecease testatrix, lapsed devise should go to residuary legatee, whether latter survived or predeceased testatrix, residuum would come to him under will as well as by Civ. Code, § 1332, and hence his lineal descendants were entitled thereto under section 1310.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; George D. Murray, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Mary Walker, deceased. From a judgment of the superior court, decreeing distribution, the heirs at law of deceased appeal. Affirmed.

H. C. Nelson and J. F. Coonan, both of Eureka, Geo. M. Harker, of Los Angeles, and F. K. Lemon, of Clinton, Ill., for appellants.

W. F. Clyborne and J. S. Burnell, both of Eureka, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The decedent, Mary Walker, died February 2, 1923, in Humboldt county, in this state. No husband or children, or the child of any deceased child, or father or mother, or brother or sister, survived her. As her only heirs at law she left certain nieces and nephews and grand nieces and nephews—the appellants here being among said heirs at law.

By a will dated October 16, 1920, the decedent devised certain land in the Mattole valley in Humboldt county to Isam Walker and Levant Cook, nephews of her deceased husband, share and share alike. In the event of a sale or disposition of the oil and mineral rights of said land in the Mattole valley, the will provided that the money realized or to accrue therefrom should be distributed one-third to Isam Walker, one-third to Levant Cook, and one-third to her own nephew, Louis C. Watts, the latter being an heir at law; that in case such sale was made by Isam Walker, under her authority, and he obtained a commission therefor, he should not receive a portion of the proceeds realized, but, in that event, said proceeds should be divided equally between said Levant Cook and said Louis C. Watts. The residuary clause of the will named said Louis C. Watts as residuary devisee and legatee.

Levant Cook predeceased the testatrix. As appears above, he was not a relative of said testatrix. Louis C. Watts, the residuary devisee and legatee, and who was a relative of said decedent, also predeceased the testatrix. Surviving him were two sons, Benjamin R. Watts and Raymond H. Watts, and a daughter, Amy Watts Zook.

The will was duly admitted to probate, and after the filing of a final account a petition for distribution was filed by the executor, which, among other things, prayed for the distribution of the lapsed devise to Levant Cook of an undivided interest in the Mattole valley property to the said three children of Louis C. Watts, as heirs at law of said residuary devisee and legatee, and to their grantees. Opposition to said petition for distribution was filed on the part of the heirs at law of the decedent, and asking for the distribution of said lapsed devise to such heirs at law. The court thereafter, against said opposition, made its decree distributing the said lapsed devise in accordance with the petition of the executor to the grantees of the children of Louis C. Watts, deceased residuary devisee and legatee. A motion for a new trial was interposed by said heirs at law and denied. This appeal was taken from said decree of distribution and from the order denying the motion for a new trial, the record consisting of the judgment roll alone. The appeal involves the third, fourth, and fifth clauses of the will, which respectively read as follows:

"Third. I give, and devise unto Isam Walker and Levant Cook, nephews of my deceased husband, John Walker, each an undivided one-half of all the property now owned by me in Mattole valley, in the said county of Humboldt, state of California, it being in township 1 south, range 2 west, Humboldt base and meridian, and being known as the John Walker ranch.

"Fourth. In the event of a sale or disposition by me of the oil and mineral rights in the land owned by me in Mattole Valley, * * * and known as the John Walker ranch, then and in such case the net sum realized by me on account of such disposition or sale and on hand at the time of my death, or money coming to my estate on account of such disposition or sale, I hereby give and bequeath to said Isam Walker and Levant Cook and my nephew, Louis C. Watts, share and share alike, each receiving one-third thereof, but in case any such sale is made by Isam Walker under any authority from me during my life time, and he receives under such authority a commission for making such sale or a part of the proceeds thereof, then in such event he is not to receive, under the terms of this will, any part of the money netted me on account of such sale, but the whole of said money is to be divided equally between said Levant Cook and my said nephew, Louis C. Watts.

"Fifth. I hereby give, bequeath and devise all the rest and residue of my estate and property, real, personal, and mixed, of every kind and character and wherever situated, to my said nephew, Louis C. Watts."

[1] On the "question of law whether or not under the facts at bar the decree was in accordance with law in distributing said lapsed legacy [devise] to the grantees of the children of Louis C. Watts, deceased," the appellants set forth two propositions, as follows:

"Proposition 1. If Louis C. Watts had lived would the lapsed legacy [devise] have fallen into the residuum? * * * Now, in this case, there is a clause in the will that cannot possibly be reconciled with an intention on the part of the testatrix to include the Mattole lands in the residuum given to Louis C. Watts. [The fourth clause of the will, above quoted, is then set forth by appellants.] * * * Thus it has been held by this court that 'where, however, it is manifest from the context, or from the provisions of the will that the testator used the words in some more restricted sense, it will be given the meaning, in which it is clear that the testator used it.' * * * Where it is clear that certain property is not intended to be included in the residuum upon a bequest of such property failing, the property passes to the heirs at law and not to the residuary legatee."

[2] It is proper to state, in this connection, that we concede the soundness of the above-stated rule, but question its application to the facts here involved. We fail to see how or wherein the fourth provision of the will, above quoted, and referring to the contingent disposition of the oil and mineral rights of the land in the Mattole valley, tends to preclude the devise of said land to Isam Walker and Levant Cook from passing into the residuum in the event either or both of said devisees should predecease the testatrix. In our view, there is no indication of an intention on the part of the testatrix to have this real property pass to her heirs rather than fall into the residuum and go to the residuary devisee and legatee, in the event of its lapse either in toto or pro tanto. The language of the residuary clause, as above indicated, is broad enough to include all property of the decedent not effectually disposed of by the will. In a note to Hill v. Hill, 149 Ga. 741, 102 S. E. 151, appearing in 10 A. L. R. at page 1522, and cited by respondents, the general rule is thus stated:

"For the purpose of this note the general rule is assumed that a general residuary clause will carry ineffectual or lapsed legacies. In determining the devolution of lapsed legacies, the courts assume that, by the use of a general residuary clause, the testator evinced his intention not to die intestate as to any of his estate, real or personal. To overcome this presumption the residuary clause must contain language indicating that it was the intention of the testator to except and withdraw from the operation of the clause, the property he attempted to dispose of by a bequest or legacy, or the surrounding facts and circumstances must show such intention. In this regard the mere fact that the bequest or legacy was primarily for the benefit of some person other than the residuary legatee is not sufficient to show that the testator intended that if the legacy failed, it should inure to the benefit of the heirs or next of kin, rather than the residuary legatee."

Section 1332 of the Civil Code reads:

"A devise of the residue of the testator's real property passes all the real property which he was entitled to devise at the time of his death, not otherwise effectually devised by his will."

It is said in Estate of Russell, 150 Cal. 604, 605, 89 P. 345, cited in the above note:

"But it is well settled that section 1332, above quoted, abrogates this rule of the common law. * * * It is thus the accepted rule in this state that where there is a valid general residuary devise real property mentioned in a lapsed or void devise goes to the residuary devisee, and not to the heirs, unless a contrary intent is clearly expressed by the terms of the will."

We cannot accept appellants' contention that:

"She was about to dispose of an interest in the realty, and knowing that, in the event of death of Isam Walker or Levant Cook, the lapsed legacy [devise] so falling in would go to Louis C. Watts, she deliberately apportions to Louis C. Watts, in a certain event, a certain pro rata of a certain interest in the Mattole property, and made no provision as to what would happen in the event of the death of either except by the general residuary clause. * * *"

The testatrix as appellants concede, is presumed to know that in the event of a total or partial lapse of the devise to Isam Walker and Levant Cook said lapsed devise or part thereof would pass to Louis C. Watts as residuary devisee and legatee. The fact that the will further provided for a possible and contingent sale or disposition of the oil and mineral rights of said land and the distribution of the proceeds in such a manner as to give the residuary devisee and legatee a pro rata share thereof, merely indicates to us that, in such event, the testatrix desired and intended that Louis C. Watts, residuary devisee and legatee, should receive this additional specific legacy, along with any possible residuum that might come to him.

Appellants further state that:

"To hold that the testatrix intended the lapsed legacy [devise] of Cook to fall into the residuum under these circumstances would be to hold that the testatrix intended to bequeath to one who died a portion of the residue happening in consequence of his own death."

Crawford v. Mound Grove Cemetery Ass'n, 218 Ill. 399, 75 N. E. 998, is then cited and quoted from as follows:

"Where legacies are given to several legatees, and the residue is bequeathed to the same legatees, it follows that the residue will not include a lapsed legacy to one of them. To hold, in such a case, that the testator intended the lapsed legacy to fall into the residuum, was said, in Craighead v. Given, 10 Serg. & R. 351, to hold that the testator intended to bequeath to one who died a portion of the residue happening in consequence of his own death—a construction which could never be supported."

Appellants' brief continues:

"Assume that testatrix had in fact disposed of the oil rights for $100,000 cash and 10 per cent. royalty on the product. And that Louis C. Watts by the will got one-third of the cash and one-third of the royalty under the will, and Louis C. Watts died. Then it is apparent that, to hold that these amounts passed into the residuum, is to hold that the testatrix intended to give to Louis C. Watts by the residuary clause a portion of the residue happening in consequence of his own death, and as the question is as to the intention of the testatrix as to said lapsed legacy, that intention when found from one point of view is applicable to the other."

If the oil and mineral rights of said land had been sold, and the dispute here concerned the disposition of any portion of the proceeds thereof, perhaps the above quotation from the Illinois case would be applicable; such is not the case here, however, for we are concerned with the devolution of the lapsed part of a devise made to two persons neither one of whom is a residuary devisee or legatee. We do not perceive, then, how it can be maintained that if Louis C. Watts, residuary devisee and legatee, who was not a party to said lapsed devise, or his heirs at law or their grantees, should take the lapsed portion thereof as part of the residuum is to hold that the testatrix "intended to bequeath to one who died a portion of the residue happening in consequence of his own death." It should be kept in mind that this case is concerned with the devise of said real property to two persons, neither one of whom is a residuary devisee or legatee, and not with the contingent bequest of the proceeds of a possible sale of the oil and mineral rights of said land. We see no merit in appellants' "proposition 1."

[3] "Proposition 2. Do the heirs of Louis C. Watts take the lapsed legacy [devise]?"

In reply to their own question, appellants contend that the children of Louis C. Watts, residuary devisee and legatee, do not take the lapsed devise, for section 1310 of the Civil Code "expressly provides that the children of Watts shall take the estate given by the will, and this particular property was not given by the will, and can only go to Watts' children by invoking the provisions of the law" (that is, section 1332, Civ. Code). In other words, it is insisted by appellants that "it cannot be seriously claimed that it was the intention of testatrix at the execution of the will as shown by the will itself to give to Louis C. Watts the legacy [devise] to Cook which had not yet lapsed. They therefore must rely on the force of section 1332 and not on the intention of the testatrix. But section 1310 does not say, 'the estate given by the will and by the statutes,' but instead says, 'the estate given by the will.'"

Section 1310, Civil Code, reads:

"When any estate is devised or bequeathed to any child or other relation of the testator, and the devisee or legatee dies before the testator, leaving lineal descendants, or any such child or other relation is named in a will as a devisee or legatee and is dead at the time the will is executed, but leaves lineal decendants surviving the testator, such descendants take the estate so given by the will in the same manner as the devisee or legatee would have done had he survived the testator."

As indicated above, this lapsed devise of Levant Cook's would pass by virtue of the residuary clause (section 1332, Civil Code) to Louis C. Watts, had he survived the testatrix. He would receive such property under the will, for the testatrix, by the employment of a general residuary clause, impliedly declares that the person named therein as residuary devisee and legatee shall take all of the property left by her death and not otherwise effectually disposed of; it follows that such property would have come to him, not alone by virtue of the provisions of section 1332, Civil Code, but by the express act of the testatrix. The question, therefore, seems to reduce itself to this: Do the lineal descendants of a residuary devisee and legatee take the residuum under the provisions of section 1310, Civil Code, in the event the residuary devisee or legatee predeceases the testatrix?

Appellants cite authorities to the effect that:

"A residuary clause may itself lapse or fail to take effect, in which event the property which otherwise might fall into it because of lapsed legacies will pass to the testator's heirs at law. * * * The residuary legatee [and devisee] is dead. It is attempted to have his heirs stand in his place in that clause. The only manner or way in which these heirs may stand in the place of residuary legatee [and devisee] is by virtue of this statute [section 1310, Civil Code], and the statute permits these heirs to take whatever is given the ancestor by the will. If that is true, the utmost that could be claimed for the heirs at law of Louis C. Watts is the real estate owned by the testatrix at the time of her death, and not included in any other devise mentioned in the will; because * * * the Mattole valley property is given by the will to others, and not to Louis C. Watts. If the Mattole valley property goes into the residuary clause and becomes a part of it, it is by virtue of the law of California, and not by virtue of the will."

In other words, appellants appear to go the length of claiming that any property received under a residuary clause of a will is not received under the will, but solely by virtue of section 1332, Civil Code.

We have already shown that this contention is erroneous. It is true the will devises the Mattole valley property to Isam Walker and Levant Cook, but it goes further and impliedly provides that, should either or both of said devisees predecease the testatrix, said lapsed devise or part thereof should descend and go to Louis C. Watts as residuary devisee and legatee. That is to say, by the residuary clause of the will he is given all the property of the testatrix not otherwise effectually disposed of. In view of this and the plain import of section 1310, Civil Code, which draws no distinction between a specific devise or bequest and a devise or bequest under the residuary clause, we think that Levant Cook's share of the Mattole property passed, on the death of the testatrix, to the lineal descendants of said Louis C. Watts, residuary devisee and legatee, and to their grantees. Estate of Kunkler, 163 Cal. 797, 798, 127 P. 43, and Estate of Wyman, 182 Cal. 645, 648, 189 P. 267, are authority for the proposition that the provisions of section 1310, Civil Code, apply to a lapsed residuary devise or legacy as well as to a lapsed specific devise or legacy. It is clear, therefore, that whether Louis C. Watts, residuary devisee and legatee, survived or predeceased the testatrix, any residuum would come to him under the will as well as by section 1332, Civil Code, and hence his lineal descendants are entitled thereto under the provisions of section 1310, Civil Code. It follows that by virtue of privity, distribution was properly made to their grantees.

[4] The decree of distribution is hereby affirmed. No appeal lies from the order denying appellants' motion for a new trial.

In re IRWIN'S ESTATE.

CROCKER et al. v. RILEY, Controller.

(S. F. 11318.)

1. Taxation ⟸876(2)—Statute, exempting organizations engaged in charitable work from payment of state inheritance tax, construed.

St. 1917, p. 886, § 6, subd. 1, exempting property transferred to societies, corporations, institutions or associations, engaged in charitable work, from payment of state inheritance tax, held to differentiate between a corporation and an unincorporated association, and to grant exemption to both.

2. Charities ⟸20(3)—Legatee of bequest for benefit of charity need not be a corporation.

Legatee of a bequest for benefit of charity need not be a corporation; an unincorporated association being competent to take, in view of Civ. Code, § 1313.

3. Taxation ⟸876(2)—Charitable foundation held to constitute an association within statute exempting property transferred to "associations" from payment of state inheritance tax, though formal functioning consummated subsequent to testatrix's death; "association."

Where organization of trustees into a permanent association to administer a charitable foundation was contemplated by testatrix, and authorized by terms of her will, it constituted an "association," organized or existing under laws of the state within St. 1917, p. 886, § 6, subd. 1, exempting property transferred to associations engaged in charitable work from state inheritance tax, though its formal functioning was consummated subsequent to testatrix's death; "association" being an unincorporated organization composed of a body of men partaking in general form and mode of procedure of characteristics of a corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Association.]

4. Charities ⟸20(4)—Trustees of charitable foundation held not to take bequest in personal capacity.

Where organization of trustees administering charitable foundation into a permanent association was contemplated by testatrix, and authorized by her will, they did not take charitable bequest in their personal capacity, but in capacity of the association, which on death of testatrix became vested with corpus of the trust.

5. Taxation ⟸860—Law should be liberally construed to encourage charitable foundations.

Law should be liberally construed so as to encourage charitable foundations and not to lay heavy burden of inheritance taxes on property devoted to such uses.

6. Taxation ⟸895(1)—Inheritance tax on bequest based upon such an amount as would net amount of legacy after payment of tax.

Inheritance tax on legacy of $100,000, "free and clear of all inheritance taxes," which were directed to be paid from residue of testatrix's estate, was a tax on an amount which, after paying inheritance tax, would net $100,000 to legatees, but the tax upon the residue should be computed after, and not before, the payment of the tax on the legacy of $100,000.

7. Taxation ⟸906—Penalty for deferred payment of inheritance taxes not imposed, where delay in payment caused by litigation possessing sufficient merit to warrant presentation of questions involved to a court for determination.

St. 1917, p. 887, § 7, subd. 2, providing for penalty of 10 per cent. interest for deferred payment of inheritance taxes, held inapplicable, where delay in payment was due to litigation instituted by contestants to determine if any tax was due on legacy to charity foundation, and correctness of amount of tax fixed upon another legacy, and grounds of opposition possessed sufficient merit to warrant their presentation to a court for determination of questions involved.

Myers, C. J., dissenting in part.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Proceeding by Helene Irwin Crocker and others to review the fixing of an inheritance tax on the estate of Fannie M. Irwin, deceased, opposed by Ray L. Riley, as Controller, etc. From an order fixing the tax, both parties appeal. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

P. F. Dunne and J. F. Shuman, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Dion R. Holm, of San Francisco, for respondent.

A. W. Brouillet, of San Francisco (Ralph W. Smith, of Sacramento, of counsel), for Controller.

LENNON, J. These are appeals from an order fixing the inheritance tax upon the transfer by will of certain property of Fannie M. Irwin, deceased. We shall first discuss the questions involved in the appeal of those who, interested in the estate, are contesting the validity of the tax imposed by such order. That appeal involves two distinct questions: (1) The validity of the imposition of a state inheritance tax of $453,854.45 upon the property bequeathed to the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation; and (2) the validity of the imposition of a tax of $7,602.27 upon a legacy of $100,000 to Charles Templeton Crocker rather than an imposition of a tax of $6,690 on said legacy.

The order fixing the inheritance tax shows that Mrs. Irwin died December 6, 1919; that she was at the time of her death a resident of the city and county of San Francisco; and that her will was dated and executed May 6, 1919, and was admitted to probate by the superior court December 29, 1919.

Paragraph 19 of the will, which deals with the establishment of the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation, reads as follows:

"19. I hereby declare it is my intention and purpose to establish, and I do hereby make permanent establishment, of a trust fund, to be known as 'the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation.'

"I do hereby appoint, and give, devise and bequeath to Helene Irwin Crocker, Charles Templeton Crocker, Edward I. Spalding, John D. McKee, and William I. Brobeck, as trustees of 'the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation,' their survivor or survivors, and successors, in perpetuity, the sum of one million dollars ($1,000,000) in United States gold coin, or such number of shares of stock of the William G. Irwin Estate Company, as shall equal, at a fair valuation, said sum, at the election of said trustees, to be by them held as such trustees, and administered to the uses and purposes, and with the powers and authorities herein declared, that is to say,

"(a) To be by them, or the survivor or survivors of them, or their successors, held and administered, as a perpetual charitable fund in trust, to hold, manage and administer the same, and to invest and reinvest the funds thereof in such properties as, in their judgment, or in the judgment of the survivor or survivors of them, or their successors, shall yield the greatest net income consistent with conservative and safe administration thereof, and to pay out the net income thereof to such charitable uses, including medical researches and other scientific uses, designed to promote or improve the physical condition of mankind, as in their judgment may be deemed worthy of support, and to expend, in aid thereof, such amounts, at such times and on such conditions, as to them, or the survivor or survivors of them, or their successors, shall seem proper, provided, always, that the said net income from said foundation shall be expended in aid only of such charitable uses as do or may exist in the Hawaiian Islands or the state of California. * * *

"(b) The said trustees shall have power to sell, convey, partition, divide, mortgage, hypothecate, pledge, lease, let, hold, invest and reinvest, in their discretion, the whole or any part of said trust estate, with the same force and effect as if they were the absolute owners thereof, and they, or the survivor or survivors of them, or their successors, shall receive and be paid the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) each, per annum, in full compensation for all services rendered by them or any of them, in the administration of said trust. Such nominal sum is so named by me to cover the personal expenses which might be incurred by them in the administration of such trust, and not as an expression of my appreciation for, or of, the value of the charitable services which they will render.

"(c) Said trustees shall keep true records of all their transactions. They shall have further power to employ agents, secretaries and attorneys, and to fix and pay their salaries or compensation, and to make by-laws for the government and administration of the trust, and for the appointment of their successors in office; provided that such by-laws shall only be adopted or amended by and with the unanimous consent in writing of all of the trustees.

"Said by-laws may provide for meetings of the trustees, and prescribe the notice upon which meetings shall be called, and for the number of trustees, not less than a majority, who shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of their business, and they may also provide that any acts of the trustees which shall be approved in writing by any number of the trustees less than all, but not less than a majority, shall be as effectual as if done by all."

The will leaves three-quarters of the residue of the estate of the testatrix to her daughter, Helene Irwin Crocker, absolutely. The remaining quarter of the residue, by the terms of the will, goes into an income trust for the benefit of the daughter during her life. Upon the death of the daughter the trust residue is to vest in her children, or issue of the children. If there be no children or issue to take the residuary one-quarter, the same "shall vest and shall be transferred, delivered and paid over to the trustees of said 'the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation,' to be by them held as part of the corpus of said trust and administered accordingly."

The order fixing the inheritance tax adjudged the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation liable for an inheritance tax in the sum of $453,854.45, and assessed and fixed the tax at that sum.

Section 6, subdivision 1, of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1917 governs and controls the liability of the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation for the payment of a state inheritance tax.

Section 6, subdivision 1, of said act reads as follows:

"The following exemptions from the tax are hereby allowed:

"(1) All property transferred to societies, corporations, and institutions now or hereafter exempted by law from taxation, or to any public corporation, or to any society, corporation, institution, or association of persons engaged in or devoted to any charitable, benevolent, educational, public, or other like work (pecuniary profit not being its object or purpose), or to any person, society, corporation, institution, or association of persons in trust for or to be devoted to any charitable, benevolent, educational, or public purpose, by reason whereof any such person or corporation shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectancy, to any such property or to the income thereof, shall be exempt; provided, however, that such society, corporation, institution or association be organized or existing under the laws of this state or that the property transferred be limited for use within this state." Stats. 1917, c. 589, pp. 880 to 902.

[1, 2] We are satisfied that the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation falls within the category of legatees eligible for exemption from taxation under the terms of the proviso to section 6, subdivision 1, of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1917, just quoted, which grants exemption to societies, or associations, organized or existing under the laws of this state. It is not necessary, in our opinion, that the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation should be a corporation rather than an unincorporated association in order to be entitled to the benefit of the exemption.

The proviso does not require that it should be a corporation. On the contrary, it expressly provides that it may be a society, institution or association. The William G. Irwin Charity Foundation aptly answers to the description of an "association." The usual meaning of the term "association" is an "unincorporated organization, composed of a body of men partaking in its general form and mode of procedure of the characteristics of a corporation." Knight v. Stevens, 66 App. Div. 267, 72 N. Y. S. 815. It is not the rule in this state that the legatee of a bequest for the benefit of charity shall be a corporation. An unincorporated association is competent to take. Civ. Code, § 1313; Estate of Winchester, 133 Cal. 271, 65 P. 475, 54 L. R. A. 281. See, also, Estate of Merchant, 143 Cal. 537, 77 P. 475; Estate of Uphams, 127 Cal. 90, 59 P. 315; Kauffmann v. Foster, 3 Cal. App. 741, 86 P. 1108. This being so, clearly it cannot be fairly said that the Legislature intended by the use of the terms "society, corporation, institution or association" to mean only corporations. There can be no escape from the conclusion, it seems to us, that the proviso clearly makes a differentiation between a corporation and an unincorporated association and grants exemption to both.

[3] There can be no question but that the organization of the trustees into a permanent association was contemplated by the testatrix and authorized by the terms of her will. By the will five associates of the testatrix' choice are named as trustees of the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation, and the management of the endowment fund of $1,000,000 is intrusted to these associates, a definite, concrete body, and "their survivor or survivors, and successors, in perpetuity." They are clothed with functions and vested with powers similar to those of a corporation. They were empowered to invest and reinvest the funds, and to pay out the income for the laudable purposes which the testatrix had in view. They were empowered to employ agents, secretaries, and attorneys, and to fix and pay their salaries and compensation. They were required to keep true records of all their transactions, and authorized "to make by-laws for the government and administration of the trust, and for the appointment of their successors in office." The will even goes so far as to specify that the by-laws are to provide for the meetings of those whom the testatrix has designated to govern the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation, for the notice upon which the meetings shall be called, and for the number of trustees not less than a majority which shall constitute a quorum. Tracing its origin and existence to the will of the testatrix, it may be fairly said, we think, that the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation answers the requirement of the proviso that it be an association organized or existing under the laws of this state, although its formal functioning was consummated subsequent to the time of the death of the decedent.

[4] The persons named in the will of Mrs. Irwin do not take the charitable bequest in their personal capacity, or, in other words, as "persons," but do so in the capacity of an association under the name of "the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation," the complete organization of which is provided for in said will, and which only awaited the death of Mrs. Irwin to become eo instante vested with the corpus of the trust. Estate of Graves, 171 N. Y. 40, 63 N. E. 787.

[5] The law should be liberally construed so as to favor and encourage such charitable foundations, and should not be construed so as to lay the heavy burden of inheritance taxes upon the property devoted to such uses, and thus, to the extent of such burden, hamper and limit the resources of the trust intended for such beneficial uses. Blakemore and Bancroft on Inheritance Taxes, § 241, p. 196.

It would be a narrow interpretation of the statute to hold that a testatrix desiring to devote a lawful portion of her property to benevolent, charitable, educational, or public purposes could only do this so as to relieve the income of such property from the inheritance tax by causing her trustees to formally function as a corporation or association under the laws of this state prior to her death and prior to the time when her will became effective and prior to the date when the trust could come into being. In re Graves, supra; Matter of Le Fevre, 233 N. Y. 138, 135 N. E. 203.

The question here presented is similar to that propounded in the case of In re Curtis'

Estate, 88 Vt. 445, 92 A. 965. That case involved a statute strikingly similar to the one under discussion here. The statute there provided that—

"Every person other than the father, mother; * * * and every charitable, educational or religious society or institution other than one created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of this state and having its principal office herein, that shall receive in trust or otherwise a legacy or distributive share consisting of or arising from property or an interest therein passing by will, the law of descent or the decree of a court in this state * * * shall * * * pay to the state a tax of five per cent. of the value in money of such legacy or distributive share."

The question presented therein was whether or not a board of trustees was a "charitable, educational, or religious society or institution, created and existing by virtue of the law of this state and having its principal office herein." The claim was made there, as here, that the society was not in existence at the time of the death of the testator, and that therefore the legacies were not exempt. The court there said that it was only necessary to consider whether the trustees were a society authorized under the terms of the will, and held that the board of trustees was entitled to the benefit of the exemption.

The case of Pierce v. Stevens, 205 Mass. 219, 91 N. E. 319, is cited by respondent to the point that organization of an association prior to the death of the decedent is essential to an avoidance of the tax. That case is not precisely in point here, and is in a material measure distinguishable from the case at bar. No provision was made in the will of the testator, nor was there even a suggestion therein, that the trustees to whom the bequest was made should be an association for the execution of the trust, and it was held in effect that the formation of a corporation by the trustees on their own motion subsequent to the death of the testator for the execution of the trust would not suffice to relieve the bequest from the burden of taxation. Assuming, however, that the case last referred to may be construed as holding as the respondent contends, nevertheless we are satisfied that the better rule is enunciated in the case of In re Curtis' Estate, supra, which is founded, as previously indicated, upon a statute substantially the same as the statute of this state covering and controlling the same subject-matter.

It follows from what we have said that the order fixing the inheritance tax, in so far as it imposes a tax upon the bequest to the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation, is erroneous.

[6] The controversy as to the tax upon a legacy to Charles Templeton Crocker involves the correctness of the manner and method of the computation of the tax. Upon this phase of the case it is insisted that the tax should amount only to $6,690 rather than $7,602.27 as fixed by the decree of the court below. The legacy is given by paragraph 5 of the will, which reads as follows:

"5. I give and bequeath to my son-in-law, Charles Templeton Crocker, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000) in United States gold coin, free and clear of all inheritance taxes, which I direct to be paid from the residue of my estate. This bequest is made as a slight expression of my esteem and affection for him."

In the absence of such a provision as that contained in paragraph 5 of the will that the bequest of $100,000 shall be free and clear of all inheritance taxes and directing the payment of the taxes out of the residue of the estate, it is apparent that the bequest of $100,000 would itself be liable for the payment of the inheritance tax thereon. The actual value of the property therefore transferred to Charles Templeton Crocker by paragraph 5 of the will was not the sum of $100,000, but the sum of $100,000 plus an amount sufficient to permit him to take the $100,000 free from all liability for the inheritance tax, or a total of $107,602.27. That is to say, the amount bequeathed to him by the will was such an amount as would net $100,000 after the payment of the inheritance tax thereon. In short, by making the payment of the tax payable out of the residue of the estate, the legatee was bequeathed an additional amount sufficient to pay the tax and the tax upon the tax ad infinitum.

The amount which the residuary legatee actually received was the residuum after the payment of the inheritance tax upon the bequest of $100,000. It is necessary that the tax upon the distributive interest passed to the residuary legatee be computed, not upon the residue before the payment of the inheritance tax upon the bequest, but upon the residue after the payment of the tax. Estate of Kennedy, 157 Cal. 517, 526, 108 P. 280, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428. It is at once apparent that upon appellants' theory that the tax is to be computed only upon the bequest as specified in actual figures in the will, and upon the residuum after the deduction of the payment of the tax upon the bequest of $100,000, that no tax would be computed upon the money left by the testatrix to be applied to the payment of the inheritance tax upon the various bequests. By this means a testator by a direction to pay all inheritance taxes out of the residue could defeat the payment to the state of the tax on a very substantial part of his estate. The manner and method of computing the tax upon this particular legacy was, we think, correct.

[7] The appeal by Ray L. Riley, as controller, is based upon the ground that the interest rate pursuant to the Inheritance Tax Act of 1917 should have been fixed by the court at 10 per cent. per annum from the date of decedent's death, and not at 7 per cent. per annum from the 6th day of June, 1921, said date being 18 months following the date of the death of the decedent. There is contained in the record a stipulation signed by respective counsel to the effect that "no cause or reason for the fixing of interest at 7 per cent. per annum was shown other than the desire to appeal of Helene Irwin Crocker et al." It is appellant's contention that under these circumstances the provisions of section 7, subdivision 2, of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1917 require the imposition of interest at the rate of 10 per cent. Said section and subdivision read as follows:

"(1) All taxes imposed by this act, unless otherwise herein provided for, shall be due and payable at the death of the decedent, and if the same are paid within eighteen months, no interest shall be charged and collected thereon, but if not so paid, interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum shall be charged and collected from the time said tax accrued. * * * (2) The penalty of ten per cent. per annum imposed by subdivision (1) of this section for the nonpayment of said tax, shall not be charged in cases where, in the judgment of the court, by reason of claims made upon the estate necessary litigation, or other unavoidable cause of delay, the estate of any decedent, or a part thereof, cannot be settled at the end of eighteen months from the death of the decedent; but in such cases seven per cent. per annum shall be charged upon the said tax from the expiration of said eighteen months until the cause of such delay is removed, after which ten per cent. interest per annum shall again be charged until the tax is paid; but litigation to defeat the payment of the tax shall not be considered necessary litigation."

It is insisted by Ray L. Riley, as appellant, that, under the proviso last quoted of subdivision 2 of section 7, the litigation instituted by contestants to determine if any tax was due from the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation and the correctness of the amount of tax fixed upon the legacy to Charles Templeton Crocker cannot be considered necessary litigation, and that the penalty of 10 per cent. interest for the deferred payment of the taxes should have been imposed. In short, appellant insists that the proviso deals with any and all litigation in which the validity of the tax is involved.

Contestants insist that the litigation therein specified must be construed to mean litigation instigated without justification and upon grounds which are not meritorious. The construction insisted upon by contestants seems to us to be the proper one. If the proviso be construed to mean "any or all litigation," it would necessarily follow that even a litigant who had successfully proved in court his contentions as to the invalidity of a tax imposed would be liable for the imposition of the interest of 10 per cent. as a penalty for submitting his objections to a court for adjudication, for even successful litigation would be "litigation to defeat the payment of a tax." Such a result would obviously be an absurdity. As was said in San Joaquin, etc., Irr. Co. v. Stevinson, 164 Cal. 221, 229, 128 P. 924, 927:

" 'Where a statute is fairly susceptible of two constructions one leading inevitably to mischief or absurdity, and the other consisting of sound sense and wise policy, the former should be rejected and the latter adopted.' * * * 'A construction should not be given to a statute, if it can be avoided, which will lead to absurd results, or to a conclusion plainly not contemplated by the Legislature.' "

The state is, of course, interested only in securing the payment of taxes rightfully due, and it cannot have been the intention of the Legislature to coerce, by the threat of a heavy penalty for a resort to the courts, the payment of taxes to which the state may not be rightfully entitled. The result undoubtedly intended to be accomplished by the enactment of the proviso was the prevention of unjustified delay in the payment of taxes rightfully due the state by reason of unnecessary litigation. This result would be accomplished by limiting the imposition of a penalty for resort to the courts to litigation which was unjustified, leaving it for the court to decide in each instance whether or not the litigation was justified. If the litigant be successful, the court necessarily would hold that the litigation was not unnecessary and unjustified. If the litigant be unsuccessful, the court could determine in each case whether the grounds of opposition were or were not meritorious. Such a construction of the proviso is much more fair and just to both sides of a controversy involving a tax than the strict and harsh construction insisted upon by the appellant.

In view of the construction of the provision which we deem to be the correct one, the question of its constitutionality, if another construction be given, need not be discussed and decided.

The grounds of opposition presented by counsel for the estate possessed sufficient merit in our opinion to warrant their presentation to a court for a determination of the questions involved. Inasmuch as no penalty was imposed, this doubtless was also the opinion of the court below. The fixing of the interest rate at 7 per cent. commencing 18 months after the death of the decedent without the imposition of a penalty, was therefore correct.

The order, in so far as it relates to the fixing of the inheritance tax upon the bequest made to the William G. Irwin Charity Foundation, is reversed.

That portion of the order fixing the tax upon the bequest to Charles Templeton Crocker is affirmed.

Likewise the order fixing the rate of interest upon the tax due upon the bequest to Charles Templeton Crocker is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; WASTE, J.; LAWLOR, J.; SHENK, J.

MYERS, C. J. I dissent from so much of the decision herein as relates to the fixing of the inheritance tax upon the bequest made to the William G. Irwin Foundation. The question involved relates solely to the construction to be given to the language of our own statute. So far as the decisions of other courts which have a bearing upon this question are concerned, I find no substantial preponderance of authority either way.

It seems to me plainly apparent that the alternative conditions expressed in the proviso to subdivision 1 of section 6 were intended to be taken distributively, reddendo singula singulis. Sargent v. Shumaker, 193 Cal. 122, 127, 223 P. 972. The first of such conditions relates to transfers to any society, etc., engaged in or devoted to charitable work. The second relates to transfers in trust for any charitable purpose. This subdivision should therefore be read as if it provided at length as follows (eliminating the portions which are foreign to the question here under consideration):

"All property transferred * * * to any society, corporation, institution, or association of persons, engaged in or devoted to any charitable * * * work * * * shall be exempt; provided, however, that such society, corporation, institution or association be organized or existing under the laws of this state.

"All property transferred * * * to any person, society, corporation, institution, or association of persons, in trust for or to be devoted to any charitable * * * purpose * * * shall be exempt; provided, however, that the property transferred be limited for use within this state."

The situation which confronted the testatrix, therefore, was that, in order to secure the statutory exemption for her proposed bequest, she was required to adopt one of two alternatives, either (1) to bequeath the fund to a society, corporation, institution, or association actually engaged in or devoted to a charitable work and which was existing under the laws of this state, or (2) to bequeath the fund in trust for a charitable purpose limited for use within this state. As the bequest herein does not conform to either of these alternatives, I am of the opinion that it is not entitled to the claimed exemption.

I concur with the majority opinion as to the other two points decided herein.

In re SHAY'S ESTATE.

FIRST TRUST & SAVINGS BANK OF PASADENA et al. v. SHAY et al.

(L. A. 8244.)

1. Wills ⟹31—Show of utter incapacity essential to overthrow will.

In contest of will for testamentary incapacity, mere proof of mental derangement or insanity in medical sense is not sufficient, but such complete mental degeneration as denotes utter incapacity to know and understand what law prescribes as essential to making valid will, or the existence of a specific insane delusion which affected will in question, must be proved.

2. Wills ⟹52(6) — Evidence insufficient to overcome presumption of testamentary capacity.

In attempt to overthrow will of 77 year old man, evidence that he suffered intensely from cancer of the bladder, looked sick, on one occasion seemed not to recognize neighbor or understand business neighbor had come about, and that at one time he had difficulty in understanding a daughter-in-law's conversation, held insufficient to overcome presumption of testamentary capacity.

3. Wills ⟹49—Illiteracy has no bearing upon testamentary capacity.

That testator was uneducated and illiterate, unable to read handwriting, and unable to write, except to sign his name, held to have no bearing upon his mental sanity or testamentary capacity.

4. Wills ⟹55(3)—Mistaken belief that daughter was drug addict held not insane delusion sufficient to show testamentary incapacity.

In suit to overthrow will, proof that testator had expressed belief that a daughter was addicted to liquor and drugs, where in fact she was not, held not sufficient proof of testamentary incapacity, in absence of any showing that belief was without reason or evidence, or adhered to against reason and evidence, since an insane delusion to invalidate a will must be belief which is spontaneous product of a diseased mind, coming into existence without, and adhered to against, reason and evidence.

5. Wills ⟹166(2)—Proof of undue influence by testator's daughter insufficient.

In attempt to overthrow will, proof that daughter with whom testator had been living sent for brother to have new will made when testator was seriously ill, and that she knew of execution of will and its provisions prior to death of testator, whereas none of other children except the brother she sent for did, held insufficient proof of undue influence, notwithstanding she was in confidential relationship with testator and profited unduly by will, in absence of any proof that she was active in procuring execution.

6. Wills ⟹166(2)—Evidence of undue influence by son of testator insufficient.

In attempt to overthrow will, where one of testator's sons was called when he was ill and transacted testator's business for several weeks before mentioning making will, evidence that he thereupon took notes from testator, at latter's request, for manner of disposing of property, and took them to intimate friend of testator for preparation of will, which son read paragraph by paragraph to testator, who approved thereof, and then left town before execution of will, held insufficient to show undue influence, notwithstanding son sustained confidential relationship for testator in absence of any undue profit by him under will or any show that he actively procured execution of will.

7. Wills ⊂⊃163(4)—Facts held not within rule that one in confidential relationship who unduly profits by will and has actually participated in procuring it has burden of proving no fraud.

Fact that legatee was not active in procuring execution of will held not to bring facts within rule that one who unduly profits by will and is in confidential relationship with testator and actually participated in procuring execution of will has burden of showing that it was not induced by coercion or fraud.

8. Wills ⊂⊃82—Disposition of property to children, though in unequal amounts, is not an "unnatural will."

Testamentary disposition of property to children, including all the natural objects of testator's bounty, though in unequal amounts, is not an "unnatural will," which expression is applied to disposition of estate or large portion thereof to strangers, to exclusion of natural objects of testator's bounty without apparent reason.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Unnatural Will.]

9. Wills ⊂⊃82—Court or jury may not pass on injustice of distribution among children.

Court or jury is not entitled to substitute its opinion for that of testator as to whether distribution of property among children is unjust, or to determine whether reasons present in mind of testator for discrimination among them were good or bad.

10. Wills ⊂⊃166(10)—No fraud in son in failing to correct testator's belief that daughter was drug addict.

In attempt to overthrow will which testator had dictated to son to have transcribed, failure of son to correct testator's mistaken belief, expressed during dictation, and shown by property disposition, that one of daughters was liquor and drug addict held not to show fraud, in absence of any showing that son had basis for knowing whether belief was correct or not.

11. Appeal and error ⊂⊃930(1)—Evidence will be most strongly construed in support of verdict on appeal.

Upon reviewing sufficiency of evidence, it will be construed most strongly in support of verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Application by George W. Shay and others for probate of the will of Henry J. Shay, deceased, opposed by William Shay and another. From judgment revoking probate, contestees appeal. Reversed.

R. W. Richardson, of Los Angeles, and Cruickshank, Brooke & Evans, and J. Russell Morton, all of Pasadena, for appellants.

Louis F. Laberere, John A. Cronin, and Collier & Laberere, all of Los Angeles, and Clifford P. Grua, of South Pasadena, for respondents.

MYERS, C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment revoking the probate of a will upon a contest thereof instituted after probate. The will in question was executed February 27, 1922, about four months prior to the testator's death. The testator's next of kin at the time of the execution of the will and at the time of his death consisted of two daughters and four sons of the testator, all of whom were of mature years, and all of whom are parties hereto, either as contestants or defendants. The estate, which consisted of real and personal property of the aggregate value of $21,500, was disposed of by the will as follows: After making provision for the payment of debts and expenses, $500 was provided for the erection of a monument upon the family burial lot and $100 for the saying of masses. Two thousand dollars was bequeathed in trust to pay the income thereof to the testator's daughter Ellen, one of the contestants herein, during the term of her life, and upon her death to distribute the principal among the testator's descendants then living, to take by right of representation. One thousand dollars was bequeathed in trust to pay the income thereof to testator's son William, one of the contestants herein, during his life, and upon his death to distribute the principal among the testator's descendants then living, to take by right of representation. The testator's home place, consisting of a house and lot, together with the household furniture, apppraised at $4,500, was devised to the testator's daughter Margaret, with whom the testator lived for several years immediately preceding and up to the time of his death. The remainder of the estate was bequeathed in equal shares to the daughter Margaret and the sons Edward, George and Daniel, defendants and appellants herein. The grounds of contest were unsoundness of mind and undue influence and fraud alleged to have been exercised by the daughter Margaret and the son George. The jury found in favor of contestants upon each of these issues, and the judgment revoking the probate of the will followed. Numerous points are presented and argued by appellants, but they resolve themselves in the main to the contention that the evidence was insufficient as a matter of law to sustain each of the findings of the jury.

[1-3] It is well settled that mere proof of mental derangement or even of insanity in a medical sense is not sufficient to invalidate a will, but the contestant is required to go further and prove either such a complete mental degeneration as denotes utter incapacity to know and understand those things which the law prescribes as essential to the making of a valid will, or the existence of a specific insane delusion which affected the making of the will in question. Estate of Russell, 189 Cal. 759, 769, 210 P. 249. Upon the question of general testamentary capacity we find no evidence in the record which conflicts with the conclusion that the testator at the time of the making of the will understood the nature of the business in which he was engaged; that he had a recollection of the property he meant to dispose of and of the persons to whom he desired to bequeath it and of the manner in which he desired to distribute it. This being so it follows that the evidence was insufficient to overcome the presumption of sanity in these respects. The evidence relied upon by respondents in this connection shows that the testator was 77 years of age; that he was suffering from cancer of the bladder, with which he had been afflicted for some time, and from which he ultimately died; that at times he suffered intense pain therefrom, but that he was able to be up and dressed and about the house nearly every day; that on Saturday, 2 days prior to the execution of the will, when his son William called to see him, "he was lying on the couch. I went over to look at him, and he turned part way around, and his eyes seemed glassy, and he was awful sick"; that some time during the January preceding the making of the will a daughter-in-law of the testator called upon him while he was at the hospital following an operation, when he seemed to be in a stupor and did not recognize her; that a neighbor called to see the testator at a time which may have been a week or 10 days following the execution of the will when he was in bed sick and did not speak to her and did not give any sign of recognition; that a month or two prior to the execution of the will a neighbor, upon whose property the testator held a mortgage, concerning which there was "a little trouble," called upon testator to discuss the matter, and testified in effect that testator did not seem to be able to readily understand what the witness wanted; that a daughter-in-law of the testator upon an occasion in January preceding the execution of the will, in a conversation with testator, had to repeat things to him two or three times before he understood what she meant. The circumstance that the testator was uneducated and illiterate, unable to read handwriting, and unable to write, except to sign his name, manifestly has no bearing upon his mental sanity or testamentary capacity. All the witnesses who testified directly as to testator's mental condition stated unequivocally that in their opinion he was sane and of sound mind. But, disregarding this, and giving consideration only to the testimony most favorable to contestants upon this issue, it is utterly insufficient to sustain a finding of general testamentary incapacity. Estate of Holloway (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 1012; Estate of Casarotti, 184 Cal. 73, 192 P. 1085; Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 663, 164 P. 1110; Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 P. 932; Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 86 P. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795; Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 113 P. 130; Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 451, 221 P. 361.

[4] There remains to consider under this issue the question of the ability of the testator to know or understand his relation to the natural objects of his bounty, and this brings us to a consideration of respondents' claim of insane delusions. This rests solely upon the circumstance that the testator, when dictating the terms of the will, expressed a belief that his daughter Ellen was addicted to the use of liquor and drugs, and stated in effect that the trust provision for her benefit was because of his fear that she would squander the money. The evidence shows that this daughter was neither a drunkard, a drug addict, nor a spendthrift, and it is argued that the will is therefore the product of a delusion which affected the testamentary purpose of the testator. But the existence of a mere delusion; that is to say, a false or mistaken belief concerning the existence of a fact, does not affect testamentary capacity. A delusion to invalidate a will must be an insane delusion, that is to say, a belief which is the spontaneous product of a diseased mind, which comes into existence without reason or evidence to support it, and which is adhered to against reason and against the evidence. Estate of Scott, 128 Cal. 57, 60 P. 527; Estate of Kendrick, 130 Cal. 360, 62 P. 605; Estate of Perkins (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 45; Estate of Allen, 177 Cal. 668, 171 P. 686; Estate of Hess, 183 Cal. 589, 192 P. 35; Estate of Calef, 139 Cal. 673, 73 P. 539. There is nothing in the record to indicate that this belief of the testator mistaken though it may have been, was without reason or evidence, or that it was adhered to against reason or against evidence. The finding of testamentary incapacity is not sustained by the evidence.

[5-9] On the issue of undue influence the charges made against the defendants George and Margaret are many and serious, but the evidence in support thereof is for the most part insubstantial and purely conjectural. That chiefly relied upon by respondents is, when construed most strongly in support of the verdict, to the following effect: The daughter Margaret was living with the testator at his home in Pasadena. William also lived in Pasadena, while George and Edward lived in Pennsylvania. There was some ill feeling between Margaret and George on one side and Ellen and William on the other. The testator had 8 years previously executed a will by which, after making bequests for masses and a monument, he had divided his estate into six equal parts, one of which was bequeathed to each of his children, except that portion set apart for Ellen was bequeathed in trust to pay the income to her during her life, together with so much of the principal as she might urgently need, with remainder over at her death to the testator's children who might then be surviving. This will remained in the custody of William, who was named therein as executor, but it was believed by the testator to have been lost. Upon several occasions during the few years preceding the execution of the will here under attack Margaret had expressed an intention of sending for her brother George to have a new will made. In the latter part of January, 1922, when testator was seriously ill, Margaret sent a telegram to George requesting him to come, and a letter explaining that their father had some business to attend to, in response to which George and Edward came to California to visit their father. George did not advise his brother William of his arrival in Pasadena, and was there about a week before William learned of his presence. While there he assisted his father in the preparation of an income tax return, and when he had been there about 3 weeks George mentioned the subject of a will to his father. Thereupon the father requested George to get a pencil and paper and take notes of the manner in which he desired to leave his property, and then to take those notes to the testator's intimate friend, John McDonald, and request the latter to have a will prepared in accordance therewith. This was done, and Mr. McDonald turned the notes over to counsel for the First Trust & Savings Bank, of which he was an officer, for the drafting of the will. When this had been done George called at Mr. McDonald's office and procured a copy of the proposed will, which he read to his father paragraph by paragraph, and the latter expressed himself as satisfied therewith. It was then arranged that Mr. McDonald would call at testator's house, bringing with him witnesses for the execution of the will. Before this had been done George left Pasadena upon his return to his home in Pennsylvania and upon the same day after George had departed the testator went alone to Mr. McDonald's office, stating that he had come to execute the will, and that he desired to save Mr. McDonald the trouble of bringing witnesses to his house. The will was then again read to the testator in the presence of Mr. McDonald, the latter's son, and his secretary, Miss Christ; was executed in their presence, and they signed the same as subscribing witnesses, no one else being present. The three subscribing witnesses were wholly disinterested, and were, in effect, strangers to all of the parties to this litigation, though Mr. McDonald, Senior, was and had been for many years an intimate friend of the testator. There is evidence from which it may be inferred that the daughter Margaret knew of the execution of this will and of the nature of its provisions prior to the death of the testator, whereas none of the other children other than George knew that such a will had been executed. This evidence falls far short of showing such undue influence as in effect destroyed the testator's free agency and overpowered his volition at the time of the making of the will. Estate of Holloway, supra; Estate of Relph, supra; Estate of Newhall, 190 Cal. 709, 214 P. 231, 28 A. L. R. 778; Estate of Kilborn, 162 Cal. 4, 120 P. 762; Estate of Baird, 176 Cal. 384, 168 P. 561; Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 82 P. 57; Estate of Gleason, 164 Cal. 756, 130 P. 872. Respondents, perhaps realizing this insufficiency, invoke the rule that, where one who unduly profits by the will sustains a confidential relationship to the testator, and actually participates in procuring the execution of the will, the burden is upon him to show that the will was not induced by coercion or fraud. Estate of Gallo, 61 Cal. App. 163, 175, 214 P. 496. But the facts of this case do not bring it within the purview of this rule. It may be conceded that Margaret and George sustained a confidential relationship toward the testator. It may be further conceded that Margaret unduly profited by the will, although the fact that she had lived with and constantly cared for the testator throughout the last years of his life would seem to afford a perfectly good reason for his preferment of her. But there is no evidence that she was active in procuring the execution of the will, or that she participated therein to any extent. There is no evidence that she even knew of the execution of the will until some time thereafter. The circumstances above mentioned of her expressed intention to send for George to have a will made, and the fact that she did send for him, do no more than give ground for a suspicion that she may have participated in procuring the will to be executed. But a finding to that effect based upon such evidence would be the product of speculation and conjecture. The things done by George in this connection as above related, when measured by the decisions, do not constitute such activity in procuring the execution of the will as to bring this rule into operation. Estate of Anderson, 185 Cal. 700, 198 P. 407; Estate of Morcel, 162 Cal. 188, 121 P. 733; Estate of Calef, supra; Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. 257, 104 P. 6; Estate of Lavinburg, 161 Cal. 536, 119 P.

915; Estate of Purcell, supra. Neither can it be said that he will unduly profit from this will. The amount which he will receive under it is substantially the same as he would have received under the will executed in 1914, which is asserted by respondents to have been wholly valid and free from any suspicion of fraud or undue influence. The amount which he will receive under this will is but slightly greater than he would have received had the testator died intestate. Much is said in respondent's brief upon the subject of an unjust and unnatural will and the inference of undue influence to be deduced therefrom. That expression is usually applied in a case where a testator leaves his estate or a large portion thereof to strangers to the exclusion of the natural objects of his bounty without apparent reason therefor. The will here under attack cannot be said to be an unnatural will. Estate of Packer, 164 Cal. 525, 129 P. 778. By it the testator made provision for all of the natural objects of his bounty. That he did not provide for them equally is but to say that he exercised his legal right of testamentary disposition instead of leaving his estate to be distributed according to the law of succession. Whether or not the will is unjust is a matter of opinion, as to which we have no right to substitute the opinions of the jurors or of the members of this court for that of the testator. The evidence discloses that there were reasons present in the mind of the testator for the discrimination against these contestants. Whether those reasons were good or bad was not for the jurors to say and is not for this court to determine.

[10] Upon the issue of fraud contestants made numerous charges of fraudulent misrepresentations of fact alleged to have been made to the testator by Margaret and George for the purpose of inducing him to execute a will favoring them, to the detriment of contestants. At the trial contestants produced no evidence which even tended to substantiate any of those charges. The sole evidence upon which they now rely as supporting the finding of fraud is found in the testimony of George. He testified that when his father was dictating to him the provisions to be included in his proposed will the father expressed a belief that his daughter Ellen was addicted to the use of liquor or drugs. Respondents argue that because George failed to contradict this statement and did not endeavor to disabuse his father's mind of this belief he must be held guilty of fraud. Respondents invoke the rule that, "where there exists a relationship of trust and confidence, it is the duty of one in whom the confidence is reposed to make full disclosure of all material facts within his knowledge relating to the transaction in question and any concealment of material facts is a fraud." 12 Cal. Jur. 772. The rule is a sound one, but has no application to the situation here in question. Assuming, without deciding, that the situation was such as to make it the duty of George to disclose to the testator any facts of which he had knowledge which would have a bearing upon the provisions to be included in the will, it does not appear that he had any knowledge whatsoever as to the truth or falsity of this belief of the testator. On the contrary, it does appear by uncontradicted evidence that he had not seen nor heard from his sister for 6 years last past, and that he had no knowledge as to whether she was or was not addicted to the use of liquor or drugs. He cannot be held guilty of fraud in failing to disclose facts of which he had no knowledge.

[11] We are not unmindful of the rule that upon a review of the sufficiency of the evidence it must be construed most strongly in support of the verdict, and, in cases of conflict, the evidence which tends to support the verdict must be accepted as true, and that which conflicts with it rejected, and, where conflicting inferences may reasonably be deduced from facts proved, those must be adopted which tend to support the verdict. Giving full application to this rule, however, we are of the opinion that the evidence herein is insufficient to support any of the findings in favor of the contestants. The claimed errors of law for the most part resolve themselves upon analysis into the same contention, namely, the insufficiency of the evidence, and do not require separate consideration herein.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.; SEAWELL, J.; LAWLOR, J.; LENNON, J.; WASTE, J.

FINK & SCHINDLER CO. v. GAVROS et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 19, 1925. Rehearing Denied June 18, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 16, 1925.)

1. Judgment ⊂⊃155—Notices of motion to vacate defaults held sufficient to apprise plaintiff that relief was from mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect.

Notices of motion stating that motion would be "made and based on records, proceedings herein, this notice and papers copies of which are attached," and thereto were attached affidavits and proposed answers, held sufficient to apprise plaintiff that motion sought relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, and grounds of motion were alleged mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect of defendants within section 1010.

⊂⊃For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

2. Judgment ⟸143(3) — Facts held not to show "misunderstanding, mistake, or excusable neglect" of one defendant.

That defendant jointly sued with another made no effort to employ counsel until after default, and that denials of his verified answer were in form of negative pregnant admitting value of labor and materials were of any sum less than amount sued for, was not evidence of misunderstanding, mistake, or excusable neglect within Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

3. Judgment ⟸162(4)—Failure to answer on account of sickness held due to "mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect."

Evidence of verified answer and affidavit that defendant consulted attorney and intended to employ him, but, due to sickness, did not demur or answer before default, held to sufficiently show "mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect" within Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

4. Judgment ⟸143(3)—Granting relief from default not abuse of discretion.

Where failure to demur or answer complaint was alleged to be due to sickness of defendant, and verified answer alleged value of work and materials sued for was not greater than named sum, there was no abuse of discretion in granting relief from default.

5. Judgment ⟸160—Affidavit of merits to vacate default held sufficient.

Affidavit of merits of defendant and attorneys to vacate default alleging that defendant had stated facts fully and fairly to his attorneys, and was advised he had good and meritorious defense to action, with allegations of verified answer served and filed, held sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the Fink & Schindler Company against John Gavros and others. Judgment by default was rendered for plaintiff, and, from an order vacating and setting it aside as to the defendant named and defendant George Panagiotaros, plaintiff appeals. Reversed as to defendant first named. Affirmed as to defendant Panagiotaros.

George W. Walker, of San Francisco (Russell W. Cantrell, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Julian H. Biddle, of San Francisco, for respondent Gavros.

Franklyn M. O'Brien, of San Francisco, for respondent Panagiotaros.

CASHIN, J. Appeal by the Fink & Schindler Company, a corporation, from an order of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, vacating and setting aside as to each of the respondents John Gavros and George Panagiotaros a default judgment entered therein.

The facts are as follows: The appellant, on January 15, 1924, filed its complaint against respondents in said court, alleging an indebtedness of $1,404, with interest, based on two counts—one for the reasonable value of materials and labor furnished; the other for such materials and labor at the agreed price alleged as above. Summons was served on respondents in said city and county on January 21, 1924. Thereafter, respondents not having demurred or answered to the complaint, judgment for the amount prayed was on February 14, 1924, entered against them. Thereafter, on February 27, 1924, respondents separately served and filed their motions to vacate the judgment of default, which motion was on April 1, 1924, granted, with permission to file their proposed separate answers, on condition that the appellant be paid the sum of $50, which sum was by respondents deposited with the clerk of the court. The affidavit attached to appellant's complaint as a verification, made by its attorney, was not in substance or form sufficient to constitute a verification thereof under the provisions of section 446 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] It is urged by appellant that respondents' several motions were insufficient in that the notices failed to state the grounds thereof in accordance with section 1010 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that no facts were stated in the attached affidavits and answers showing diligence, mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect on their part or a defense to the action, and that the court, in granting the motion, abused its discretion.

The notices of motion each stated that the motion would be "made and based on the records, proceedings herein, this notice and papers copies of which are attached herewith," and thereto were attached the affidavits and proposed answers referred to. We are of the opinion that the notices with the papers attached were sufficient to apprise appellant that the motion sought relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the grounds of the motion were the alleged mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect of respondents. Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525, 137 P. 263, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 737; Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 150 P. 353.

Respondent Gavros, by affidavit in support of his motion, states that on January 23, 1924, he consulted attorney James J. McEntee, Jr., who had also been consulted by respondent Panagiotaros; that respondents were jointly interested in the matters alleged in the complaint; that he did not employ Mr. McEntee, believing that his interests would be protected by the attorney in representing Panagiotaros. It further appears from the affidavits of Mr. McEntee and from his testimony taken at the hearing on the motions, with the affidavit of respondent Panagiotaros in support of the Gavros motion, that Mr. McEntee was not employed by Gavros, and, according to Mr. McEntee, he was not employed by either respondent, but requested to procure by stipulations from appellant an extension for each until February 10, 1924, within which time to plead, and which stipulations were obtained. Respondent Gavros, relying on the belief as stated, made no effort to procure the assistance of counsel until after the entry of judgment. His verified answer denied on information and belief the corporate existence of appellant, and conjunctively the allegations of both counts of the complaint; as to the first count denying that the reasonable value of the merchandise and labor was the sum of $1,404, and, as to the second, that the agreed price thereof was said sum. The denials in the form of a negative pregnant admitted that the value of the labor and materials and the agreed prices therefor were of a value and agreed price of any sum less than $1,404. Schroeder v. Mauzy, 16 Cal. App. 443, 118 P. 459.

The evidence presented in support of the motion of respondent Panagiotaros was that he had consulted Mr. McEntee, knew the necessity of filing his answer before the expiration of the time fixed by the stipulation; that he understood and believed that the attorney had undertaken to represent him; that an engagement had been made with Mr. McEntee for a meeting on the day before the last day for answer for the purpose of preparing his answer to the complaint; that on the day before the day of the engagement said respondent became ill, and as a result of the illness became incapacitated for a period including the day of the engagement and for several days after the last day for appearance in the action; that he failed for that reason to visit the attorney, and did not communicate with him until after the entry of judgment. The attorney, not understanding that respondent finally and definitely intended to employ him, and not hearing from respondent on the agreed day, and not knowing his address, believed that other counsel had been employed, and made no appearance by demurrer or answer in the action, and under such belief stated to counsel for appellant before the entry of the default that he did not intend to appear for respondent. It further appears that no payment as a retainer or for costs had been made. The verified answer filed by respondent Panagiotaros was, as to its denials, in form substantially the same as that of Gavros, but, as a special answer and defense, alleged that there was no agreement as to price as averred in the complaint, and that the merchandise and labor furnished were of the reasonable value of $550 and no more.

On these facts the trial court concluded that the default was due to mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect on the part of respondents; that each had a defense to the action on the merits, and that the default and judgment should be set aside.

[2] We are of the opinion that the evidence on which the court based its conclusion as to respondent Gavros was wholly insufficient to support it; that no misunderstanding, mistake, or excusable neglect was shown as to him which would warrant relief under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure.

[3, 4] As to respondent Panagiotaros, we cannot say that the evidence does not reasonably support the conlusion of the court that his failure to answer was due to his mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect. All presumptions being indulged in favor of the court's action, we cannot say that it abused its discretion in granting relief to respondent Panagiotaros. Moore v. Thompson, 138 Cal. 23, 70 P. 930; Smith v. Pelton Water Wheel Co., 151 Cal. 394, 90 P. 934; Johnson v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 124 P. 426.

[5] Appellant urges the further point that the affidavit of merits filed by respondent Panagiotaros was insufficient. The affidavits of said respondent and his attorneys set forth that he had stated the facts of the case fully and fairly to his attorneys, and was advised that he had a good and meritorious defense to the action. This, with the allegations of the verified answer served and filed, was in our opinion sufficient.

The order is reversed as to respondent John Gavros and affirmed as to respondent George Panagiotaros.

CHAVEZ v. TIMES-MIRROR CO.
(Civ. 5178.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 19, 1925.)

1. Libel and slander ⟹112(3)—Evidence held to sustain verdict for defendant on plea that publication was truthful.

Evidence in libel suit in which defendant pleaded truth of publication held not to justify interference with verdict for defendant.

2. Damages ⟹87(2)—Exemplary damages not recoverable, unless right to compensatory damages established.

Under Civ. Code, § 3294, exemplary damages are not recoverable in any case, unless plaintiff establishes his right to compensatory damages.

3. Appeal and error ⟹1056(4)—Exclusion of evidence directed to recovery of exemplary damages harmless, where jury found that plaintiff not entitled to actual damages.

Jury having found, in action for libel, that plaintiff was not entitled to actual damages, exclusion of evidence as to value of defendant's business, directed to recovery of exemplary damages, was harmless.

⟹For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

4. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1068(4)—No prejudice from exclusion of question of exemplary damages, where jury found that plaintiff not entitled to actual damages.

Jury having found, in action for libel, that publication was true statement, and that plaintiff was not entitled to actual damages, plaintiff suffered no prejudice by reason of instruction that no exemplary or punitive damages could be awarded because there was no showing of evil motive or actual malice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action for damages for libel by E. V. Chavez against the Times-Mirror Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Satterwhite and E. V. Chavez, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Daniel M. Hunsaker and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment against him in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged libelous publication. This matter came before the Supreme Court of this state upon an appeal from a judgment entered after a demurrer to the complaint had been sustained, and the opinion filed upon that appeal is reported in 185 Cal., at page 20, 195 P. 666. Therein the judgment was reversed. We shall not repeat herein the statement of facts, but merely refer to the former opinion, which fully embodies them. In that opinion the complaint was carefully analyzed, and many of the statements in the article complained of are designated as fair comment, provided there was truth in the statement that the plaintiff had circulated "a deliberate lie maliciously framed." The Supreme Court said that the quoted language necessarily implied full knowledge on the part of plaintiff of the untruth of the statement on the card as to Walton J. Wood and a deliberate statement thereof with such knowledge.

On the coming down of the remittitur, the demurrer was overruled, and the defendant answered the complaint. After denying certain of its allegations, for further defense, it was alleged that the article published by defendant, of which complaint was made, was true. Upon this issue between the parties the jury was instructed:

"This article on its face, if untrue, is libelous per se. * * * Therefore the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict at your hands, unless it is established that the article in its gist or substance is true. Defendant pleads in its answer that the article in its gist and substance is true. If this plea is established, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and your verdict must be for defendant."

Also:

"The plaintiff is not required to show that it was false, but the law places upon the defendant * * * the burden of alleging and proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the defamatory statements contained in the publication were true."

The jury brought in a verdict that the defendant recover its costs from the plaintiff. There is testimony in the record to support this verdict. Appellant sets out in his brief portions of the record which he contends disprove the charge that the statement made by him was a "deliberate lie, maliciously framed." If the jury had believed the explanation of plaintiff, it might have reached a different verdict, with which this court would not have interfered upon appeal; but the jury was not bound to accept this testimony. It had a right to draw contrary inferences from all the facts and circumstances of the case, and to believe that the plaintiff, as a practicing attorney in Los Angeles for over 11 years, knew that Walton J. Wood was not a superior judge, but that he was the public defender. Mr. Wood had occupied the latter position for 5 years at the time the plaintiff made the statement commented upon by the defendant; he had been actively engaged in the trial of cases in the courts, and had been mentioned frequently in the newspapers. Plaintiff testified that he had secured his information as to the candidacy of certain superior judges to succeed themselves from the newspaper. There was ample reason, afforded by the facts and circumstances appearing in the record, to warrant the jury in concluding that plaintiff knew that Walton J. Wood was not a judge of the superior court at the time he made the statement of that fact. There is equally good reason, evident from the record, for the jury to believe that the plaintiff did not include, inadvertently, the name of Walton J. Wood as a judge of the superior court in the place and stead of J. Perry Wood, a judge of the superior court. The plaintiff gave such an explanation of his conduct, but it also appeared that J. Perry Wood was not a candidate for re-election at that time, and his name had not been mentioned in any of the newspapers for re-election. Certainly the record in this case would not warrant an interference with the conclusion reached by the jury upon the questions of fact involved.

[1, 2] Complaint is made of rulings relating to the admission of evidence directed to the recovery of exemplary damages. It is contended that the court should have received evidence as to the value of the business of defendant. Discussion of this matter becomes unnecessary because the jury has found that plaintiff is not entitled to actual damages. Exemplary damages are not recoverable in any case, unless plaintiff establishes his right to compensatory damages. Civ. Code, § 3294; Pickwick Stages v. Board of Trustees, 54 Cal. App. 730, 731, 215 P. 558; Gilham v. Devereaux, 67 Mont. 75, 214 P. 606, 33 A. L. R. 381. As stated in Yaeger v. So. Cal. Ry. Co., 5 Cal. Unrep, 870, 51 P. 190:

"The jury having found, as we must assume, that there was no damage, plaintiff was not injured by excluding evidence that went to enhance that to which he was found not entitled."

[3] What has just been said applies with equal force to the complaint of appellant that the court erred in instructing the jury that, in view of the record, no exemplary or punitive damages could be awarded because there was no showing of evil motive or actual malice. Had the jury found the plaintiff entitled to actual damages, the correctness of this instruction would have been a vital consideration upon appeal, but, since we must assume that under the instructions the jury found that the publication in question was a true statement, there is no right to recover either actual or exemplary damages, and no prejudice is suffered by plaintiff by reason of any action of the trial court in regard to the question of exemplary damages.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SPRADO. (Cr. 829.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 11, 1925. Rehearing Denied June 10, 1925.)

1. Embezzlement ⊂⊃49—Verdict of guilty of "petit" embezzlement held direct and certain.

In prosecution for embezzlement, in violation of Pen. Code, § 508, verdict finding defendant guilty of "crime of petit embezzlement, within said charge as charged in the information," and fixing value of property embezzled "under $200," held to be direct and certain; it not being necessary that jury specifically find and fix value of property, and word "petit" meaning anything petty or small, clearly shows that offense was that of misdemeanor embezzlement.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Petit.]

2. Embezzlement ⊂⊃44(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

Evidence held to sustain conviction of misdemeanor embezzlement, in violation of Pen. Code, § 508.

3. Embezzlement ⊂⊃44(2)—That employee conceived intent to fraudulently convert property to his own use during tenure of his employment need not be shown.

To establish crime of embezzlement by employee, in violation of Pen. Code, §§ 508, 509, by fraudulently appropriating property of employer to his own use, it need not be shown that he conceived intent to fraudulently convert property while still an employee, as it is sufficient if it be shown that property came into his control by virtue of his employment.

4. Criminal law ⊂⊃1168(2)—Admission of testimony on rebuttal held not prejudicial, where relevant and material and not cumulative.

Admission of testimony on rebuttal, while not strictly rebuttal testimony, was not prejudicial, where it was relevant and material and not cumulative of other testimony.

5. Criminal law ⊂⊃409—Place, persons present, and time held not prerequisites to introduction of testimony of conversation relating merely to testimony of substantive fact.

Where question calling for conversation by witness with defendant was not for impeachment purposes, but called for testimony of statement by defendant amounting to admission, the place where, persons present, and time when, conversation took place, were not necessary to be shown as prerequisites.

6. Criminal law ⊂⊃1186(4)—Refusal to permit defendant to explain circumstance of incriminating nature held not to require reversal, in view of conclusive evidence of defendant's guilt.

In prosecution of defendant for embezzlement of radio from his employer, in violation of Pen. Code, § 508, defendant having sold radio to another and had check drawn in his wife's name, refusal to permit defendant to explain why check was drawn in his wife's name, though error, held not to require reversal, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, where defendant's guilt was conclusively shown.

7. Criminal law ⊂⊃719(4)—Erroneous refusal to permit explanation of incriminating circumstance not ground for denying district attorney right to comment thereon in argument.

Fact that it was error for court not to allow defendant to explain circumstance of incriminating nature was no reason for denying district attorney right to comment on same in argument to jury.

8. Criminal law ⊂⊃1170(4)—Exclusion of testimony as to conversation held harmless, where later admitted.

Refusal to permit defendant to give substance of conversation with another, in which other was alleged to have given defendant permission to retain radio equipment, for alleged embezzlement of which defendant is being prosecuted, was harmless, where court later allowed defendant to state such conversation.

9. Criminal law ⊂⊃1141(2)—Duty of counsel to show appellate court how trial court erred in refusing to give requested instructions.

It is duty of counsel to show how trial court erred in refusing to give instructions, and it is not for appellate court to examine record to determine whether instructions were pertinent or covered by general charge.

10. Criminal law ⟨⟩1171(1)—Judgment not reversed for remarks of judge or district attorney, unless defendant's right seriously prejudiced, denying him a fair and impartial trial.

Unless remarks of district attorney or trial judge are so grossly improper as irresistibly to lead to no other conclusion than that defendant was seriously prejudiced and denied a fair and impartial trial, result below for that reason cannot be reversed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

11. Criminal law ⟨⟩1169(11)—Question as to defendant buying phonograph under assumed name and arrest in connection therewith, held not to require reversal, in view of conclusive evidence of his guilt.

In prosecution for embezzlement of radio set, questions as to defendant having purchased phonograph under assumed name and having been arrested therefor were not proper impeachment, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2049, 2051, 2052, but, where objection to latter question was sustained, and there was nothing either on face of first question or defendant's prompt answer thereto, tending to reflect on defendant's character, held that no miscarriage of justice resulted, especially in view of abundant proof of defendant's guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Hugh R. Sprado was convicted of petit embezzlement, and appeals. Affirmed.

Wallace Shepard and Clifford A. Russell, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant, upon an information filed in the superior court, in and for the county of Sacramento, was charged with and tried for felony embezzlement, and convicted of petit embezzlement, and thereupon sentenced to serve a term of 6 months in the county jail of the said county. He duly made an application for a new trial, and the same was denied. He prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The information was based on section 508 of the Penal Code, which provides:

"Every clerk, agent, or servant of any person who fraudulently appropriates to his own use, or secretes with a fraudulent intent to appropriate to his own use, any property of another which has come into his control or care by virtue of his employment as such clerk, agent, or servant, is guilty of embezzlement."

Section 514 of said Code provides that—

"Every person guilty of embezzlement is punishable in the manner prescribed for feloniously stealing property of the value of that embezzled."

Section 487 of said Code provides:

"Grand larceny is larceny committed in either of the following cases: 1. When the property taken is of a value exceeding two hundred dollars. * * *"

And section 488 provides that—

"Larceny in other cases is petit larceny."

Section 489 of said Code fixes the penalty for grand larceny at "imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one nor more than ten years," and section 490 provides that the punishment for petit larceny shall be by "fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months, or both."

The information charges that—

The defendant "on the ——— day of February, A. D. 1924, in the said county of Sacramento, in the said state, * * * was then and there the clerk, agent, and servant of Kimball-Upson Company, a corporation, * * * and doing business in the county of Sacramento, and then and there by virtue of his said employment as such clerk, agent, and servant, then and there came into his possession, care, custody, and control of him, the said Hugh R. Sprado, radio equipment of the value of $246, in gold coin of the United States, the personal property of the said Kimball-Upson Company, * * * and he, the said Hugh R. Sprado, after the said radio equipment had come into his possession, care, and custody, as aforesaid, did then and there, to wit, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California, on said ——— day of February, A. D. 1924, unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously convert, embezzle, and appropriate the same to his own use, not in the due and lawful execution of his trust as such clerk, agent, and servant," etc.

The points made for a reversal, stated in the language and the order in which they are stated in appellant's brief, are:

"(1) That the verdict of the jury is not direct and certain and cannot be considered by the court; (2) that the evidence does not support the verdict; (3) that the errors of the trial court were prejudicial to appellant; (4) that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for an instructed verdict after the prosecution had concluded its case."

[1] 1. The verdict reads as follows:

"We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant, Hugh R. Sprado, guilty of the crime of petit embezzlement included within said charge of embezzlement as charged in the information, and hereby fix the value of the property then and there embezzled under $200, and recommend that probation be granted defendant."

The recommendation of probation for the accused was disregarded by the court, but that fact is inconsequential, in so far as are concerned the points urged against the validity of the verdict, as above explained. The court delivered to the jury the several written forms of verdict covering any conclusion, within the record as made by the information and proofs, which they might, upon a consideration of the case, conceive it to be their duty to reach and declare. Among the forms so submitted to the jury was the following:

"We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant, Hugh R. Sprado, guilty of the crime of embezzlement as charged in the information and hereby fix the value of the property then and there embezzled at $———."

It will be noted that the jury, in formulating their verdict, did not follow that form. The contention that the verdict is not direct and certain is predicated upon the fact that the jury did not specifically find and fix the value of the property alleged to have been fraudulently, and contrary to his trust, converted and appropriated by the defendant to his own use. There is no merit to the contention. The crime of petit or misdemeanor embezzlement is admittedly embraced within the crime of embezzlement as charged in the information, and, the jury having determined that the defendant was guilty of the lesser offense, it was, of course, necessary that they should so declare in their written verdict, but it was not necessary that the finding in that regard should be in any particular form of language. If in such case the verdict as returned is in language sufficiently clear to indicate beyond any doubt that the accused has been found guilty of the lesser offense than that directly charged in the information, it is enough. The verdict fully measures up to this test. It is not necessary that the jury should have specifically found and fixed the value of the property. The evidence might have been such, according to the jury's view thereof, that the triers could not have fixed precisely or even with satisfactory approximation the value of the property. Again, it might happen, as probably it did happen in this case, that the jury, after considering the evidence as to value, entertained a reasonable doubt upon the question whether the property was of value amounting to more or less than $200, but were yet not able to fix the exact value thereof, and, if so, it was their duty to give the defendant the benefit of such doubt, and, being convinced by the evidence that he had embezzled the property, find him guilty of the lesser and not of the higher offense charged. If, therefore, the general finding as to value was all that there was to the verdict as an indication of the crime of which it was the design and intention of the jury to find the defendant guilty, no one then reading the verdict or hearing it read, having in view the fact that for the lesser offense the penalty is the same as that authorized to be imposed for petit larceny, could for an instant doubt that in effect it declared that accused was guilty of the lesser offense of the two included within the crime as charged. But it will be seen that, as indicative of the intention to find the defendant guilty of the lesser offense, the verdict contains more than the mere finding as to value in the finding preceding that of value, to wit: "* * * guilty of petit embezzlement, included within said charge of embezzlement as charged in the information." This language itself, without regard to what the verdict contains as to value, makes it perfectly clear that the offense of which the jury found the accused guilty was that of misdemeanor embezzlement. While misdemeanor embezzlement is not characterized in the Code as "petit embezzlement," the word "petit" bears a well-understood legal signification as used in our Penal Code. In common parlance it means anything petty or small. Employed in our Code for the purpose of defining a crime, it means an offense of less gravity than a felony. For instance, larceny, as seen, is divided by the Penal Code into grand and petit—the first a felony, punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, and the latter a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment in the county jail, or by both fine and imprisonment. Hence the designation in the verdict of the lesser of the two offenses included within the crime charged in the information as "petit embezzlement" is not at all inappropriate. Thus at once there is conveyed to the mind the thought that the smaller or lesser and not the greater of the two offenses so charged is referred to. It may be added that the trial court experienced no difficulty in determining from the verdict the legal effect and scope thereof, for the judgment of sentence was in accord with the penalty authorized in cases of misdemeanor embezzlement. So, if the evidence sufficiently disclosed that the accused was guilty of embezzlement, he suffered no prejudice from the awkward form of language in which his guilt was declared.

[2] 2. The verdict is sufficiently supported. The evidence shows that the defendant was for several years, and down to March 1, 1924, in the employ of the Kimball-Upson Company, and as such was manager and in charge of the radio equipment department of said corporation; that he was permitted by the corporation to take radio sets from the store for the purpose of testing them, he being required to charge against himself on the books such sets as he might so take; that previously to the last day of February, 1924, he was notified by the corporation, through an authorized officer thereof, that, after the said last day of February, his services for and connection with the corporation were to terminate or cease; that on the 28th day of February, 1924, he was asked by Mr. Kimball, a member of said corporation, whether every article of merchandise he had theretofore taken from the store had been returned to the store, to which question the defendant returned an affirmative answer. The evidence further shows that the particular radio set with the wrongful conversion of which he is charged had not been at that time, nor was it at any subsequent time, returned to the store by the accused. It was also shown that in the month of April, 1924, the defendant sold to one Rasmussen a radio set for the sum of $256. Rasmussen identified the set shown him in court by the district attorney as the one he purchased from defendant at the time mentioned, and which had previously been identified by the witness Kimball, president of Kimball-Upson Company, as the set which the defendant had taken from the store of the corporation while he was manager of the radio department thereof. It was further shown that no record of the removal of said set from the store had ever been made in the book used for that purpose.

The defendant made no denial of having the radio set in his possession at the time he severed his connection with the Kimball-Upson Company, or that it belonged to the latter. He did deny, however, that he was asked by Kimball or any other person connected with the corporation whether he had returned to the store all the merchandise he had removed therefrom. He stated that he retained possession of the property with the consent of, and understanding with, one Deatrick, who succeeded him (defendant) as manager of the radio department of the corporation that he was to sell the set and pay the proceeds of the sale to the corporation; that in April, 1924, he sold the property to Rasmussen for $256, and received payment therefor in the form of a check, which, at his request, Rasmussen drew in the name of his (defendant's) wife; that he did not turn the money received for the set over to the corporation until the month of September, 1924, after investigation was started to ascertain the whereabouts of the set, and when a demand was for the first time made upon him for the payment of the money. He stated that his procrastination in the matter of the payment of the money received for the radio set was due to the fact that no bill for the property or no demand for the money so received had been sent to or made upon him by the corporation. Deatrick positively denied giving his consent to the retention by defendant of the radio equipment, and stated that, while he knew that a radio equipment was missing from the store, he did not know with certainty that defendant had possession thereof; that, after he had learned that the defendant had the set in his possession, he, with other employees of the corporation, proceeded in an attempt to secure either the radio set or the money paid to the defendant on the sale thereof. Deatrick also testified that when he first interviewed the defendant concerning the property the latter made to him three different statements regarding his possession of the property. One of these statements was to the effect that B. A. Mitchell, assistant general manager of the corporation, had given him (defendant) permission to retain and dispose of, if he could, the property. Said Mitchell denied, however, that he gave any such permission to defendant. He said that he asked defendant how and when he got possession of the set, and that the latter said that in the month of January he had it in his possession at his home, that he returned it on January 31 for the purpose of having it inventoried with the other property in the store, and that immediately thereafter, and before leaving the store, he had again taken it with him and had retained it until he sold it.

[3] The foregoing is a sufficient statement of the testimony to show that the verdict is well buttressed evidentially. But the specific point urged under this assignment is that, to establish the crime of embezzlement against the accused, it was necessary to show not only that he had possession of the articles constituting the radio set, but that he conceived or formed the intent fraudulently to convert them to his own use prior to the date of his retirement from the service of the corporation, or, in other words, while he was still in the employ of the corporation. We do not conceive this to be a correct view of the law. The statute (section 508, Pen. Code) upon which the information herein is founded declares, as will be seen, that every clerk, agent, etc., who fraudulently appropriates to his own use, or secretes with a fraudulent intent to appropriate to his own use, "any property of another which has come into his control or care by virtue of his employment as such clerk, agent, or servant," is guilty of embezzlement. It is clear that it is wholly immaterial under said section at what time the property has been fraudulently appropriated by such clerk, agent, or servant, or at what time the intent so to appropriate it may be formed—whether before or after his employment as such clerk, etc., has ceased—if it be shown that such property has come into his control or care by virtue of his employment as such clerk, etc. As to the particular property belonging to another, which has come into the control or care of a clerk, agent, or servant, by virtue of his employment as such clerk, agent, or servant, such clerk, etc., so long as he retains the control or care of such property, is the agent of the owner thereof, even though his employment as such clerk or servant or agent has ceased. But, aside from these considerations, the testimony to the effect that, when asked by the president of the corporation, just prior to his final severance from connection with the corporation as an employee thereof, whether he had returned to the store and the possession of the corporation all the articles of merchandise he had on prior occasions removed from the store, the defendant answered that he had, and the further testimony that, after he had terminated his connection with the corporation he sold the radio set, afforded a very strong inference that the defendant had formed the intent to appropriate the set to his own use either before or on the day of his employment with the corporation ceased. Indeed, we think this testimony is sufficient to support the conclusion, if it were necessary to concede that such conclusion is of material consequence in determining whether the verdict stands secure against successful assault, that the intent to appropriate the property was formed by the defendant during the course of his employment as the manager of the radio department of the corporation.

[4] 3. Certain rulings assigned as erroneous and prejudicial to the rights of the accused require consideration herein. The district attorney, calling the witness Kimball, after the defendant had closed his case, asked said witness whether he had a conversation with the defendant on the 29th day of February, 1924, in the course of which he (witness) asked the defendant "if he had any of your merchandise in his charge," and to which question the defendant answered in the negative. To that question the defendant objected upon the ground that it did not call for rebuttal testimony, and, further, because the proper foundation had not been laid for the proof of such conversation, in that the "time, place, and persons present" were not stated or given. Assuming that the testimony was not strictly rebuttal, it was nevertheless relevant and material, and we cannot say that it would be an abuse of the court's discretion in allowing it, although the proper practice, when testimony is not rebuttal, but is offered after the party against whom it is offered has closed his case, is for the party offering it to ask permission to reopen his case for that purpose. In all such instances, or at least as a general rule, where the testimony is relevant and material, and not cumulative of other testimony ample to support the fact to the proof of which the alleged rebuttal testimony is addressed, such motions are allowed, and doubtless in this case, as we may assume from the ruling allowing it, the court would have granted such motion had one been made by the district attorney. So, the testimony being relevant and material, it cannot be said that the defendant was prejudiced as a result of the ruling allowing it. We have assumed, without intending to hold, that the testimony was not rebuttal in the technical sense.

[5] It was not necessary to show, as a prerequisite to the introduction of testimony of the conversation in question, the place where, the persons present, and the time when, the conversation took place. The question calling for the conversation was not for impeachment purposes. It called for testimony of a substantive fact, or a statement by the defendant not amounting to a confession but merely what is technically called in law an admission—that is, a statement which might be pregnant with the admission of a circumstance which, considered with other facts and circumstances, may tend to the establishment of the guilt of the accused. Of course, the defendant was at liberty, on cross-examination, to inquire into the particular circumstances under which the conversation occurred, including the time and the place and the persons present.

[6, 7] It was developed by the prosecution in making its case that the party to whom the defendant sold the radio set paid for the same by a check drawn in the name of defendant's wife. The witness Rasmussen, to whom the radio set was sold, testified that the check was so drawn at the request of the defendant himself. The attorney for the defendant sought to secure an explanation from his client of the reason for having the check made out in his wife's name, but an objection by the district attorney to the question designed to elicit that information was sustained. When arguing the case to the jury, the district attorney put special emphasis on the fact that the check was so drawn, and, in effect, declared that it was a strong circumstance tending to show an effort on the part of the accused to cover up his crime, or to prevent, as far as it might, disclosure of the fact that the radio set was not the property of the Kimball-Upson Company. No good reason occurs to us why the court refused to allow the defendant to explain how he came to have the check drawn in his wife's name. Whether he could have explained the circumstance in a plausible or a reasonable way is not material upon the question of the admissiblity of the testimony thus sought to be brought out by the defendant. It was a circumstance more or less of an incriminatory nature, when considered by the light of the other facts and circumstances of the case, and the accused was entitled to explain it, if he could, and of course it would have been for the jury to determine whether the explanation was or was not a satisfactory one, or whether it would or would not have the effect of destroying its apparent inculpatory force. In brief, the question was proper cross-examination, and should have been allowed. But the guilt of the defendant seems to have been conclusively shown by the evidence, and therefore no miscarriage of justice could have followed from the ruling. Section 4½ art. 6, Const. Of course, the district attorney, in his argument before the jury, was within his rights when he called attention to the circumstance of the check having been drawn at the request of the defendant in the name of the latter's wife. The fact that it would be error for a court to refuse to allow a defendant to explain, if he desired to and could do so, some competently presented circumstance which might damage his defense, would not constitute a reason for denying to the district attorney the right to make the most of such circumstance in his argument to the jury as in support of the theory of guilt, and, as we have stated, the circumstance here being considered was relevant, material, and competent.

The defendant, on cross-examination, was asked by the district attorney whether, prior to July 1, 1922, he purchased or rented a phonograph equipment from the Hauschildt Music Company under the name of Lewis, stating that he was a member of the Olympic Club of San Francisco, which question he answered in the affirmative. After the answer was returned, defendant's counsel moved to strike the answer out "for the purpose of making an objection," and, the motion being allowed, then objected to the question on the ground that it was not cross-examination, and that the question was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The question was improper, and the alleged testimony sought thereby to be elicited wholly inadmissible. But there is nothing either upon the face of the question or the affirmative answer thereto which could have tended to reflect upon the character of the accused but what might be implied from the fact that, at the time of the transaction referred to, he assumed a name different from that under which he was proceeded against in this case. There was nothing wrong, so far as the question and the answer upon their face show, in the purchasing or hiring of the phonograph. The defendant himself seems to have regarded the transaction as one the occurrence of which he was not afraid to admit, for he appears to have answered the question unhesitatingly, even before his counsel could interpose objection thereto. Indeed, it may well be concluded that the fact that the purchasing or hiring of the phonograph was, so far as anything to the contrary is shown here, perfectly legitimate, would seem to negative rather than to carry the implication of suspicion or wrong or guilty knowledge with which the fact that an accused has committed some wrongful act under a pseudonym is ordinarily pregnant. But, waiving consideration of that suggestion, it certainly cannot be held, in view of the large amount of proof of the defendant's guilt, that the question and the answer thereto, even when put side by side with the other errors pointed out by the defendant, and so considered, produced a miscarriage of justice in the instant case.

[8] There is absolutely no ground for the complaint that the court erred in refusing, in response to objection by the district attorney, to permit defendant to give the substance of a conversation with the witness Deatrick, at the home of the former, a few days after the defendant had left the employment of the corporation, in the course of which conversation Deatrick, so the defendant testified, gave the defendant permission to retain possession of the radio equipment for the purpose of disposing of it. The objection to the testimony was upon the ground that Deatrick had not been shown to be the agent of the corporation at the time the conversation was had, and therefore not shown to have the authority to bind the corporation to any arrangements he might have made with the defendant as to the radio set. The objection was technically well founded; but later it was shown that Deatrick was the agent of the corporation, with authority to negotiate arrangements with others as to articles of merchandise which were sold by the Kimball-Upson Company, and upon that showing the court allowed the defendant to state the conversation inquired about by his attorney, and he (defendant) did state said conversation or the substance thereof.

Other alleged errors founded upon the rulings of the court receiving and excluding certain evidence are complained of. These assignments we have carefully examined, and have found no merit to many of the objections, while as to others the errors are so inconsequential that, when compared to the vast amount of proof of guilt, it may well be declared, as we do declare, that they were innocuous in their effect upon the substantial rights of the accused. No miscarriage of justice followed from the errors now referred to.

[9] Counsel for the defendant, in their brief, say:

"The court's attention is also called to the rulings of the trial court in refusing to give the instructions asked for by defendant, and which are numbered 7, 11, 12, and 13."

This is all that is said by the defendant in relation to said instructions. Nowhere is it pointed out wherein the instructions were not properly rejected. It is not for this court to examine the record to determine whether the instructions were pertinent, or, if pertinent, whether they were or were not covered by the general charge of the court. It was the duty of counsel to show this court how the court erred in refusing to give the instructions. People v. Chutnacut, 141 Cal. 682, 685, 75 P. 340; People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, 309, 67 P. 770; People v. Cebulla, 137 Cal. 314, 317, 70 P. 181.

[10] There is a general criticism throughout the brief of counsel for the defendant of the conduct of the court and the district attorney in the trial of the case, it being asserted that both those officers were guilty of misconduct. We have read the record carefully and cannot say that the court and the district attorney transcended the line of their duty in the management and the trial of the cause. Of course, it is to be said that in all warmly contested cases, particularly those involving prosecutions under the criminal laws, now and then there will leave the lips of either the judge or district attorney some remark or remarks which should not go before the jury. Unless, however, it can justly be said that such remarks are so grossly improper as irresistibly to lead to no other conclusion than that the rights of a party to an action or the defendant in a criminal case were thereby seriously prejudiced and he therefore denied a fair and impartial trial according to the law of the land, then the result reached below cannot for that reason be set at naught.

The claim that the court should have advised the jury to find the defendant not guilty is answered by the discussion above.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

HART, J. The defendant, in a petition for a rehearing of this case, makes substantially the points which were urged for a reversal in his briefs, viz: (1) That there was no proof showing the time at which he formed the alleged intent to embezzle the radio equipments introduced in evidence; (2) that this court overlooked, or at least did not notice in its opinion, the fact that, previously to asking defendant whether he, on some prior occasion, purchased or rented from a certain music company a phonograph equipment under the name of Lewis, and at that time stated that he was a member of the Olympic Club of San Francisco, asked defendant, in effect, if it was not true that he (defendant) was, in connection with the said transaction, arrested in San Francisco under the name of Lewis.

Before considering again the points above stated, we may acknowledge the error made in the former opinion in stating that the witness Kimball, president of the Kimball-Upson Company, identified the radio set introduced in evidence as an exhibit as the set which defendant had taken from the store of the corporation while he was manager of the radio department thereof. Kimball did not so testify, as we learn from a re-examination of the record. We should have said that the said radio set was unqualifiedly identified as the property of said corporation by P. A. Mitchell, assistant general manager of the corporation. The error is not material, however, since it was not denied by the defendant that the radio set in question belonged to the corporation and that he had it in his possession and sold it.

1. Counsel, in their petition here, state that we misapprehended the point made in their briefs to the effect that there was no proof as to the particular time at which defendant formed the alleged intent to convert the property in question to his own use. We did not misunderstand the point. The point, as specifically explained in the petition, is: That, it having been shown that the radio equipments referred to in the information were bought by the Kimball-Upson Company in the month of January, 1924, that defendant left the employ of said company in February, 1924, and that the discovery that said property had been sold by defendant in April, 1924, the question whether defendant formed the intent to embezzle the property while he was still an employee of the company is left entirely in the dark, so to speak. In other words, the contention is that, there being no evidence to show that he had the radio set in his possession while he was still an employee of the company, it might be true, so far as the record shows to the contrary, that he got possession of the property in some mysterious way in the month of March or April and after he had severed his connection with the company as an employee; that, as the proposition is stated by counsel, "he could have entered the store of Kimball-Upson and stolen the set during the month of March previous to the sale by him. He would then have been guilty, not of embezzlement, but of larceny." There is no force to that argument as addressed to this court. It was for the jury to determine from all the circumstances, which are recited in the original opinion, when and how the defendant got possession of the set and the time he conceived the intent to embezzle it. Nor was there any ground for such an argument before the jury, for the accused admitted that he took the set in question to his home from the Kimball-Upson store in the month of January, 1924, while he was still manager of the corporation's radio department. He stated, however, that he returned the set to the store the latter part of January, 1924, for the purpose of having it included in the inventory of stock which was conducted in the month of January of each year; that he thereafter again took it to his home, where it remained until he sold it in the month of April, 1924; that he never told any one connected with the corporation that he had sold it until July, 1924, when, the set having been found missing, an officer or employee of the corporation discovered that he had had possession of the property and sold it. There was no evidence introduced at the trial warranting an inference that the defendant stole the equipments in the month of March, nor did the defendant say he got possession in that month. He did state, however, as shown in the original opinion, that he retained possession of the set by permission of Deatrick, his successor as manager of the radio department of the Kimball-Upson store. In this connection, it is to be stated that if, as he claims, after his connection with the corporation as a regular employee had terminated, he was authorized by Deatrick as the manager of the corporation's radio department to retain the set with authority to sell it for the corporation, his position in the transaction would be the same as though he embezzled the property while he was still in the corporation's employ as the manager of its radio department, since the act of Deatrick, acting for the corporation, in thus giving him such possession for the purpose of selling it for the corporation, conferred upon and constituted him an agent of the corporation for that particular purpose. Viewing, then, the transaction from either angle, the jury were legally at liberty to find, as impliedly they did find, that defendant at some time, while acting as agent of the corporation as to said property, formed the intent fraudulently to appropriate it to his own use; said set having come into his possession and control by virtue of his employment as such agent. Pen. Code, § 509. And, as pointed out in the opinion heretofore filed herein, if the property came into his control or care by virtue of his employment as clerk, etc., of the corporation, he remained agent or trustee of the latter as to said property so long as it continued in such care or control. In brief, all that is said in the original opinion upon the question of intent we still adhere to.

[11] 2. We did not overlook the question first asked defendant by the district attorney as to whether he had ever been arrested in connection with the transaction above mentioned under the name of Lewis. But the court sustained an objection to the question first asked, and the effect of that ruling should have been and probably was to impress the jury with the understanding that the question and the answer it was designed to elicit involved matters which it was not proper for them to consider in passing upon the issue of guilt or innocence. As stated in the former opinion, however, neither question should have been asked nor allowed. Neither was, obviously, a proper question for impeachment nor for any other purpose. The Legislature has specifically described the manner in which a witness may be impeached. Code Civ. Proc., §§ 2049, 2051, and 2052. The methods thus pointed out for such impeachment are exclusive. The mere fact that a witness may at some time have been arrested for some crime is not included in said sections as a ground upon which a witness may be impeached. But, as declared in the original opinion, the evidence of defendant's guilt appears to be so conclusive as to justify the conclusion that no miscarriage of justice has resulted from the misconduct of the district attorney in asking the questions on that line, or the error of the court in sanctioning the last of the questions so asked. Indeed, an examination of the defendant's own testimony will readily show that his defense as thus disclosed appears to be singularly weak—so much so, in fact, that its tendency seems to confirm rather than to negative the theory of guilt as maintained by the people.

We are satisfied with the views and the conclusions expressed and announced in the former opinion as to all the points therein considered.

The petition is denied.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

73 Cal. App. 1[3]

PEOPLE of the State of California, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. James WARREN, Defendant and Appellant. (Cr. 845.) (District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 2, 1925.) Appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Merced County, E. N. Rector, Judge, of conviction of sex perversion. Affirmed. A. N. Soliss, of Merced, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of the crime of sex perversion as defined by section 288a of the Penal Code. He moved for a new trial, and the motion was denied. This appeal is from the judgment, and the order denying a new trial. The transcript was filed in this court February 11, 1925. No brief has been filed by appellant. The cause was placed on the calendar to be orally argued June 1, 1925. No appearance was made in behalf of appellant, and the cause was ordered submitted on the record. The evidence is sufficient to sustain the conviction, and no error has been discovered in the record. The judgment and the order are affirmed.

In re IBURG'S ESTATE.

WOLLESEN v. CARLSON. (S. F. 11379.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1925.)

1. Wills ⊂⊃435—Rules prescribed by Civil Code are observed in construing will, unless intent to contrary clearly appears.

In interpreting wills, rules prescribed by Civil Code are to be observed, unless intent to the contrary clearly appears.

2. Wills ⊂⊃182—Whether later will is so inconsistent that it revokes former will must be determined from later will's language.

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 1319–1321, and section 1296, providing that prior will is not revoked by later will, unless later will contains express revocation clause, or its provisions are wholly inconsistent with former will, court, in ascertaining if earlier will is revoked by later olographic will, which contained no express revocation, must determine from language of olographic will whether it is wholly inconsistent with earlier will, and in case of doubt, construction is favored which preserves prior will's contents, wholly or in part, rather than to declare total revocation by inference.

3. Wills ⊂⊃182—Later will, disposing of all property, but naming no executor, revokes earlier will, which disposes of all property and names executor.

Olographic will, containing no revocation clause, and disposing of entire property, but naming no executor, is wholly inconsistent with and revokes earlier will disposing of entire property and naming executor, so that it is error to admit earlier will to probate and to appoint person named therein as executor.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Applications by Henrietta Wollesen and John Carlson for the probate of two wills of John Iburg, deceased. Both wills were admitted to probate and from that portion of the judgment which admitted the will offered by John Carlson and appointed him executor, Henrietta Wollesen appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

S. W. Molkenbuhr, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Frank M. Hultman and Wm. J. Brennan, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, J. John Iburg made a will in 1921, leaving all his property to his friend, John Carlson, and appointing him his executor. Thereafter in 1924, he made an olographic will, leaving all his property to his sister, Henrietta Wollesen. The latter instrument contained no words of revocation, and did not appoint an executor. Upon Iburg's death, shortly after making the second will, each of the documents was offered for probate as his last will and testament. Henrietta Wollesen objected to the admission to probate of the will made in 1921 upon the ground that the same had been entirely revoked by the olographic will made in 1924. The court below admitted both documents to probate as the last will and testament of Iburg, and appointed Carlson executor thereof. Henrietta Wollesen appealed from that portion of the order admitting the will of 1921 to probate and appointing John Carlson as executor, and refusing to appoint her administratrix with the will annexed of the will of 1924. Both wills were duly executed, and the only question involved in the controversy is, Did the will executed in 1924 completely and entirely revoke the one made in 1921?

[1, 2] In interpreting a will subject to the law of this state, the rules prescribed by the Civil Code are to be observed, unless an intent to the contrary clearly appears. Several testamentary instruments executed by the same testator are to be taken and construed together as one instrument. All parts of a will are to be construed in relation to each other, and so as to form one consistent whole, if possible; but, where several parts are absolutely irreconcilable, the latter must prevail. Civ. Code, §§ 1319, 1320, 1321. Section 1296 of the Civil Code provides:

"A prior will is not revoked by a subsequent will, unless the latter contains an express revocation, or provisions wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former will; but in other cases the prior will remains effectual so far as consistent with the provisions of the subsequent will."

There being no words of express revocation in the will of 1924, we must determine from the language of the will whether it is wholly inconsistent with the terms of the will of 1921, in order to ascertain if the earlier will was in fact revoked by the later. If the case be doubtful, the courts incline to preserve the contents of the prior will, wholly or in part, rather than declare a total revocation by inference. The rule is thus stated in 1 Schouler on Wills (6th Ed.) par. 617:

"Where, for instance, the later will only disposes of a portion of the estate, they avoid the ill consequence of partial intestacy; and where the later paper is styled a codicil, they take this to mean that the intent was to amend and not repeal; and in either case the former will is treated as no more than pro tanto revoked. In other cases, perhaps the context may justify a similar construction. But if the later will does not profess to be a codicil at all, and disposes moreover of the entire estate inconsistently with the earlier, a court would violate its duty not to hold that the earlier will was wholly revoked, unless the context supplied good reason for supposing that the testator otherwise intended."

See, also, 28 R. C. L., "Wills," § 132.

In Estate of Marx, 174 Cal. 762, 164 P. 640, L. R. A. 1917F, 234, this court quoted with approval the rule laid down by Jarman on Wills that in all cases where a later will is adequate to the disposition of the entire property of the deceased the case "rests on the true construction of the contents of the two instruments, and the complete disposition contained in the second must, unless controlled by the context, wholly revoke the first." 1 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) star page 138; other authorities to the same effect are Page on Wills, § 269; 1 Underhill on Wills, § 251; 1 Redfield on Wills, star pages 362, 365.

[3] Respondent cites some authorities to support his theory that a prior will which appoints an executor is in that respect not inconsistent with a later will which makes no such provision. He contends that, where the prior will disposes of all the property and appoints an executor, and the subsequent will merely disposes of all the property, but does not appoint an executor, and contains no words of revocation, there is no inconsistency between the two instruments, so far as the appointment of an executor is concerned, and that therefore both wills should be admitted to probate, and the executor named in the earlier will should be appointed. Newcomb v. Webster, 113 N. Y. 191, 21 N. E. 77; Underhill on Wills, § 255, pp. 349, 350; In re Leese's Estate (1862) 2 Sw. & Tr. 442, 164 Eng. Rep. 1068. The court in Newcomb v. Webster, supra, was dealing with a will and a codicil, and not with two independent substantive wills. In this connection it should be remembered that a codicil is a republication and ratification of so much of a prior will as it does not revoke. In Simmons v. Simmons, 26 Barb. 68, the court said:

"A new will (if it provides for the full disposition of all the testator's estate), though inconsistent but in part with the former will, and absolutely agreeing in part, revokes the whole prior will, by substituting a new and last disposition for the former one."

See Ludlum v. Otis, 15 Hun (N. Y.) 410, 413. In the English case, In re Leese, supra, the first will disposed of the entire estate, and named executors. A second will made a different disposition of the personal property only, reappointed one of the former executors, and named another. The judge of the prerogative court held that both wills should be admitted to probate, and both sets of executors should be appointed. No appeal was taken. But, in another case, Henfrey v. Henfrey, reported in 13 Eng. Rep. (full reprint) 211, a testator left two substantive wills, each disposing of his entire property. By the first he appointed executors, to one of whom he gave the residue of the estate. By the second will, which contained no revocation of the first, he gave the whole of his property to his wife, with the exception of a small legacy, but appointed no executor. Letters of administration with the will last executed were granted to the wife. The prerogative court held, affirming the court below, that the second will operated as a revocation of the first, and was alone entitled to probate. An appeal to the privy council was dismissed; the council holding it to be the rule "that a paper, disposing of the whole property, is a revocation in toto of a previous will, also disposing of the whole," and that the doctrine to the contrary "had been exploded so far back that it would be difficult to trace it."

The rule declared by the English privy council finds ample support in the decisions of this country. In Re Edward Fisher, 4 Wis. 254, 65 Am. Dec. 309, 312, it was said that a man cannot have two independent wills at the same time, each acting upon the same subject-matter, and each professing to make a distinct and full disposition thereof. Therefore the court held that, where each of two testamentary instruments is a distinct, substantive will of itself, and one is not in the nature of a supplement or codicil to the other, and the later in time is competent to make, and does in fact make a different and full disposition of the testator's property, it revokes the earlier, and is the will of the deceased. In Gardner v. McNeal, 117 Md. 27, 82 A. 988, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 553, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 119, each will purported to make full disposition of the entire estate. The court said the inconsistency was as great as was possible, and that but one conclusion could be reached, which was that the former will was revoked by the later document. In Re Gensimore's Estate, 246 Pa. 216, 92 A. 134, the testator made two wills, the first giving his three daughters an equal share of all the money derived from the estate, and appointing an executor and directing a sale. The second will made another disposition of all his personal property, and named no executor. Between the time of the execution of the two wills the testator disposed of his real property. The court holds that the testamentary disposition of the land in the first will having been revoked by the sale, leaving nothing for the first will to operate on that was not covered by the second will, the second will was an entire revocation of the first, including the appointment of the executor. In re Gilman's Estate, 65 Misc. Rep. 409, 121 N. Y. S. 909, the testator made two wills. In the first he disposed of his entire estate and named an executor. The second also provided for the disposition of his estate, but named no executor. The court held the latter instrument to be inconsistent with the former will, and alone entitled to probate. It said "the fact that the 1894 [the second] will names no executor has no bearing whatever on its validity." This court has also held that the naming of an executor is not essential to the validity of a will. Estate of Barton, 52 Cal. 538, 540.

Respondent places great emphasis upon the language of this court in Re Hickman, 101 Cal. 609, 36 P. 118, where the court said that the nomination of an executor without any disposition of one's estate, or giving any other directions whatever, would constitute a will. But the point at issue here was not considered in that case. There the sole beneficiary under the will died before the testator. On petition for probate of the will the public administrator contested the right of the executor named to letters testamentary on the ground that the sole legatee and devisee under the will had died during the lifetime of the testator, whereby the devise and legacy lapsed, and the will became null and void. The court held that this last fact was not one to be determined as a preliminary question affecting the probate of the will. The fact that the document purported to appoint an executor and provide for the payment of debts was sufficient to stamp it as a will and justified its probate as such. The question of revocation of a substantive will by one of later date was not before the court. We have already referred to and distinguished the question considered in Newcomb v. Webster, supra, also strongly relied upon by the respondent.

In conclusion, we are of the view that the rule to be applied to the situation in this case is that announced in Jarman on Wills, quoted with approval in Re Marx, supra. The lower court was therefore in error in admitting to probate the will made by John Iburg on October 28, 1921, and in appointing John Carlson executor of the will of the decedent. The olographic will of Iburg executed February 4, 1924, leaving his entire estate to appellant, was alone entitled to admission to probate. Appellant's petition for letters with that will annexed should have been granted.

The portions of the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the lower court, with directions to proceed in accordance with the views herein expressed.

MASON v. DANFORD.

(S. F. 11036.)

1. Wills ⟸181—Testamentary instrument to revoke former will need not expressly declare such intention.

Civ. Code, § 1292, requiring written instrument to effect alteration in will to declare such alteration or revocation, means only that it shall appear from provisions of last will that it is intended to alter or revoke former instrument, and need not expressly declare such intention; under section 1317 intention of testator being governing principle.

2. Wills ⟸182—When new will complete revocation of former will by implication, stated.

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 1296, 1320, there is no complete revocation of former will by implication unless general tenor of later will shows clearly that testator so intended or the two instruments are so inconsistent as to be incapable of standing together.

3. Wills ⟸306—Evidence held not to show, as matter of law, that court erred in holding that first will was wholly supplanted by subsequent one.

Evidence in proceeding to probate will held not to show as matter of law that lower court was in error in finding that later will wholly supplanted former.

4. Executors and administrators ⟸5—Granting of letters of administration held error, where decedent left will.

Granting of letters of administration held error, where decedent left will which was established and admitted to probate.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Petitions by Nora D. Danford for appointment as administratrix of the estate of William J. Danford, deceased, and also for the probate of a certain document as his will, and for appointment as administratrix with the will annexed, and petition by Caroline Mason for the probate of certain documents as the last will of deceased. From an order granting both petitions of Nora D. Danford and denying the petition of Caroline Mason, the latter appeals. Remanded, with directions to modify, and, as modified, affirmed.

Dunn & Brand, of Sacramento, and Nat Schmulowitz, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dennison, Towner & Kleber, of Los Angeles, B. B. Crawford, E. J. Talbott, and J. E. Manning, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, J. Appellant appeals from an order refusing probate to a purported will, admitting to probate a subsequently executed document, and granting letters testamentary with the will annexed to respondent. The question in the case is whether a will of William J. Danford, deceased, dated September 15, 1920, appointing appellant executrix thereof, was revoked by a later will dated September 9, 1922, in which there is no clause expressly revoking the prior will, and in which no one is designated to act as executor.

After William J. Danford died, on October 24, 1923, two documents of testamentary character were found among his effects. Nora D. Danford, the surviving wife of the decedent, filed a petition in probate, alleging that the deceased died intestate, and sought to be appointed the administratrix of his estate. Mrs. Caroline Mason, appellant here, filed a petition for the probate of the two testamentary documents as the last will of Danford, and prayed for the appointment of herself as executrix without bonds. Mrs. Danford thereupon filed a petition praying for the probate of the document bearing the later date as the last will of the deceased, and prayed that she be appointed the administratrix with the will annexed. The three petitions came on for hearing at the same time. The authenticity of the two testamentary documents was clearly established; it being conceded that each was entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator, William J. Danford. The court below granted both petitions of Nora D. Danford, and denied the petition of Mrs. Mason. It is from these orders that the latter has appealed.

The recitals in the nature of findings contained in the order denying and granting the various petitions do not disclose the grounds upon which the trial court made its decision. The only tenable theory on which it could have relied to support its action, under the findings, is that the provisions of the second instrument of testamentary character are wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former will, and work a revocation of that instrument. That is the point which has been argued in the briefs of the parties to the appeal. There is presented, therefore, for our consideration, the effect of the will of September 9, 1922, upon the will executed September 15, 1920.

A former decision in this matter was recalled on petition for rehearing, in order that a re-examination of the point at issue might be had in connection with our consideration of an exactly similar question presented by another matter, also on appeal. The opinion in that case has this day been filed. In the Matter of the Estate of Iburg (S. F. No. 11379) 238 P. 74.

The following sections of the Civil Code are applicable to the case at bar:

Section 1317:

"A will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator. Where his intention cannot have effect to its full extent, it must have effect as far as possible."

Section 1320:

"Several testamentary instruments, executed by the same testator, are to be taken and construed together as one instrument."

Section 1296:

"A prior will is not revoked by a subsequent will, unless the latter contains an express revocation, or provisions wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former will; but in other cases the prior will remains effectual so far as consistent with the provisions of the subsequent will."

[1, 2] It was not necessary that the will of September 9, 1922, should expressly declare that it was intended to revoke a former will. The words "declaring such revocation," used in the section of the Code providing the manner in which a written will may be revoked (Civ. Code, § 1292), mean nothing more than that it shall appear from the provisions of the last will that it is intended to alter or revoke the former, in whole or in part (Clarke v. Ransom, 50 Cal. 595, 602).

"If the subsequent instrument does not profess to be a codicil and is adequate to the disposition of the entire property, there is no such a priori improbability that it was intended wholly to supplant the prior instrument. The case then rests on the true construction of the contents of the two instruments, and the complete disposition contained in the second must, uness controlled by the context, wholly revoke the first." 1 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) star p. 138.

The governing principle is therefore the intention of the testator. It does not necessarily follow from the fact of the new will that full and entire revocation was intended. The purpose may have been to make supplemental provisions, consistent with the former will in whole or in part, to dispose of other property, or to amend and alter the prior dispositions only. Hence a complete revocation by implication will not follow unless the general tenor of the later will shows clearly that the testator so intended, or the two instruments are so plainly inconsistent as to be incapable of standing together. Williams v. Miles, 68 Neb. 463, 476, 94 N. W. 705, 96 N. W. 151, 62 L. R. A. 383, 110 Am. St. Rep. 431, 4 Ann. Cas. 306.

In the will executed by Danford on September 15, 1920, he recited that he had "revoked and destroyed" all previous wills and codicils made by him, and provided certain bequests and devises as follows: (2) To his son, Earl J. Danford, the sum of $100, and like sums to his son's wife and children; and, in the event either of them should file a contest of the will, the provision in their behalf is revoked. (3) To his sister, Kate Penland, for herself and her children, one-fourth of his entire estate. (4) To Mrs. C.

Mason (the appellant), one-half of his entire estate, after funeral expenses and incumbrances are paid, and naming appellant "executor without bonds." The will makes no disposition of the residue of the estate, if any remains.

The later will, dated September 9, 1922, is short, and we quote it in full:

"Tanajura, Calif. September 9, 1922.
"In case of any accident to me ~~enroute to San Francisco~~ (9-22-22 (Wm. J. D.
"I make this olographic will as my last will. I hereby revoke the codicil to my previous will made October 16th, 1921, in favor of John Hoyle and hereby remit his indebtedness to me or my estate. I hereby give $2,000.00 to Mrs. B. Gross and $5,000.00 to my sister Catherine Penland, 1859 Cleveland avenue, Chicago, Illinois. All the remainder of my estate and all my personal effects I give to Caroline Mason including all of our partnership properties, stocks, and good will. Wm. J. Danford."

[3] The ultimate question, whether or not the will made September 15, 1920, was wholly annulled by that made September 9, 1922, was squarely presented to the lower court on the offer of the two instruments for probate, and the objection of Nora D. Danford, the wife of the decedent, to the admission of the first on the ground that it had been so revoked. It found that the subsequent will dated September 9, 1922, is the last will and testament of the deceased. That instrument does not profess to be a codicil, and its provisions are adequate to the disposition of the entire estate. There is therefore no a priori improbability that it was intended to wholly supplant the prior will. There is nothing in the context of the two wills of such compelling force as to require their being construed as one instrument. On the facts found and the record brought here, which consists of little that is material other than the two wills and the formal proceedings in probate, we cannot say, as matter of law, that the judgment of the lower court is incorrect. Estate of Marx, 174 Cal. 762, 764, 164 P. 640, L. R. A. 1917F, 234; Estate of Iburg, supra.

[4] The order made by the trial court contains inconsistent directions. It grants the application of Mrs. Danford for letters of administration, which action could rest only on the absence of testamentary disposition of the estate. Further ordering, it admits to probate the document dated September 9, 1922, as the last will and testament of William J. Danford, deceased, appoints Nora D. Danford administratrix with the will annexed, and directs that letters be issued to her upon giving bond. As the decedent left a will, which was established and admitted to probate, the application of Mrs. Danford for letters of administration, first filed, should have been denied. Other points suggested in this case and authorities cited by counsel have been considered in the opinion in Estate of Iburg, supra.

The cause is remanded, with directions to the lower court to deny the petition of Nora D. Danford for letters of administration, first filed, the order appealed from, when so amended, to stand affirmed; respondent to recover costs of appeal.

REED et al. v. MURPHY et al. (L. A. 8251.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 14, 1925. Rehearing Denied August 13, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸903 — Supreme Court bound to assume minutes of trial court speak truth.

Supreme Court is bound to assume minutes of trial court speak the truth.

2. Appeal and error ⟸667—Record of trial court cannot be altered or amended by proof made in Supreme Court.

Record of trial court cannot be altered or amended by proof made in the Supreme Court.

3. Appeal and error ⟸154(4)—Supreme Court will not consider appeal from consent decree.

Supreme Court will not consider appeal from consent decree under theory the parties waived any errors in it.

4. Partition ⟸95—Descriptions of parcels adjudicated to respective parties held not void as being impossible of ascertainment as matter of law by reference to other portions of record.

Descriptions in decree of parcels adjudicated to the respective parties, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 763, 764, pursuant to their stipulation, held not void as being impossible of ascertainment as a matter of law by reference to other portions of the record.

5. Partition ⟸95 — Function of referees in partition suit stated.

Decree in partition does not delegate to the referees the judicial function of trying title and determining respective interests of parties in the land; their function being solely to divide the property and allot the several portions thereof to the respective parties according to their respective rights, as determined by the court pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. §§ 763, 764.

6. Appeal and error ⟸440—Fact of taking of appeal held not to preclude trial court from correcting its minutes.

Fact of taking of appeal held not to preclude trial court from correcting its minutes, so as to make them speak the truth.

7. Appeal and error ⟸154(4)—Appeal from consent decree held to require dismissal.

An appeal from a consent decree which was consented to in the precise form in which it was rendered, and which related to a subject of which the court had jurisdiction, and which was not void on its face, held to require dismissal.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Jesse Olney, Judge.

Partition suit by Lena Reed and another against T. C. Murphy and another. From the decree rendered, defendants appeal. On plaintiffs' motion to dismiss the appeal. Appeal dismissed.

W. E. Byrne, of San Bernardino, for appellants.

McNabb & Hodge, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This matter is before us upon respondents' motion to dismiss the appeal. The action is in partition. Plaintiffs, in their amended complaint, allege that the plaintiff G. E. Reed and the defendant T. C Murphy are the owners as tenants in common of the premises described in the complaint; that the said plaintiff has an estate therein to the extent of an undivided one-half interest in fee; and that the said defendant has an undivided one-half interest and estate therein, and prays for a partition of the said real property. The answer denies that the plaintiffs or either of them own any interest in certain portions of the premises described in the complaint, which portions are particularly described in the answer, and alleges that the defendant T. C. Murphy is the owner in severalty of the entire fee of such described portions. It admits that the said plaintiff and defendant are the owners in common of the remainder of the premises described in the complaint, and prays that said defendant's title be quieted to the premises described in his answer, and that the remainder of the premises described in the complaint be partitioned. The cause came on for hearing April 19, 1924, evidence was received, and April 21, 1924, an interlocutory decree was signed and filed, decreeing partition of the premises described in the complaint and appointing referees for that purpose. This decree purports to ascertain and determine the respective rights of the parties in the lands in question as follows:

"Wherefore it is by the court here ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said plaintiff, G. E. Reed, under the purchases from the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Southern Pacific Land Company, is entitled to all those portions of real property described in the amended complaint herein acquired by him together with his improvements at the date of said purchase, and is seized and possessed of an undivided one-half interest in and to all of the remainder of said property described in said amended complaint except as otherwise specified herein. And that said defendant T. C. Murphy, under the purchases from the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Southern Pacific Land Company, is entitled to all those portions of real property described in the amended complaint herein acquired by him together with his improvements at the date of said purchase, and is seized and possessed of an undivided one-half interest in and to all of the remainder of said property described in said amended complaint except as otherwise specified herein."

Thereafter, and within due time, the defendants took an appeal from such interlocutory decree upon a printed transcript of the judgment roll, and filed their opening brief in this court, wherein they pointed out that the trial court had failed to find upon the controverted issues tendered by the pleadings as to title, and failed to ascertain and determine the respective rights of the parties in the land to be partitioned. Thereupon the plaintiffs moved in the trial court for an order correcting its minutes nunc pro tunc as of April 19 and April 21, 1924, so as to make the minutes of the court show the fact that the decree appealed from was a consent decree entered pursuant to the consent and stipulation of the respective parties in open court. After a hearing thereon, the trial court granted the motion and made an order so correcting its minutes nunc pro tunc as of April 19th and April 21st. The minutes of April 19th relating to this proceeding as so corrected now read as follows:

"Counsel for the respective parties stipulate that an interlocutory judgment in said action in form as prepared by respective counsel for said parties be rendered and entered by the court. It is stipulated that counsel for plaintiffs and defendants will prepare such form of interlocutory judgment and submit the same to the court for rendition and entry. Thereupon the court, without hearing further evidence, ordered the case continued until Monday, April 21, 1924, at 10 o'clock a. m."

The minutes of April 21st as corrected now read as follows:

"This cause coming on regularly to be heard, Messrs. McNabb & Hodge, appearing as counsel for plaintiffs, and W. E. Byrne, appearing as counsel for defendants, counsel for the respective parties present to the court a form of interlocutory judgment, and stipulate that an interlocutory judgment be rendered and entered by the court in accordance with said form so presented to the court, and thereupon the court renders judgment in accordance with the form of judgment so submitted."

[1, 2] Thereafter plaintiffs and respondents moved in this court to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the decree appealed from was a consent decree, supporting their motion by a certified copy of the minutes of the trial court, as so corrected, and by an affidavit of the trial judge, who deposed that the decree in its precise terms as signed and filed by him was prepared by counsel for the respective parties, who appeared in open court upon the date mentioned, and presented the proposed decree, and stipulated and consented in open court to the signing, filing, and entry thereof. Appellants submitted counter affidavits, denying that they consented to the decree as rendered, and denying that any proceedings on April 21st were had in open court. We are compelled, however, to assume that the minutes of the trial court speak the truth. The record of that court cannot be altered or amended by proof made in this court.

"It would be a departure from all principle to allow a record sent to this court to be assailed by evidence of less dignity than a record." Boyd v. Burrel, 60 Cal. 280, 284; Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 P. 986.

[3, 4] For the purposes of this motion we must therefore conclude that the appellants consented to the rendition and entry of the decree appealed from, and thereby waived any errors in it.

"Under such circumstances the appellate court will not consider the appeal at all but will dismiss it." 14 Cal. Jur. 878, and cases cited.

[5] It may be conceded that, if a consent judgment or decree is different from or goes beyond the terms of the stipulation which forms its basis, it may be set aside upon appeal or by other appropriate procedure, as it would not be in reality a consent judgment. But such is not the case here. We are compelled to conclude that the parties consented to the rendition and entry of the precise decree here appealed from. It has been suggested, though never decided, in this state, so far as we are advised, that the rule requiring dismissal of appeals from consent judgments is subject to two exceptions, the first being in cases where the lower court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and the second in cases where the complaint is fatally defective. Guigni v. Ratto, 41 Cal. App. 49, 181 P. 809. It is not claimed that the complaint herein is in any wise defective, but appellants do contend that the interlocutory decree herein was one that the superior court had no authority to make under the statute, and that lacking such authority in the first instance it could not be conferred by stipulation of the parties. This contention is rested upon the provision of Code of Civil Procedure, § 763, that the court "must order a partition according to the respective rights of the parties as ascertained by the court," and of Code of Civil Procedure, § 764, that "in making partition, the referees must divide the property * * * according to the respective rights of the parties as determined by the court." This, however, is not equivalent to saying that the court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and appellants do not in fact contend that it did not. Their contention, as we understand it, is that the court violated these statutory provisions, in that it did not in and by its decree ascertain and specifically determine and declare the respective rights of the parties in and to the land to be partitioned. This is but to say that the court erred in the exercise of its jurisdiction. We may assume for the purposes hereof that a decree or judgment which is void upon its face is open to attack by any one, including the parties thereto, even though they consented to its rendition. It may be conceded, also, that, where, in a judgment adjudicating the title to real property, the description therein is so uncertain that the court can see that nothing is described therein, such a judgment may be said to be void upon its face. Newport v. Hatton (Cal. Sup.) 231 P. 987. But we are unable to say upon the record now before us that the descriptions of the parcels adjudicated to the respective parties herein are impossible of ascertainment by reference to other portions of the record. It is true that those descriptions are not in the least aided by any portion of the record which is now before us. We are not advised as to what evidence was introduced at the trial, but, if an examination of that record should disclose that there was introduced at the trial one deed from the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Southern Pacific Land Company, conveying to the plaintiff G. E. Reed a specifically described portion of the premises described in the complaint, and another deed from the same grantors, conveying to the defendant T. C. Murphy another specifically described portion of the premises described in the complaint, and that no other deed was produced from either of such grantors to either of such grantees in severalty, it might be justly concluded that the descriptions in those two deeds were intended to be adopted by reference in the decree as describing the portions of the premises adjudged to the respective parties in severalty. Upon the other hand, if no such means should be found of rendering certain the description in the decree herein, the conclusion would follow that the same is void for uncertainty. But upon the present record we cannot say that it is void upon its face. Newport v. Hatton, supra. The decree does not delegate to the referees the judicial function of trying title and determining the respective interests of the parties in the land. Their function is solely to divide the property and allot the several portions thereof to the respective parties according to their respective rights as determined by the court. If they are unable by the process above suggested to ascertain what the rights of the respective parties are as determined by the court, then, of course, they will be unable to make a partition of the premises.

[6] There is no merit in the contention that by the taking of the appeal the trial court was precluded from correcting its minutes so as to make them speak the truth. Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675, 209 P. 892.

[7] Concluding, as we must, that the appellants consented to the decree in the precise form in which it was rendered, that they thereby waived any errors therein, and that it is not void upon its face, there remains nothing to be reviewed upon an appeal therefrom, and the appeal is dismissed.

MOORE v. SCHNEIDER et al. (L. A. 7836.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⟸172(1)—Fraudulent conveyance is valid as to grantor, and as to all persons except creditors of grantor, who may question it in proper proceeding.

A deed to defraud, hinder, or delay grantor's creditors is valid as to him, vesting legal title in grantee, and is good against grantor, his heirs, executors, administrators, and persons claiming under him, and as to all persons except creditors of grantor who may question it in a proper proceeding.

2. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⟸184—Plaintiff, as voluntary assignee of another, acquired no greater right in property than assignor had at time of assignment.

Plaintiff, as voluntary assignee of another, acquires no greater right in property than assignor had at time of assignment, and cannot assert claim to property which assignor may not assert.

3. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⟸184—Assignee cannot maintain action to recover title to property assigned, but which assignor had previously transferred in fraud of his creditors.

In absence of statute giving such power, assignee cannot maintain action to recover title to property which assignor had transferred in fraud of his creditors.

4. Insolvency ⟸57(1)—In the case of assignee in insolvency, estate of debtor devolves in trust for benefit of others than debtor.

In the case of an assignee in insolvency, the estate of the debtor devolves in trust for the benefit of others than the debtor.

5. Insolvency ⟸78—Assignee of insolvent, voluntarily conveying to such assignee under nonstatutory assignment, held to have no greater powers than assignee under statutory assignment.

Assignee of insolvent, voluntarily conveying to such assignee under nonstatutory assignment, has no greater powers than an assignee under a statutory assignment for benefit of creditors pursuant to Civ. Code, §§ 3449, 3473, et seq.

6. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⟸268—Assignee of realty for benefit of creditors, becoming such by nonstatutory assignment executed by insolvent assignor, held entitled to sue to quiet title to property assigned.

Irrespective of Civ. Code, § 3441, an assignee of realty for benefit of creditors, who became such by a nonstatutory assignment executed voluntarily by insolvent assignor who had theretofore transferred the realty in fraud of creditors, held entitled to bring an action under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, to quiet title as against one claiming adversely.

7. Assignments for benefit of creditors, ⟸276—Creditors of insolvent person, assigning voluntarily by nonstatutory assignment land for benefit of creditors, held entitled to intervene in assignee's action to quiet title to property so assigned.

Creditors of insolvent person, assigning voluntarily by nonstatutory assignment land for benefit of creditors, held entitled to intervene under Code Civ. Proc. § 387, in assignee's action to quiet title to property so assigned.

8. Judgment ⟸567—Consent judgment binds parties and those in privity with them, in absence of want of jurisdiction, or of collusion or fraud.

A judgment by consent is res judicata and conclusive between parties and those claiming under them, in the absence of a showing of want of jurisdiction in the court rendering it, of collusion between parties, or of fraud of the party offering the record.

9. Lis pendens ⟸18—Filing for record with recorder of notice of pendency of action is constructive notice to world of pendency of such action.

The filing for record with the recorder of a notice of the pendency of an action is the mode substituted by statute for constructive notice to all the world of the pendency of such action, which arose under the common law, ipso facto, upon the institution of the suit.

10. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⟸163—Assignment of realty for benefit of creditors is subject to statutory provisions relating to transfer of real property.

Assignment of real property for benefit of creditors is a conveyance within Civ. Code, § 1215, as much subject to the provisions of section 1214 (as amended by St. 1895, p. 50), and section 1217, relating to transfers of real property, and as much within the policy of the statute as any other transfer of such property.

11. Judgment ⟸683—Judgment rendered in action to quiet title held bar to action to quiet title by assignee for benefit of creditors.

A judgment rendered in action to quiet title in favor of plaintiff, who stood in the position of a prior purchaser, held a bar to an action to quiet title by assignee for benefit of creditors who stood in the position of a subsequent purchaser claiming under an unrecorded assignment.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Wm. H. Moore, as assignee, for the benefit of creditors of William Schneider and another, copartners against Sophie M. Schneider and others, in which New-Market Company and D. Roberts intervened. Pending the action defendant Sophie M.

Schneider died, and George F. Metcalfe was substituted in her place as administrator of her estate. From an adverse judgment the administrator appeals. Reversed.

Daniel M. Hunsaker and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Davis & Rush and Alfred F. MacDonald, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Schneider.

Dana Ong, of Los Angeles, for respondent Miller.

Alfred H. McAdoo, of Los Angeles, for plaintiff and respondent and interveners and respondents.

WASTE, J. The defendants William Schneider and R. R. Miller, as copartners and as individuals, made a nonstatutory assignment of all their property not exempt from execution to the plaintiff, Moore, as assignee for the benefit of creditors signing the agreement or consenting thereto. Moore subsequently brought this action to obtain a decree declaring that he, as such assignee, is the owner of the equitable title to certain real property, it being alleged that Sophie M. Schneider, wife of the assignor, William Schneider, among others, asserted an adverse claim to that of the assignee. By complaint in intervention, certain of the creditors of Schneider and Moore intervened in the action in support of the plaintiff assignee's contentions. Sophie M. Schneider died, and the defendant Metcalfe, as administrator of her estate, was substituted in her place. As such administrator, Metcalfe, answering, denied the claims of the plaintiff, and alleged that at all times material to the transaction, and at her death, Mrs. Schneider was the owner of the property, and that upon her death her heirs became the owners thereof, subject to the administration of her estate. The trial court found that, some 2½ years before the assignment to plaintiff was made, the defendants William Schneider and Sophie M. Schneider executed and caused to be recorded a deed conveying the real property in question to Charles J. W. Saunders and Elizabeth M. Saunders, his wife; that said transfer and conveyance was wholly without consideration, and was made by the grantors for the purpose of concealing the property from Schneider's creditors, and as part of a scheme participated in by both grantors to defraud; that the transfer was accompanied by an agreement on the part of Saunders and wife with William Schneider to reconvey the property to Schneider, or to whomsoever he might direct; that thereafter Saunders and wife, by direction of William Schneider, by deed duly recorded, transferred and conveyed the property to Sophie M. Schneider, without any consideration other than in pursuance of the previous agreement with Schneider to reconvey the property; that Mrs. Schneider had transferred and conveyed the property to her husband, the defendant William Schneider, and the title stood of record in his name when this action was brought. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff, and the administrator of the estate of Sophie M. Schneider appealed.

[1] Two grounds are advanced by the appellant why the respondant Moore, as assignee of William Schneider, should not recover in this action. The first is that Schneider himself could not maintain an action against Mrs. Schneider to set aside the conveyance by which she obtained title to the property, for it was made at the request of Schneider, and as part of a scheme to defraud his creditors. The contention embodies a correct statement of the law. The grantor in a deed made for the purpose of defrauding, hindering, or delaying his creditors cannot be relieved against its operation. As to him it is valid. Ybarra v. Lorenzana, 53 Cal. 197, 199. Such a conveyance vests the legal title in the grantee. It is good against the grantor, his heirs, executors, administrators, and persons claiming under him, and as to all persons except creditors of the grantor who may question it in a proper proceeding. First Nat. Bank v. Eastman, 144 Cal. 487, 489, 77 P. 1043, 103 Am. St. Rep. 95, 1 Ann. Cas. 626; Frink v. Roe, 70 Cal. 296, 308, 11 P. 820.

[2, 3] It is next urged by appellant that, as whatever rights the respondent Moore has were acquired by him as assignee under the assignment made by Schneider and Miller, and whatever rights the respondent creditors have are founded on their having signed the agreement of assignment, and consented thereto, if Schneider could not maintain this action, it necessarily follows that the respondents cannot do so. The plaintiff, as the voluntary assignee of Schneider, acquired no greater right in the property than Schneider had at the time of the assignment. He took only the interest of the assignor in and to the property (First Nat. Bank v. Menke, 128 Cal. 103, 107, 60 P. 675), and can assert no claim to property which the assignor might not. An assignment does not carry with it to the trustee the title to property which the assignor has previously transferred in fraud of his creditors, and, in the absence of any statute giving such power, the assignee cannot maintain an action to recover it. Francisco v. Aguirre, 94 Cal. 180, 182, 29 P. 495; Babcock v. Chase, 111 Cal. 351, 353, 43 P. 1105; Southern Cal. H. & M. Co. v. Borton, 46 Cal. App. 524, 529, 189 P. 1022.

[4, 5] Respondents endeavor to avoid the effect of this rule by arguing that the respondent Moore is not a mere assignee for the benefit of creditors, representing the assignors only, but that under the assignment in this case he represents and is trustee for the creditors. "The failure to observe the well-defined distinction," they quote from

Ruggles v. Cannedy, 127 Cal. 290, 304, 53 P. 911, 916 (46 L. R. A. 371), "between the powers of the assignee in insolvency, who thus represents the creditors, and those of an assignee for the benefit of creditors, who is the representative of the assignor, has led to much conflict of authority upon this question." There is, of course, a distinction between an assignee in insolvency and an assignee for the benefit of creditors. It is this: In the case of an assignee in insolvency, the estate of the debtor "devolves in trust for the benefit of others than the debtor." That we understand to mean that when a person has been adjudicated an insolvent, and the assignee in insolvency has been appointed, the estate of the insolvent, without any voluntary act of his, passes from him to the assignee. In the case of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, either statutory or nonstatutory, the estate passes as the result of some positive act or agreement on the part of the owner of the property. In the one case, the estate of the insolvent "devolves" upon the assignee by operation of law. In the other, the estate is "granted" by the owner. First Nat. Bank v. Menke, supra. In the case of a statutory assignment, the assignee is authorized to make an assignment of property in trust for the satisfaction of his creditors, which must be made to the sheriff. Civ. Code, § 3449. After the creditors have elected an assignee, the sheriff is required to assign to such elected assignee "all the property assigned to him." It is therefore evident that the assignee takes only the property voluntarily conveyed to the sheriff by the assignor. Francisco v. Aguirre, supra. The effect is the same when an insolvent voluntarily conveys his property to an assignee of his own choosing. We find ourselves unable to agree with the respondents that, under the assignment in this case, the respondent Moore, as assignee, had any greater powers than are possessed by an assignee selected in accord with the statutory provisions relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors. Civ. Code, § 3460 et seq.

[6] For another, and second, reason, the appellant contends that none of the respondents are in position to maintain this action. He invokes the doctrine, universally held, that a creditor is not in position to attack a transfer for fraud unless he has a specific lien upon the property transferred, or has reduced his claim against the debtor to judgment. Sewell v. Price, 164 Cal. 265, 270, 128 P. 407. The creditor can avoid the act of his debtor for fraud only when the fraud obstructs the enforcement, by legal process, of his right to take the property affected by the transfer. Civ. Code, § 3441. He cannot be said to be delayed, hindered, or defrauded by any conveyance until some property out of which he has a specific right to be satisfied is withdrawn by a fraudulent conveyance. That right does not exist until he has bound the property, by judgment, or by judgment and execution, as the case may be, and as shown that he is defrauded by the conveyance in consequence of not being able to procure satisfaction of his debt in a due course of law. Brown v. Campell, 100 Cal. 635, 35 P. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314; Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances (2d Ed.) p. 522. The respondents concede the general rule to be as stated. Their position is that, as to the action by the plaintiff assignee, the rule has no application because he could not sue for a money judgment, and is not seeking to set aside any conveyance, fraudulent or otherwise, but it is merely endeavoring to establish title to real property to be in himself under the provisions of the assignment executed by Schneider to him. The intervening creditors, they admit, cannot recover a money judgment against Schneider, for the reason that, in signing the agreement of assignment, they have expressly released the debtors, and have no right of a direct action against them, or either of them.

[7] If this were an action in the nature of an ordinary creditor's bill brought by all or any, of the respondents, other than the plaintiff Moore, to subject the property in question to the payment of their demands, the contention of the appellant would raise an effective bar against the maintenance of the action, But that is not the kind of an action that has been brought. Section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real or personal property, adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim." We know of no reason why one in the position of the plaintiff, who is not here claiming as a creditor, may not maintain such an action as a quiet title action under the provisions of the Code. The right to recover is, of course, dependent upon matters which do not relate to the particular form of the action brought. The other respondents had such an interest in the success of the plaintiff that they were entitled to intervene in the action. Code Civ. Proc. § 387.

By apt pleading and proof in the court below, the appellant interposed, as a bar to the right of the plaintiff to recover in this action, a judgment rendered in a suit instituted by Sophie M. Schneider against William Schneider, her husband, to quiet title to the real property here in question, and in which cause a decree was entered in her favor. The trial court held the judgment had no force or effect as against the plaintiff and interveners, and was not a bar to the present action. Appellant challenges the correctness of that construction. The findings show that Mrs. Schneider received the deed from Saunders and wife on or about March 8, 1918, and recorded it March 27th. The assignment by Schneider and Miller to Moore, as assignee, was executed April 6th following. It was not signed by Mrs. Schneider and was never recorded. On May 28, 1918, Mrs. Schneider instituted an action against William Schneider to quiet her title to the property, and filed notice of the pendency of the action in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the property was located. The assignee, Moore, was not made a party to the action, made no appearance therein, and apparently took no notice of its pendency. William Schneider appeared in the action and filed an answer. Mrs. Schneider died, and her administrator, Metcalfe, the appellant here, was substituted as plaintiff in her place. In due course, judgment and decree was entered that Sophie M. Schneider was, at the time of the commencement of the action, and at the time of her death, the owner in fee simple of the property, and that William Schneider had no right, title, interest, or estate therein. The judgment was not appealed from, and became final. It is the contention of appellant that the judgment wiped out all of the claims of the respondents, and is a complete bar to this action by reason of the provision found in section 1214 of the Civil Code that an unrecorded conveyance is void as against any judgment affecting title when due notice of action has been given.

[8] The respondents claim that the decree obtained by Mrs. Schneider was a "consent judgment," and should not be held res adjudicata as to the respondent assignee. The contention is not sound. A judgment by consent in an action in which the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties is res adjudicata, and conclusive between the parties and those deriving under them, and will bind them and those claiming under them as efficaciously as if it had been entered after a trial of the issues. McCreery v. Fuller, 63 Cal. 30, 32. It may be impeached, like any other judicial record, by evidence of a want of jurisdiction in the court rendering it, by showing collusion between the parties, or by proof of fraud on the part of the party offering the record; but, until that is done, it will bind the parties and those in privity with them. Partridge v. Shepard, 71 Cal. 470, 475, 12 P. 480.

[9] The assignment executed by Schneider and Miller purported to "grant, bargain, sell, assign and transfer unto" the assignee Moore all the property of the assignors, both real and personal, not exempt from execution. It therefore constituted a "conveyance." Civ. Code, § 1215. Section 1214 of the Civil Code provides that every conveyance of real property, with designated exceptions, "is void as against any subsequent purchaser * * * of the same property, or any part thereof, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first duly recorded." Section 1217 of the same Code provides that "an unrecorded instrument is valid as between the parties thereto and those who have notice thereof." Respondents contend that Mrs. Schneider was not a purchaser in good faith and for a consideration, and had actual notice of the execution of the assignment held by respondent Moore. Therefore, they contend that, reading the provisions of the two sections (1214 and 1217, supra) together, the judgment in the quiet-title action should not operate as a bar to the claim of the plaintiff in the present suit. If the contentions of respondent as to the facts and the law of the case were both correct, there might be an immediate ending of the controversy. The trial court found the transaction, by which title was vested in Mrs. Schneider alone, as one conceived for the purpose of defrauding Schneider's creditors, thereby denying the right of appellant to claim that Mrs. Schneider was a purchaser of the property in good faith. But Mrs. Schneider was not a subsequent purchaser at all. She acquired title before the assignment to Moore was made, and at a time when the latter had no interest in the property. Her position after the assignment was that of a prior purchaser holding title against a subsequent purchaser claiming under an unrecorded conveyance. It does not appear from the record, and there is no finding, that Mrs. Schneider had knowledge of the assignment to Moore before she instituted the suit to quiet title. The finding of the trial court is merely that Sophie M. Schneider, and her legal representative after her death, had notice of the pendency of the present action before trial and judgment in the quiet-title suit. The fact that she appeared in the present action to resist the claims of the assignee based on an unrecorded conveyance, while prosecuting her own action to judgment, does not, in our opinion, make the situation any better for the case of the respondents, for the reason, as we shall presently show, that knowledge and notice subsequently acquired was not sufficient to change the relative situations of the parties existing at the time the lis pendens was recorded in the quiet-title action.

Section 1214 of the Civil Code, supra, was amended in 1895, by adding thereto the provision that every conveyance of real property is void "as against any judgment affecting the title, unless such conveyance shall have been duly recorded prior to the record of notice of action." Stats. 1895, p. 50. The context indicates very clearly that the added portion, defining the effect of judgments obtained after record of notice of action, is unrelated to subsequent purchasers, questions of good faith, valuable consideration, or those who have notice. For this reason, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the authorities cited by respondent which hold that section 1214, supra, and section 1217, supra, should be construed together. Slaker v. McCormick-Saeltzer Co., 179 Cal. 387, 388, 177 P. 155; Robinson v. Muir, 151 Cal. 118, 122, 90 P. 521; Bell v. Pleasant, 145 Cal. 410, 413, 78 P. 957, 104 Am. St. Rep. 61. They deal with situations which do not arise under the provision of section 1214 applicable to the facts in this case. Cases, such as Warnock v. Harlow, 96 Cal. 298, 31 P. 166, 31 Am. St. Rep. 209, decided before section 1214, supra, was amended in 1895, are not in point on the question here under consideration.

The rule that an unrecorded conveyance is void as against a judgment affecting title, unless such conveyance shall have been duly recorded prior to the record of notice of action, which now finds expression in our Code (section 1214, supra), is founded on, but is more drastic than a similar enactment contained in the New York Code (Old Code, § 132; Code Civ. Proc., § 1671), which provides, in part, that "a person, whose conveyance or incumbrance is subsequently executed, or subsequently recorded, is bound by all proceedings taken in the action, after the filing of the notice, to the same extent as if he was a party to the action." This provision of the Code, it was held, "so modified the rule as to make the action and its result effectual as against subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers, whose conveyances are not recorded at the time of filing the notice of pendency of the action." Kursheedt v. U. D. S. Institution, 118 N. Y. 358, 363, 23 N. E. 473, 474 (7 L. R. A. 229). In such cases the subsequent holder is as completely cut off by the judgment as if he had been made a party to the action. People's Trust Co. v. Tonkonogy, 144 App. Div. 333, 128 N. Y. S. 1055, 1057. In another case it was held that the holder of an unrecorded deed is placed in the same position as a grantee after the filing and indexing of the notice of action. Bernard v. Baldwin, 106 Misc. Rep. 631, 175 N. Y. S. 138, 140. In other words, his rights are wholly subordinated and subject to whatever equities or claims the judgment in the action shall thereafter charge upon the property. Crocker v. Lewis, 144 N. Y. 140, 143, 39 N. E. 1.

No decision of the courts of this state dealing with the precise question here involved has been called to our attention. Cases cited by appellant, holding that in foreclosure suits the holder of an unrecorded conveyance or lien need not be made a party to such action, and that the judgment therein rendered is as conclusive against the party holding such unrecorded conveyance or lien as if he had been made a party to the action, construe section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating solely to actions for the foreclosure of mortages. However, that provision of the section, the precise provision found in section 1671 of the New York Code of Civil Procedure, and the opinions are helpful as indicating that the rule relating to the effect of judgment affecting title to real property as against unrecorded conveyances is well understood and equally well established.

[10] Respondents argue that the pendency of the action brought by Mrs. Schneider against her husband was "carefully concealed" from the assignee, and appellant ought not therefore to be allowed to plead the judgment in that case as a bar in this action. They have suggested, and the findings disclose, no good reason why the assignee was not made aware of the situation of which they now complain. The deed under which Mrs. Schneider claimed title was placed on record. The filing for record with the recorder of a notice of the pendency of an action is the mode substituted by statute for constructive notice to all the world of the pendency of such action, which arose under the common law, ipso facto, upon the institution of the suit. Blackburn v. Bucksport, 7 Cal. App. 649, 653, 95 P. 668. Respondents cannot now escape the consequence of the failure of Moore to record the assignment in due time on the ground that he had no notice of an action subsequently brought by Mrs. Schneider. An assignment of real property for the benefit of creditors is as much subject to the provisions of the Code relating to transfers of real property, and as much within the policy of the statute as any other transfer of such property. Watkins v. Wilhoit, 104 Cal. 395, 399, 38 P. 53.

[11] The particular language of the New York statute, that the holder of an unrecorded title or incumbrance is "bound by the proceedings to the same extent as if he was a party to the action," has led the courts of that state to suggest that the rule might not have the same application in cases where a plaintiff has actual notice of the unrecorded incumbrance at the time of the commencement of the action. Kursheedt v. U. D. S. Institution, supra; Lamont v. Cheshire, 65 N. Y. 30. The California statute has made the rule more stringent in its application than it is in New York, by declaring that a conveyance which is not of record when the lis pendens is filed is "void" as against the judgment affecting the title to the property. The provision was added to section 1214 in 1895, long after section 1217, providing that an unrecorded instrument is valid as between the parties and those who have notice thereof, based on an older enactment (Stats. 1850, p. 249), was incorporated in our present Code. It was enacted by the Legislature, we may assume, to stimulate and bring about the prompt recordation of all conveyances of real property. Its purpose is to prevent fraud through the withholding of notice of transactions affecting titles, to the detriment of subsequent purchasers in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and those who may seek to confirm their claims to real property by judgments affecting the title. It constitutes a most salutary rule. Whether or not it should apply in a case in which a prior grantee is not made a party to the action, or in which it appears that a plaintiff has actual knowledge or notice of the unrecorded claim of title at the time of the commencement of the action, we are not prepared to say. Neither situation is presented here. The findings do not support the contention of the respondents that Mrs. Schneider knew of the assignment to respondent Moore when she brought her action to quiet title. There is nothing in the findings to show that she took with notice of his claim. We are satisfied that the contention of the appellant is the correct one, and that the judgment rendered in the quiet-title action is a bar to the present action.

A number of contentions, why the judgment of the lower court should be reversed, are advanced by appellant and answered by the respondents, in addition to those already considered by us. They relate, for the most part, to the findings of the trial court, alleged errors in the admission of evidence, and the form of the judgment made and entered. In view of what has already been said in the opinion, we deem it necessary to notice only one of the questions thus raised. The trial court found that a deed of the property, which is the subject of this litigation, executed by Mrs. Schneider on November 28, 1917, to William Schneider, "was delivered and became effective." The appellant challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding. It appears from the testimony that Mr. and Mrs. Schneider were not living together. In an effort to reach a compromise agreement concerning their property rights, and in anticipation of that result being accomplished, Mrs. Schneider executed and placed the deed referred to in the hands of the attorney representing her interests at that time, with instructions to deliver it to Mr. Schneider when the parties arrived at a settlement of their troubles. No settlement was reached, and Mrs. Schneider brought the action against her husband to quiet title. Her former counsel was then in New York. When he returned, he ascertained the deed had been removed from his safe, and that it had been filed for record after Mrs. Schneider brought her suit. He testified positively that he did not deliver or authorize delivery of the deed to anybody, and spoke to no one about it. He did not instruct any one to record the deed. The only other witness to testify concerning the deed was William Schneider, who testified that the deed was never in his possession at any time; he never procured it from Mrs. Schneider's attorney, and did not know how it came to be recorded. That, in substance, is all the testimony on the subject. It is uncontradicted. Appellant contends that the testimony was not inherently incredible or improbable, and should have been held sufficient to warrant a finding that the deed was not delivered, or, if delivered, it did not become effective because delivered in disobedience of the grantor's instructions, and not in accord with the purposes for which it was executed. On the other hand, respondents rely on the recordation of the deed as constituting prima facie delivery, which was not overthrown by the evidence. Whether or not the trial court correctly decided the issue of fact as to the delivery of the deed is an immaterial issue in the case. Schneider, the grantee therein, was made a party defendant to the action to quiet title brought by Mrs. Schneider, the grantor. The findings show that the deed was not placed on record until after the action was instituted and the notice of pendency of the action had been recorded. Schneider then filed an answer in which he claimed the property to be his separate property, and that Mrs. Schneider had no title or interest therein. The judgment was that Schneider had no interest in the property, and he was enjoined from asserting any right or claim thereto. The claim and right of action of the respondent plaintiff are barred by that judgment. Furthermore, the respondent acquired no greater right by the assignment from Schneider than Schneider had. Therefore, the question of purported delivery of the deed is wholly immaterial.

The judgment is reversed.

WEAVER v. FICKETT et al. (L. A. 8236.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 14, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜526—Findings of referee should have been included in judgment roll as same was made up by clerk of trial court.

The findings of the referee, to which exceptions were taken, should, under Code Civ. Proc. § 670, have been included in the judgment roll as the same was made up by the clerk of the trial court on appeal pursuant to section 953a et seq.

2. Appeal and error ⊜554(3) — Absence in record upon appeal of reporter's transcript or bill of exceptions is not of itself ground for affirmance of judgment.

Absence in record on appeal of reporter's transcript or bill of exceptions is not of itself ground for affirmance of judgment.

3. Appeal and error ⊜544(1)—Transcript of judgment roll, together with notice of appeal, is sufficient record upon appeal, if appellant elects to prosecute appeal upon such record.

Transcript of judgment roll, together with notice of appeal, is sufficient record, if appellant elects to prosecute appeal on such record.

4. Appeal and error ⊜544(3)—No bill of exceptions or reporter's transcript is required, where grounds for appeal appear in judgment roll.

No bill of exceptions or reporter's transcript is required, where grounds for appeal appear in judgment roll.

5. Appeal and error ⊜1127—Motion to affirm judgment denied, where its consideration involves determination of merits of appeal.

A motion to affirm a judgment because no reporter's transcript has been settled, certified, or filed upon appeal (taken pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 953a et seq.) will be denied, where its consideration, because of assigned errors reviewable independently of absence of such transcript, involves a determination of the merits, thus effecting an unwarranted advancement of the case.

6. Appeal and error ⊜653(3)—Occasion for application for relief under statute permitting amendments is properly addressable to trial court in first instance.

The matter of settlement and certification of a reporter's transcript for use upon appeal being committed in the first instance to the trial judge, any application for relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, should be addressed to the trial court in first instance.

Action by R. D. Weaver against George E. Fickett and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. On plaintiff's motion to affirm judgment. Motion denied.

Davis & Thorne, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

G. C. De Garmo, and H. B. Cornell, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1-5] This is a motion to affirm the judgment upon the ground that no reporter's transcript has been settled, certified, or filed upon this appeal, the appeal having been taken pursuant to the provisions of Code of Civil Procedure, § 953a et seq. The record upon appeal now on file in this court consists of a "clerk's transcript," containing a certified copy of the judgment roll, the notice of appeal, and the notice to the clerk to prepare transcript. There is also a "supplemental clerk's transcript," containing certified copies of a bill of particulars, demand for bill of particulars, order appointing referee, report and finding of referee, exceptions to the report of referee, and of certain other documents on file in the office of the clerk of the trial court. The findings of the referee were not included in the "judgment roll" as the same was made up by the clerk of the trial court. They should have been so included (Code Civ. Proc. § 670), and doubtless may be regarded for the purposes of this appeal as a part of the judgment roll. The absence in the record upon appeal of a reporter's transcript or bill of exceptions is not in and of itself a ground for affirmance of the judgment. The transcript of a judgment roll, together with notice of appeal, is a sufficient record upon appeal, if the appellant elects to prosecute his appeal upon such a record. If the grounds for appeal appear in the judgment roll, no bill of exceptions or reporter's transcript is required. 2 Cal. Juris. p. 527. Appellants' opening brief is on file herein, and it appears therefrom that they urge various points upon this appeal which cannot be considered in the absence of a reporter's transcript, but they also make the points that the judgment appealed from is not supported by the findings, and that the complaint herein does not state a cause of action. These points may be considered and determined upon an inspection of the judgment roll alone. The motion to affirm must therefore be denied, because a consideration and determination of these points at this time would involve in effect a determination of the merits of the appeal, and would effect an unwarranted advancement of this case. Jenks v. Lurie (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 370; 2 Cal. Juris. p. 771.

[6] Appellants have filed counter affidavits in response to the motion, in which they show that they filed within due time in the court below a notice to the clerk to prepare transcript, which was sufficiently broad in its terms to require the preparation of a reporter's transcript; that they arranged with the reporter for his compensation therefor; that such transcript was duly prepared by the reporter and delivered to counsel for appellants, who examined the same and returned it to the reporter for delivery to the clerk; that the same was duly delivered by the reporter to the clerk for presentation to the judge who tried the case; that for some unexplained reason no time was ever fixed by the trial judge for the settlement of the transcript, but that counsel for appellants believed, and had some reason to believe, that the reporter's transcript had been settled, certified, and filed in this court, and that appellants prepared and filed their opening brief herein, believing in good faith that the reporter's transcript was in fact on file in this court. Appellants also filed herein an affidavit of merits, evidently intended as part of an application to this court for relief under Code of Civil Procedure, § 473. If there is, under the present circumstances, any occasion for application for relief under this section, it should be addressed to the trial court. Curtin v. Ingle, 155 Cal. 53, 57, 99 P. 480; Morey v. Paladini, 187 Cal. 727, 203 P. 760. The matter of the settlement and certification of a reporter's transcript for use upon appeal is committed, in the first instance, to the trial judge. There is no proceeding now before us under which we would be entitled, if we were so disposed, to control or direct his action in this matter.

The motion to affirm is denied.

All concur.

FLEMING v. SUPERIOR COURT OF ORANGE COUNTY et al. (L. A. 8360.)

1. Statutes ⟸118(1)—Section of Vehicle Act, rendering "speed trap" evidence incompetent, held to come within title.

Section 155 of Vehicle Act, which renders evidence of traffic violations obtained by operation of "speed traps" incompetent, falls within title of act, and is therefore not invalid under Const. art. 4, § 24, which provides that every act shall embrace one subject which shall be expressed in its title.

2. Constitutional law ⟸48, 70(1)—Courts not concerned with legislative matter; acts on subjects primarily of legislative concern will be upheld, if possible, on rational theory.

With affairs which are primarily of legislative concern courts are not called upon to deal, unless it appears that claimed infringement of Constitution is real, and in considering such question act will be held constitutional if it can be done upon any rational theory.

3. Witnesses ⟸2(2)—Section of Vehicle Act rendering "speed trap" evidence incompetent held not to violate guarantee of process of court to obtain witnesses.

Section 155 of Vehicle Act, rendering evidence of traffic violations incompetent if obtained by operation of "speed traps," is not violative of Const. art. 1, § 13, guaranteeing accused right to have process of court to obtain witnesses.

4. Constitutional law ⟸55—Section of Vehicle Act held not to usurp judicial functions.

Section 155 of Vehicle Act is not invalid as usurpation by legislative branch of functions of judicial branch, in contravention of Const. art. 3, § 1.

5. Statutes ⟸87—Section of Vehicle Act held not special or local legislation regulating practice of courts.

Vehicle Act, § 155, rendering evidence of traffic violations obtained by operation of speed traps incompetent, does not violate Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 3, inhibiting passage of local or special laws regulating practice of courts.

6. Criminal law ⟸1134(7)—Jurisdiction of inferior court sole question in certiorari proceeding.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1068, 1074, in proceeding in certiorari to superior court, question of jurisdiction alone is open to review, and errors of law committed in exercise of authority cannot be considered or corrected.

7. Criminal law ⟸321—Superior court's action within appellate jurisdiction presumed regular.

When superior court has acquired appellate jurisdiction, its action within limits of that jurisdiction is entitled to same presumption of regularity that attaches to exercise of original jurisdiction.

8. Criminal law ⟸1134(7)—Lack of evidence to support conviction of Vehicle Act violation not corrected in certiorari proceeding.

In certiorari proceeding to annul conviction of Vehicle Act violation, judgment of superior court will be affirmed where it was regularly made and entered in exercise of court's jurisdiction, though there is no competent evidence to support judgment, since errors of law are not open to review in such proceeding.

Victor Fleming was convicted of a violation of the Vehicle Act, on evidence procured through operation of a speed trap, and he brings certiorari. Judgment affirmed.

David R. Faries, J. Allen Davis, and Louis C. Spiess, Jr., all of Los Angeles, and Richard C. Waltz, of Beverley Hills, for petitioner.

Alex P. Nelson, Dist. Atty., C. N. Mozley and D. G. Wettlin, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of Santa Ana, for respondents.

SHENK, J. By complaint filed in the justices' court of Seal Beach township in the county of Orange, petitioner was charged with the commission of a misdemeanor, in that he did, on or about the 9th day of November, 1923, drive an automobile on a public highway within said county at an excessive and unlawful rate of speed, in excess of 35 miles an hour, in violation of section 113 of the California Vehicle Act. Stats. 1923, p. 517. He was found guilty, and was subjected to a fine of $25. On appeal duly taken to the superior court, the judgment of conviction was reversed and a new trial granted. On the trial de novo in the respondent court, pursuant to section 1469 of the Penal Code, the petitioner was again found guilty as charged, and a straight fine of $25 was imposed upon him. The present proceeding is in certiorari, commenced in the District Court of Appeal of the Second District, Division 2. The writ was there issued, and after hearing the judgment of the superior court was annulled. On application of respondents, the judgment of the District Court of Appeal was vacated and a hearing ordered in this court.

The cause was submitted to the respondent court for decision on the transcript of the evidence and the proceedings in the justices' court. It was stipulated that the conviction resulted solely on evidence procured by traffic officers through the maintenance and operation of a "speed trap," as defined in and denounced by section 155 of said California Vehicle Act, which reads as follows:

"Evidence based on use of speed traps not to be admitted. No evidence as to the speed of a vehicle operated on a highway by any person arrested for a violation of the provisions of this act shall be admitted in any court at the consequent trial of such person when such evidence relates to or is based upon the maintenance or use of a speed trap.

"A speed trap within the meaning of this section is a particular section of, or distance on, any highway the length of which has been or is measured for distance, and marked off or otherwise designated or determined, and the limits of which are within the vision of an officer or officers who calculate the speed of a vehicle passing through such speed trap by using the elapsed time during which such vehicle travels between the entrance and exit of such speed trap.

"Nor shall any testimony in any such case be admitted in any court from any officer or officers arresting or participating or assisting in the arrest of such person if any speed trap was used in such arrest or if such officer or officers or any of them, were not at the time of such arrest dressed in a distinctive uniform and patrolling or upon the highway upon which the arrest was made in plain sight of all persons traveling thereon."

The petitioner contends that, because of the provisions of said section 155, the evidence before the respondent court, and upon which his conviction was based, was incompetent, and that therefore said court was without jurisdiction to render a judgment of conviction against him. The respondents contend that said section 155 contravenes numerous provisions of the state Constitution and is therefore void. With reference to these contentions of respondents we approve the reasoning and adopt the conclusions of the District Court of Appeal in its opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Works as follows:

[1] "We come now to the very interesting question, consisting of several branches, as to the validity of section 155 of the Motor Vehicle Act under the Constitution. One contention of respondents is that the enactment is invalid under section 24 of article 4 of the organic law of the state, which reads, in part: 'Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title.' The title of the act in which section 155 is contained is of great length, but petitioner points only to certain portions of it as 'expressing' the subject, or the part of the subject, of the act which is comprised within the section that now lies before us as follows: 'An act to regulate the use and operation of vehicles upon the public highways and elsewhere; * * * to provide penalties for violations of provisions of this act; * * * [and] to provide for carrying out the objects of this act. * * * In our view it is necessary only to refer, in dealing with the attack now made upon the section by respondents, to the first member of this quotation from the title of the act and from petitioner's brief; that is to say, 'An act to regulate the use and operation of vehicles upon the public highways and elsewhere.'

[2] "In considering the question now presented, we are to remember that the matter of the regulation of the use and operation of vehicles upon the highways of the state is primarily one of legislative concern. With such affairs the courts are not called upon to deal unless it appears to them that a claimed infringement of any provision of the Constitution by the Legislature is plainly a real infringement. In considering such a question, the courts will inquire whether there is any rational theory upon which the action of the Legislature in passing a law can be sustained. People v. Simonsen, 64 Cal. App. 97, 220 P. 442. If such a theory can be discovered, the questioned act of the Legislature will be held to be constitutional. Does section 155 amount to a regulation of 'the use and operation of vehicles upon the public highways,' in the face of the contention of respondent which is here made that it provides a mere rule of evidence? Petitioner asserts in his brief that the act as a whole 'has for its primary object the safety of all travelers upon the public highways.' He then says: 'The Legislature concluded that the public safety, the obvious purpose of numerous regulations contained in the act, would best be served by requiring traffic officers to spend their hours of duty in patrolling the public highways; that the presence of such officers upon the highways would constitute a far greater deterrent to excessive speed, and would insure a more universal observance of the many rules of the road than would a concealment of said officers in speed traps located off the highway. The Legislature did not expressly prohibit the maintenance or use of speed traps, but it did render their maintenance and use wholly ineffectual for all purposes, by expressly prohibiting the introduction of speed trap testimony. The legislative purpose is disclosed in that portion of section 155 which prohibits the introduction of any testimony from any officer or officers arresting or participating or assisting in the arrest of such person if any speed trap was used in such arrest, or if such officer or officers, or any of them, were not at the time of such arrest dressed in a distinctive uniform, and patrolling or upon the highway upon which the arrest was made, in plain sight of all persons traveling thereon. The Legislature, in the foregoing provision, clearly expressed its conviction that the presence of traffic officers actually patrolling the highways, dressed in distinctive uniforms, and in plain sight of all travelers on the highways, would have a most salutary effect in securing the observance of each and all of the regulations imposed upon drivers of vehicles upon the public highways. * * * The Legislature knew that a very large percentage of accidents upon public highways occurred at street intersections, that such accidents were caused by failure to observe the right of way rule, by failure to give proper signals, by failure on the part of drivers to turn at intersections in the manner prescribed by law. The Legislature quite evidently believed that many of these accidents would be prevented in the event that officers patrolled the highway and enforced each and all the rules of the road heretofore mentioned.' We quote thus largely from petitioner's brief for the reason that it appears to us that he strikingly presents not only a rational but a commendable basis for the enactment of section 155 as an effective means for accomplishing the main purpose of the act in which it is contained. To quote again from the title of the enactment, why does not section 155 provide a most salutary means 'to regulate use and operation of vehicles upon the public highways?' Is it not logical to suppose that the lawmaking body thought it better to prevent the commission of crime than to punish it after its commission, and that its members saw, in the means employed through section 155, a proper method of effectuating that laudable result? If the lawmaking bodies of the world should hit upon some means to prevent arson, burglary, or murder, thus obviating the necessity of laws to provide for their punishment, should we not hail the achievement as an epoch-making triumph? It is not only possible, but it is extremely probable, as contended by petitioner, that the members of the Legislature had some such idea in mind as is suggested by these questions when they enacted section 155, and, if we can see the possibility of such a thing, it is enough under the rules of law affecting our power to pass upon the constitutionality of the section in question.

"With these reflections in mind, we cannot regard section 155 as an attempt to regulate the procedure of courts or to prescribe a rule of evidence. The necessity or propriety of such a purpose cannot be ascertained upon the highest flight of imagination. Why, as a mere matter of evidence, should 'speed trap evidence' be excluded from a jury? A rational and logical purpose can be discerned, however, as we have attempted to point out, in the enactment of the section as a means to regulate the use and operation of vehicles upon the public highways. To this purpose the interdict against the admissibility of such evidence is merely an adjunct. Suppose the Legislature had made the maintenance of speed traps a penal offense. Would any one question such an enactment on the ground that it did not come within the title of the Motor Vehicle Act? Surely not. That means of stamping out what the Legislature evidently regarded as the speed trap evil would have been entirely proper under the title of the act, and an enactment designed to suppress the same evil by making the maintenance of speed traps utterly useless is, to our minds, equally within the objects of the statute as a whole, and as clearly within its title.

[3] "Respondents further insist that section 155 is unconstitutional under section 13 of article 1 of the organic law. That section reads, in part: 'In criminal prosecutions * * * the party accused shall have the right * * * to have the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf. * * *' This point is advanced upon the theory that one under prosecution for the violation of provisions of the law forbidding the operation of vehicles on the highways at an excessive speed might desire the testimony in his own behalf of officers operating a speed trap at the time of the commission of his alleged crime, and that section 155 denies him that right. We do not pause to determine whether the point may not be concluded by our disposition of the question last above discussed, upon the theory that section 155 in its essential purpose has not to do with a question of evidence, but was enacted for the purpose of preventing the maintenance of speed traps, thus, in the exercise of the judgment of the Legislature, placing such devices, or means of procuring evidence, outside the public policy of the state. Considering section 155 from the viewpoint of respondent, it cannot operate to deny a defendant process under which to procure the attendance of witnesses in his behalf, or to prevent the examination of competent witnesses, granting that the constitutional guaranty as to process includes a guaranty of the right to examine witnesses produced. The section merely provides that officers operating speed traps cannot be witnesses as to knowledge derived by them while so acting. As well might it be contended that section 13 of article 1 is violated by section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that husband and wife may not testify against each other, that an attorney may not testify against his client, that a priest may not as a witness betray the secrets of the confessional, that a physician may not testify against his patient, and that a public officer may not be examined as to communications made to him in official confidence, for a prohibition against all such persons testifying against certain parties includes, necessarily, a prohibition against their testifying in favor of those opposed to such parties. The same might be said as to other enactments which make various kinds of 'natural' evidence incompetent. Practically all rules of evidence are exclusionary (Jones Ev. § 1), and it has never been doubted that the Legislature has power to declare certain 'natural' evidence inadmissible, or to declare certain persons incompetent as witnesses, either on grounds of public policy, or for the purpose of conducing to the dispatch of business in the courts.

[4] "Respondents inveigh against the constitutionality of section 155 because, as they contend, it infringes the provisions of section 1 of article 3 of the Constitution. This section provides, in effect, that the powers of government are divided into three branches, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, and that 'no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others.' It is said that the Legislature, in enacting section 155, has usurped the functions of the judicial branch. This point has been sufficiently covered by what we have already said as to the two other constitutional questions of which we have made disposition. We think the point now presented is without merit.

[5] "It is said that section 155 violates that provision of the Constitution to the effect that the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws regulating the practice of courts of justice. Subdivision 3, § 25, art. 4. This question is answered by what we have said in discussing the claim that the subject-matter of section 155 is not covered by the title of the act of which it is a part. It may be remarked, in addition, that the section is neither special nor local legislation. This fact is so obvious to us that we conclude the particular question upon a mere mention of it."

[6] Since it is determined that said section 155 does not contravene any of the said provisions of the Constitution, it necessarily follows that the evidence admitted by the respondent court in support of the allegations of the complaint and as a foundation for the judgment of conviction was incompetent. It is the position of petitioner that with naught but incompetent evidence to support its judgment the respondent court was acting without jurisdiction. The respondents contend that the respondent court, as a court of general jurisdiction, had the power to determine the guilt or innocence of the petitioner who was properly before it charged with a public offense, and that, assuming the evidence to be erroneously admitted, its determination based thereon was not void for want of jurisdiction, but was merely error in the exercise of jurisdiction. In support of their contention the respondents rely on Roberts v. Police Court, 185 Cal. 65, 195 P. 1053, and earlier decisions to the same effect. It is well settled that on every question except the mere question of power the action of the superior court is final and conclusive when brought in question in a proceeding in certiorari. As stated in the Matter of Hughes, 159 Cal. 360, 113 P. 684:

"The Supreme Court has jurisdiction in certiorari to review a judgment of the superior court only in a case where that court has exceeded its jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 1068), and in such cases only for the purpose of inquiring whether or not the judgment sought to be reviewed was in excess of jurisdiction, or as the Code expresses it, 'the review upon this writ cannot be extended further than to determine whether the inferior tribunal, board, or officer has regularly pursued the authority of such tribunal, board, or officer.' Code Civ. Proc. § 1074. If such tribunal has regularly pursued its authority, our inquiry stops. We cannot consider or correct errors of law committed by the inferior court in the exercise of its authority on the merits of the cause it has jurisdiction to entertain and decide. No matter how erroneous that decision may be, even on the face of the record, we have no power to change, annul, or reverse it in this proceeding, if that court had jurisdiction to act in the matter before it. This has been repeatedly stated in former decisions of this court."

[7] When the respondent court had acquired its appellate jurisdiction, its action within the limits of that jurisdiction was entitled to the same presumptions of regularity that attached to the exercise of its original jurisdiction. Sherer v. Superior Court, 94 Cal. 354, 29 P. 716. In Roberts v. Police Court, supra, it was held, with reference to the power of the superior court, on an appeal from a police court:

"The statute gives to such court the power, upon such appeal, to reverse the judgment of the police court and to grant a new trial, or to affirm the judgment of the police court. It must determine the appeal, reversing or affirming the judgment of the police court as it deems one or the other course proper in view of the matters shown by the statement of the case. Whichever it does it is acting in the exercise of its lawful jurisdiction, and not in excess of such jurisdiction. It has the same power to affirm in any case that it has to reverse, and the mere fact that its conclusion is wrong does not make its action an excess of its jurisdiction. In such case we have simply error in the exercise of jurisdiction. * * * Where a court is invested with jurisdiction to determine the question of the guilt or innocence of one charged with a public offense, * * * by the filing of the complaint and by acquiring jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, its determination of the question of guilt or innocence, whether based on sufficient evidence or not, is a determination arrived at in the exercise of its jurisdiction, and however erroneous it may be, it is not void for want of power in the court to render the decision."

[8] The substance of petitioner's contention is that the respondent court should have found him not guilty of the charge because of lack of competent evidence to convict him. To put it another way, he is insisting that he was wrongly convicted because of evidence before the court which was erroneously admitted. But in such a case the claim of insufficiency of evidence to show the guilt of the accused does not go to the jurisdiction. The determination of the court is no more than error in the exercise of its lawful power. Having acquired its appellate jurisdiction, its judgment within the limits of said jurisdiction was a final judgment, and errors within such jurisdiction "must be submitted to as part of the sacrifice that every individual is compelled to yield to the infirmities of human government." Sherer v. Superior Court, supra. In support of his contention that the respondent court was acting without jurisdiction, the petitioner cites McClatchy v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 413, 51 P. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691; Estate of Paulsen, 35 Cal. App. 654, 170 P. 855; Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 P. 35; Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 228, 207 P. 903; and Hotaling v. Superior Court, 191 Cal. 501, 217 P. 73, 29 A. L. R. 127. In considering the applicability of those cases to the question in hand, it must be borne in mind that an exception to the rule that the sufficiency of the evidence will not be reviewed on certiorari is made when the question is whether jurisdictional facts were or were not proved; that is, whether facts upon which jurisdiction depends were or were not proved. Stumpf v. Board of Supervisors, 131 Cal. 364, 63 P. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350, 4 Cal. Jur. 1111, and cases cited. The cases relied upon by petitioner are cases wherein the exception has been applied, and have no controlling significance in the application of the general rule to the case at bar.

For the reason that the judgment of the respondent court was regularly made and entered in the exercise of its jurisdiction, and was a final judgment on appeal from the justices' court, it is beyond the legitimate power of this court to disturb it.

The proceedings in the respondent court are therefore affirmed.

WHITE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR TULARE COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5113.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 20, 1925.)

Criminal law ⟸260(11)—Certiorari not granted to review affirmance in superior court of conviction of misdemeanor in justice's court.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, and Pen. Code, § 1470, certiorari will not be granted to review judgment of superior court, where such judgment is merely an affirmance of judgment of justice's court, convicting petitioner of violation of Vehicle Act.

E. C. White was convicted of a violation of the Vehicle Act, and he applies for certiorari. Writ denied.

Walter C. Maloy and John W. Maloy, both of Madera, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. Petitioner was convicted, in a justice's court, upon a charge of misdemeanor, in that he did willfully and unlawfully operate and drive an automobile upon a public highway of the county of Tulare at a rate of speed in excess of 35 miles an hour. From the judgment entered therein, he appealed to the superior court. The appeal was presented to that court on a statement of the case prepared and settled as provided by section 1468, Penal Code. After due hearing by the court upon that record, the judgment of the justice's court was affirmed.

Petitioner, who insists that the complaint did not charge the commission by him of any crime, relies upon Fleming v. Superior Court, 45 Cal. App. Dec. 143[1] as authority in support of his contention that a writ of review will lie in this case, notwithstanding that the right to a writ of review is limited to cases in which there is no appeal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1068. In the Fleming Case a rehearing was granted by the Supreme Court, where the matter now awaits decision. Moreover, that was a case where the judgment of the superior court was rendered upon a trial in that court after an order granting a new trial. The Penal Code provides that in such cases, "if a new trial is granted upon appeal, it must be had in the superior court." Pen. Code, § 1469. Without venturing to express our opinion upon the question concerning the right to a writ of review, as presented in the Fleming Case, we are well satisfied that such right does not exist where the judgment of the superior court is merely a judgment of affirmance of the judgment of the justice's court. For it is required that such judgment of affirmance be "remitted to the court below, which may proceed to enforce its sentence." Pen. Code, § 1470.

The petition for writ of review is denied.

BACIGALUPI v. BACIGALUPI. (Civ. 5103.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 13, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1925.)

1. Divorce ⟹254 — Interlocutory decree becomes conclusive as to property rights, if not legally vacated.

An interlocutory decree of divorce becomes a conclusive decree as to property rights of parties, if not vacated in mode prescribed.

2. Divorce ⟹254—Interlocutory decree, affecting property rights, must be attacked within six months.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, time to attack an interlocutory decree, in so far as it relates to property rights of parties, is fixed at six months after entry thereof.

3. Divorce ⟹245(3)—Order, modifying decree to conform to decision, can be made only on proper motion and showing.

Order, modifying decree of divorce with respect to alimony to conform to court's decision, can be made only on proper motion and proper showing of facts relied on.

4. Divorce ⟹243—Interlocutory decree controls over clerk's notation in minutes; "alimony."

Interlocutory decree, making award for support of minor children only, and no award for alimony or support of wife, controls over clerk's entry in minutes that defendant was ordered to pay $40 a month alimony, especially as there was no fatal inconsistency; "alimony," in strict legal sense, meaning support for wife, but being commonly used as covering award to wife for support of children whose custody is awarded her.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Alimony.]

5. Divorce ⟹286—Presumed that trial court found adversely to wife's claim for individual alimony.

Where interlocutory decree of divorce made award for support of minor children only, it must be presumed that court found adversely to wife on her claim for individual support.

6. Divorce ⟹245(1)—Trial court held without jurisdiction to add provision for wife's alimony by modification of decree.

When interlocutory decree of divorce made no provision for alimony for wife's support, trial court was without jurisdiction to add such provision by modification of decree.

7. Courts ⟹23—Parties cannot by stipulation confer jurisdiction.

Where trial court was without jurisdiction to modify interlocutory decree of divorce, stipulation authorizing court to make such modification could not confer such jurisdiction.

8. Appeal and error ⟹82(3)—Order, denying motion to modify interlocutory decree, held appealable order.

Order, denying defendant's motion to annul order modifying interlocutory decree, was an order made after final judgment, within Code Civ. Proc. § 963, and was an appealable order.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by Elsie Bacigalupi against Frank Bacigalupi. From an order refusing to modify an interlocutory decree of divorce, defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. E. Gehring, of Oakland, for appellant.

M. J. Rutherford, of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. On the 21st day of September, 1921, the plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant for divorce upon the grounds of desertion. In her complaint she asked for the custody of her three minor children, and prayed for the sum of "$100 per month as alimony for the support and maintenance of herself and said minor children." On the 20th of October, 1921, a divorce was granted to the plaintiff as prayed, and findings were duly waived. The clerk entered upon his minutes a notation that it was further ordered that the defendant "pay to the plaintiff $40 a month alimony." On the 27th of October, 1921, the court duly signed an interlocutory judgment and decree of divorce in which the defendant was ordered to pay to the plaintiff "as and for the support of the minor children the sum of $40 per month." This judgment was duly entered on October 29, 1921, and no appeal was taken therefrom, and no motion for a new trial was made. On October 3, 1922, prior to the entry of a final decree therein, the attorneys, who had appeared for the respective parties at the time of the trial, filed their written stipulation purporting to authorize the trial court to modify the interlocutory decree as so entered by inserting the words "said plaintiff" so that the judgment should require the defendant to pay to the plaintiff "as and for the support of said plaintiff and the minor children" the sum of $40 per month. Acting upon this stipulation alone, the trial court on the 3d day of October, 1922, entered its order purporting to modify said interlocutory decree by inserting the words "plaintiff and" before the words "minor children." On January 2, 1923, final judgment of divorce was entered in which no mention was made of the provision for payment of alimony or the support of the children. On May 7, 1923, the defendant, acting through an attorney who had been substituted for him, moved the trial court to modify the interlocutory decree as modified by the order of October 3, 1922, so as to relieve the defendant of paying to the plaintiff the alimony and maintenance money covered by the order of October 3, 1922.

This motion was supported by the affidavit of the defendant, in which it was shown that one of said children had passed the age of majority, and that all three were living with the mother, who received a large part of their earnings; that they were employed in positions from which they earned good salaries and did not need any support from the defendant. It was also alleged that the stipulation of October 3, 1922, was signed by an attorney who was not at that time employed by defendant as his counsel, and that the stipulation was made without the defendant's knowledge or consent. The facts alleged in this affidavit were not denied, and the motion came on for hearing on the affidavit and upon oral testimony taken at the time. The facts, developed from the oral testimony, related solely to the amount of income which the respective parties and the three sons were receiving. As a result of the hearing, the trial court, on October 22, 1923, entered an order purporting to grant the motion of defendant to modify the decree, so that the said $40 per month be paid to the plaintiff for her own maintenance and none for said minor children. At the same time the court ordered all other matters contained in the motion denied.

As we read this order it purports to modify the interlocutory decree to the extent of vacating and setting aside the award of support and maintenance for the three sons, and at the same time to modify that decree so as to order the payment of $40 a month exclusively for the support of the plaintiff. As to the latter feature, the order purports to grant a motion which the record does not disclose to have been made. The order further denies the motion made by the defendant to annul or modify the order of October 3, 1922, including the words "plaintiff and" in the paragraph awarding support from the defendant, though this order of October 22, 1923, states that the motion, which was denied, was one for a modification of the final decree of divorce which inserted the word "alimony" in the decree. This order was filed on January 26, 1924, and within due time thereafter the defendant appealed from the order and has prepared a record under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The foregoing statement of facts has been taken from the transcript which has been certified to us by the trial court. The only attempt, made by the respondent to support the order of the trial court, is based upon a statement of facts which in every particular is unsupported by the record. The issue which presents itself upon the record is the simple question whether the trial court had jurisdiction to modify the interlocutory decree in the manner complained of more than six months after its entry.

[1, 2] In the consideration of this question, we are confronted with certain fixed principles which are sustained by numerous authorities. The interlocutory decree of divorce becomes a conclusive decree as to the property rights of the parties, if not vacated in the mode prescribed by law. Gould v. Superior Court, 47 Cal. App. 197, 200, 191 P. 56; Abbott v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 232 P. 154. The time to attack an interlocutory decree, in so far as it relates to the property rights of the parties, is fixed at six months after the entry thereof by the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 367, 173 P. 582.

[3-5] If, as claimed by the respondent, the modification of October 3, 1922, was made to conform to a decision of the trial court (which, however, is not included in the record), that order could be made only upon a proper motion and a proper showing of the facts relied on. As we are required to take the record as we find it, we must rest upon the interlocutory decree or judgment signed by the trial court, rather than the notation made in the minutes of the clerk, and, turning to that judgment, we find that the trial court ordered an award for the support of the minor children only and made no award for "alimony" or support of the wife. The clerk's entry contained the notation that the defendant was ordered to pay "$40 a month alimony" without any mention of the wife or the minor children. Though in a strict legal sense the word "alimony" means support for the wife it is commonly used as covering an award made to the wife for the support of the minor children whose custody is awarded to her. There is therefore no fatal inconsistency between the clerk's notation and the decree signed by the trial court. We must therefore treat the decree as the decision of the court, and from the award which was there made it must be presumed that the trial court found adversely to the respondent upon her claim for individual support.

[6, 7] The case then comes to this: That when the interlocutory decree of divorce was granted to the wife no provision was made for alimony for her own support. This being so, the trial court was without jurisdiction to add such a provision by a modification of the decree. Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, 37 P. 770, 43 Am. St. Rep. 70; O'Brien v. O'Brien, 130 Cal. 409, 62 P. 598; McCaleb v. McCaleb, 177 Cal. 147, 169 P. 1023. If therefore the trial court was without jurisdiction to modify the interlocutory decree at the time and in the manner referred to, the stipulation of counsel purporting to authorize the court to make such a modification is of no importance, as the parties could not by stipulation confer upon the court a jurisdiction which the law has denied it. Furthermore, the time for appeal from, or modification of, the interlocutory decree having passed, and the appellant's counsel having been employed solely for the purpose of representing him in the trial of the action and the entry of that decree, his employment had ceased long before he entered into the stipulation of October 3, 1922. And this is particularly true as the stipulation which purported to authorize the court to impose upon the appellant a burden to pay alimony to his wife in addition to the burden imposed by the interlocutory decree was undoubtedly a stipulation to the prejudice of the appellant. Knowlton v. Mackenzie, 110 Cal. 183, 42 P. 580.

[8] We are satisfied, for the reasons given, that the trial court was without jurisdiction to modify the interlocutory decree by the order of October 3, 1922. The motion of the appellant to annul this order was properly made, as the want of jurisdiction of the trial court was apparent upon the face of the order. The order denying this motion was an order made after final judgment within the meaning of section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, and is an appealable order. It was not necessary therefore to appeal from the order of October 3, 1922, as respondent contends. That order having been made without jurisdiction, the appellant could treat it as a nullity; having moved to modify it, however, the motion should have been granted.

Order reversed.

DAVIS et al. v. STANISLAUS COUNTY FARMERS' UNION. (Civ. 2850.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 19, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 16, 1925.)

1. Evidence ⟹417(1)—Oral testimony, to supply missing item in incomplete writing, only admissible when it does not contradict writing.

Oral testimony is admissible to supply a missing item in a written instrument only when such instrument in and of itself is not complete, and such testimony does not contradict any part of the writing.

2. Evidence ⟹417(9)—Proffered oral testimony held properly excluded as being inconsistent with written agreement.

In action for alleged breach of contract to market grapes grown on plaintiffs' land, parol evidence that the grapes were to be sold f. o. b. point of origin, which was inconsistent with other provisions, held properly excluded as contravening the written instrument.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by Elliott B. Davis and another against Stanislaus County Farmers' Union. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; RICHARDS, J., dissenting.

George F. Snyder and E. B. Davis, both of San Francisco (Loring Davis of counsel), for appellants.

Griffin, Boone & Boone, of Modesto, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment of nonsuit. The complaint alleges that between the 17th day of August and the 17th day of September, 1923, plaintiffs delivered to defendant, at its special instance and request at the city of Modesto, county of Stanislaus, state of California, 26 tons of Thompson seedless grapes owned by plaintiffs, to be sold by said defendant for said plaintiffs in accordance with an express understanding and agreement entered into between the plaintiffs and defendant that said grapes should be sold by the defendant f. o. b. at the city of Modesto, and not otherwise, and at a price specified by the plaintiffs, and that the proceeds from the sale of said grapes would be promptly paid to the plaintiffs; that the defendant sold said grapes contrary thereto, and the plaintiffs thereby suffered the damages alleged.

In support of this contention, the plaintiffs offered in evidence a certain marketing contract, in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Marketing Contract.

"Modesto, California, 8/17/1923.

"This agreement, made by Ed. Roe, first party, and Stanislaus County Farmers' Union, Inc., second party Witnesseth:

"That first party does hereby agree to market through second party all of the first party's crop of grapes grown on the ranch of first party located in the county of Stanislaus, state of California, and described as follows: 1½ miles on California ave. and Panama, for the season of 1923.

"First party agrees to pick and deliver all said crops to the packing house of second party, or to such packing house as second party directs, and second party shall pack all merchantable fruit in such commercial packages as second party believes to be most salable. First party shall pay second party for packing the regular commercial rate therefor, and second party shall be paid the current market price for all shook, loading, bracing, or other material so used. If first party desires, he may pack said fruit and deliver same to second party on board cars, and second party will, if desired, furnish shook and other packing and loading material therefor.

But second party shall not be under obligation to furnish any shook, bracing, loading or other material unless there is obtainable at said time at the packing house of second party sufficient shook and material to take care of the crops of first party. Second party shall be relieved from its obligation to handle said crop in case of car shortage, strikes, embargoes, or any other condition reasonably beyond the control of second party which prevents second party in due course from handling and marketing said crop.

"First party authorizes second party to sell said crop in its own name, collect the proceeds therefor, and deposit the same to its account, and make remittances by check as rapidly as returns are received from sales. Second party shall use due diligence in receiving, packing, and marketing all fruit of merchantable quality.

"First party agrees that second party shall deduct from proceeds of sale all packing and loading charges, freight and refrigeration charges, and all other expenses reasonably incurred in the marketing of said fruit, and second party shall also deduct any sums from said proceeds which first party may then be owing to second party.

Variety	Tonnage	Acres
Thompsons	60	1

"Signed in triplicate this 17 day of Aug. 1923. Ed. Roe, First Party. Stanislaus County Farmers' Union, Inc., by Allen Talbot, Second Party."

And, in addition, the plaintiffs sought to introduce in evidence testimony of a previous or contemporaneous oral agreement that the grapes referred to in said contract should be sold only f. o. b. at the city of Modesto, and that said grapes should not be shipped on consignment. This testimony, upon objection of counsel for the defendant, was excluded, and judgment for nonsuit followed, and this appeal rests simply upon the alleged error of the court in excluding such oral testimony.

[1] On the part of the appellants several sections of the Civil Code are referred to relating to the authority of factors, the duties of factors, and under what circumstances directions to factors might be given as to the place of sale, and how instructions given might be subsequently changed. These sections of the code and also the cases cited set forth the law as we understand it in relation to factors, but, for the reasons hereinafter stated, seem inapplicable to this case. Oral testimony, as hereafter shown, is admissible to supply a missing item in a written instrument only when the written agreement, in and of itself, is not complete, and such testimony does not contravene any part of the writing.

The contract in question provides first, that the first party agrees to market through the second party the grapes in question, to pick and deliver the same, and that the second party shall pack all merchantable fruit in commercial packages. The second paragraph then sets forth that the first party shall pay the second party, for packing, the regular commercial rate therefor, and the said second party shall be paid the current market price for all shook, etc. Provision is then made for packing by the first party, the second party furnishing the shook. This paragraph then sets forth that the second party shall be relieved from its obligation to handle said crop in case of car shortages, strikes, embargoes, and other conditions reasonably beyond the control of the second party which prevent the second party in due course from handling and marketing said crop. This paragraph providing for the second party marketing said crop, and also specifying that is shall be relieved, under certain conditions, plainly imports that the grapes are to be shipped for the purpose of marketing, else there would have been no reason for the introduction of a clause relieving the defendant from liability in the event of a car shortage. The third paragraph authorizes the second party to sell the grapes in its own name, collect the proceeds therefrom, and deposit the same to defendant's account, and make remittances by check as rapidly as returns are received from sales, the said party of the second part to use due diligence in receiving, packing, and marketing all fruit of merchantable quality, and then, lastly, it is agreed that the second party shall deduct from the proceeds of sales packing and loading charges, freight and refrigeration charges, and all other expenses reasonably incurred in the marketing of said fruit, and said second party shall also deduct any sums from said proceeds which first party may then be owing second party. This paragraph is certainly in direct conflict with the idea that the grapes were to be sold for cash f. o. b., in the city of Modesto. Under such circumstances, there would be no freight and refrigeration charges, nor would there be any marketing charges or expenses, as evidently contemplated by the agreement, which we have set forth.

[2] As we read the writing, it is a complete legal agreement, in and of itself, and any oral testimony changing the terms of this agreement, as set forth, would certainly contravene the rule that parol testimony is not admissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written instrument. Being complete in itself, the theory that the proffered testimony is supplementary is likewise subject to the rule excluding such testimony, for the simple reason that the alleged omitted item, to wit that the grapes were to be sold f. o. b., at Modesto, directly contravenes the last paragraph of the agreement, which contemplates the shipping of the grapes, and authorizes the payment of freight and refrigeration charges, etc.

As to the writing itself, and as to the authority of the court to construe the same, we quote from 6 California Jurisprudence, page 267, as follows:

"The question whether a writing is upon its face a complete expression of the agreement of the parties is one of law for the court, and the rule which governs the court in its determination has been well stated as follows: 'If it imports on its face to be a complete expression of the whole agreement—that is, contains such language as imports a complete legal obligation—it is to be presumed that the parties have introduced into it every material item and term; and parol evidence cannot be admitted to add another term to the agreement, although the writing contains nothing on the particular one to which the parol evidence is directed.'"

The principle there relied upon for this statement of the law is the case of Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327-330, 26 P. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469. In that case, the contract or agreement called for the delivery of 50 tons of coal upon an order in the following words:

"San Francisco, January 12, 1882.

"Messrs. McCormick & Lewis: Ordered from J. W. Harrison 50 tons Montana Lode lump Lehigh hand-picked coal, early lading in New York. Ship to be named, original cost, etc. To be paid on receipt of bills of lading, etc., and the freight to be paid on receipt of coal here, at $13.50 per ton per 2,240 pounds, gold coin, payable as above, delivered from ship's side when landed. Any shortage in excess of 2 per cent. to be paid by the seller."

It was contended that there was an oral agreement that the coal should be according to a certain sample, and oral testimony was sought to be introduced as to the sample, and that the coal delivered was not of the same quality, etc. This oral testimony was excluded, and, after quoting what we have here set forth, the court in that case further said:

"Tested by this consideration, it is clear that the agreement here is to be deemed complete, as it imports a clear legal obligation, and without any uncertainty as to what the parties thereto undertook to perform. It states an agreement for the sale and delivery of fifty tons of coal of a particular name, and it contains either expressly or by implication everything necessary to make the mutual obligations of the parties, arising out of a contract of sale, complete. This is therefore to be deemed a written contract, and other terms and conditions which might have been introduced into it by the parties, but were not, cannot be added by parol."

Also, if the contract is in legal effect complete, such testimony is not admissible to add to or vary the written instrument. This court, speaking through Justice Chipman, in Standard Box Co. v. Mutual Biscuit Co., 10 Cal. App. 746, 103 P. 938, said:

"The rule that prior or contemporaneous negotiations cannot be used to contradict, add to or vary a written contract, applies not only to the letter of the written document, but also to its legal effect; and when no time for performance is fixed, the law implies that a reasonable time is given, and evidence that a specific time had been agreed upon is inadmissible."

A number of cases are considered in the opinion, and the rule is adhered to which we have herein stated. In that case, it was sought to prove by parol an oral agreement that the defendant should have one year from a certain date in which to accept an option upon which the action was based, and it was held that such testimony was inadmissible, the law supplying the legal intendment that the option should be accepted within a reasonable length of time. In German Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 585, 96 P. 319, the case of Harrison v. McCormick, supra, was approved, and the rule again announced, that, where the writing is complete in itself, parol evidence cannot be admitted to add to the writing a term upon which it is silent, as well as to vary one upon which it speaks.

Appellant relies upon the case of Blahnik v. Small Farms Improvement Co., 181 Cal. 379, 184 P. 661, as, in effect, changing the rule set forth in the case which we have cited and permitting the introducing of such testimony. However, when the facts of that case are considered, it is found to be readily distinguishable from the instant case, and also from the cases which we think apply to the one at bar. In the Blahnik Case, supra, the seller referred to therein was transferring certain parcels of real estate, and the agreement contained the following:

"The seller agrees that it will have the roads in said division R constructed during the fall of 1913 after the rains or when the ground is able to be worked. And construct the necessary bridges."

The map or plat according to which the sales were made had delineated thereupon lines indicating roads to be constructed. There was absolutely nothing in the agreement as to the materials of which the roads should be constructed, or the kind of roads to be constructed, and the courts said:

"The contract itself is silent with respect to the kind of roads and the character of the work to be done thereon. Evidently that was the subject of some other agreement between the parties, either express or implied. * * * For the purpose of showing the real agreement in that respect the defendant offered evidence of conversations between its agents and plaintiff Joseph, who made the deal for his wife, before and at the time of the execution of the contract. This evidence was excluded by the court on the ground that the subject was covered by the terms of the written contract and that the admission thereof would violate the rule that a written contract cannot be varied or contradicted by parol evidence of conversations between the parties prior to or at the time of its execution."

This ruling was held to be erroneous, and it was further held that such an agreement would be collateral and supplemental to the contract contained in the writing, and, as parol evidence thereof would not be inconsistent with the contract, and would not alter it in any respect, evidence thereof would be admissible if material to the issues.

In the case at bar the parol evidence that the grapes were to be sold f. o. b. Modesto is inconsistent with the provisions for shipping, paying the freight, refrigeration, etc. When the agreement in the case at bar is considered and all its provisions read together, the reasoning of the court in the case of Blahnik v. Small Farms Improvement Co., supra, is found to be an authority supporting the rule that the proffered parol evidence was properly excluded, as being inconsistent and in contravention of the writing, or agreement, which is complete in itself.

We think the proffered testimony properly excluded. It therefore follows that the judgment of the trial court should be and the same is hereby affirmed.

WAXMAN et ux. v. JENNINGS. (Civ. 2742.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 14, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹989—Evidence of party, against whom verdict was had, is immaterial on appeal, where evidence in case would support verdict for either party.

In action for injuries received in automobile collision at street intersection, defended on ground that defendant had right of way, under Motor Vehicle Act, § 20, subd. f, as amended by St. 1919, p. 215, § 12, where plaintiff's testimony including physical facts of the collision was sufficient to support verdict for plaintiff, fact that defendant's testimony would also have supported verdict in his favor is immaterial on appeal.

2. Trial ⟹251(8)—Instructions on contributory negligence unnecessary, if not pleaded.

Ordinarily, contributory negligence to be available must be specially pleaded, and, if not so pleaded, instructions thereon need not be given.

3. Negligence ⟹119(6)—Defense of contributory negligence available, if it appears from complaint or from plaintiff's evidence.

Defense of contributory negligence may be available, although not set up by defendant, if contributory negligence appears from the complaint or from plaintiff's evidence.

4. Municipal corporations ⟹705(2) — Motor Vehicle Act requires vehicles shall cross intersection on right-hand half of street.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 20, subds. a, l, as amended by St. 1919, pp. 215, 216, § 12, providing that driver shall travel on right half of highway while crossing intersecting highway, and that operator of slowly moving vehicle shall keep it as close as practicable to right-hand boundary, does not direct that vehicle shall be operated as closely as practicable to right-hand boundary when crossing intersection, but simply directs that intersection shall be crossed on right-hand half of street.

5. Trial ⟹252(8)—Court cannot fix practical line for driving automobile, where there was no evidence as to practicability.

In action for injuries in automobile collision at street intersection, where defendant contended that plaintiff was violating Motor Vehicle Act, in not driving as close as practicable to right-hand boundary, court, as a matter of law, cannot fix exact practical line for driving automobile, where there was no evidence as to either practicability or impracticability of driving it closer to right-hand boundary of street.

6. Municipal corporations ⟹705(2) — "As closely as practicable," as used in Motor Vehicle Act, does not mean "as closely as possible."

Phrase "as closely as practicable," as used in Motor Vehicle Act, § 20, subd. l, as amended by St. 1919, p. 216, § 12, providing that operator of slowly moving vehicle shall keep vehicle "as closely as practicable" to right-hand of highway, does not mean "as closely as possible," and practical path for driving automobile would be a sufficient distance from curb line to enable driver to see automobiles approaching on intersecting street.

7. Municipal corporations ⟹705(2) — Motor Vehicle Act held, in view of evidence, not to apply to automobile crossing at intersections.

In action for injuries received in automobile collision at street intersection, that part of section 20 of Motor Vehicle Act, as amended by St. 1919, p. 214, § 12, relating to right of way of automobiles passing in same direction, has no application, where there is no evidence as to what was practical path for automobile to travel in crossing intersection.

8. Trial ⟹295(7)—Instruction, in action for injuries in automobile collision, held not erroneous, when viewed with testimony, and construed with other instructions.

In action for injury in automobile collision involving question of right of way at street intersection, instruction held not subject to objection that it told jury that plaintiff had right to travel on right half of street, when viewed with testimony, and construed with other instructions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by A. W. Waxman and wife against J. B. Jennings. From the judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for appellant.

Thos. M. Anaya, of Modesto, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiffs to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff Jessie Waxman in an automobile collision alleged to have occurred as the result of the negligent driving of an automobile by the defendant. Plaintiffs had judgment in the sum of $850. From said judgment, the defendant appeals.

It appears from the transcript that on the evening of January 30, 1921, the plaintiffs were driving in a northerly direction on Tenth street in the city of Modesto, and that, at the same time, the defendant was being driven in an automobile owned by him, by his son, in a westerly direction on G street in said city. The collision, constituting the basis of this action, occurred at the intersection of said streets. No question is made as to the extent of the personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff Jessie Waxman, or that the judgment is in any wise excessive.

The complaint alleges, in the ordinary terms, that the collision occurred by reason of the negligence of the defendant. The defendant, in his answer, denies the negligent operation of the automobile, which was being driven by his direction and control, and, by way of separate defense, alleges that the collision was due solely to the negligence of the plaintiff A. W. Waxman.

[1] It is contended on the part of the appellant that the testimony is insufficient to support the verdict, in that it does not show any negligence on the part of the defendant, and further that it does show negligence on the part of the plaintiff A. W. Waxman. The determination of who is responsible for the collision involved the question as to who had the right of way at the intersection. The injury, having been suffered on January 30, 1921, the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Law of 1919 apply. Section 20 of that act reads as follows:

"(f) * * * The operator of a vehicle shall yield the right of way at the intersection of their paths to a vehicle approaching from the right unless such vehicle approaching from the right is further from the point of the intersection of their paths than such first named vehicle." St. 1919, p. 215, § 12.

To support his contention that the automobile being driven by his son, and in which the defendant was riding, was nearer the intersection of the paths of the two automobiles, the appellant sets forth at length the testimony supporting his contention. To contravene this contention, the respondent likewise sets forth the evidence in detail, which goes to show that the automobile being driven by the plaintiff A. W. Waxman was nearer to the point of intersection of the paths of the two automobiles, and therefore, although the defendant's car was approaching from the right, the plaintiffs had the right of way. It is not necessary to set forth the testimony relied upon by the respective parties, because it simply shows a conflict upon this controverted point. It is sufficient to say that the testimony introduced by the plaintiffs, including the physical facts of the collision presented to the jury, is amply sufficient to support the verdict, and, this being true, the mere fact that the testimony introduced by the defendant would likewise have supported a verdict in his favor becomes immaterial on appeal.

[2, 3] The appellant, in his argument, confuses the defenses of negligence and contributory negligence, and insists that the plaintiff Waxman was guilty of both. The pleadings, however, do not present the question of contributory negligence. Ordinarily, to be availed of as a defense, contributory negligence must be specially pleaded. If it is not so pleaded, instructions need not be given upon the question. "If it appears from the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, or from the evidence introduced by him, that he has been guilty of contributory negligence, the defense may be availed of, even though not set up by defendant." 19 Cal. Jur. p. 681, § 104.

No instructions were requested of the court to be given to the jury on the subject of contributory negligence. Our attention has not been called to any of the testimony introduced on the part of the plaintiff, upon which any such defense could be predicated. The negligence alleged on the part of the plaintiffs, and also called contributory negligence on their part, consists in the alleged fact that at the time of the impact of the two automobiles the car in which the plaintiffs were riding was nearer the center line of Tenth street than the east line thereof, and that the law required the plaintiff A. W. Waxman at that time to be driving his automobile as closely as practicable to the right-hand boundary line of Tenth street. As a basis for this contention and to support his allegation that the driver of the plaintiffs' car was negligent, the defendant relies upon two sections of the Motor Vehicle Act, as it then read, to wit:

"On all occasions the driver or operator of any vehicle in or upon any public highway shall travel upon the right half of such highway unless the road ahead on the left-hand side is clear and unobstructed for at least one hundred yards ahead and in all cases while crossing an intersecting highway," found in section 20 of said act, and

"The person in control of any vehicle moving slowly along and upon any public highway shall keep such vehicle as closely as practicable to the right-hand boundary of the highway, allowing more swiftly moving vehicles reasonably free passage to the left." St. 1919, pp. 215, 216, § 12, subds. a, l.

It is contended that the car in which the plaintiffs were riding was being operated and driven upon the right-hand half of Tenth street; that it was upon such portion of Tenth street while crossing the intersection of G street. The testimony would also indicate that the plaintiffs' car was a few feet nearer the center line than it was to the right-hand boundary line of Tenth street. If the plaintiffs' car had been a few feet nearer the right-hand boundary line, the intersecting paths would have shortened the distance traveled by the defendant's car before reaching the point of impact. In thus shortening the distance, it is claimed by the appellant that the right of way would have shifted from the plaintiffs to the defendant. There is plenty of testimony in the record, however, to support the findings of the jury that the defendant's car was considerably further away from the intersecting lines of the two automobiles at the time the right of way became fixed, irrespective of this contention on the part of the defendant.

[4] The sections of the Motor Vehicle Act which we have quoted as to where an operator of a vehicle shall drive his car does not direct that the car shall be operated as closely as practicable to the right-hand boundary when crossing an intersection. It simply provides, and did provide at that time, that the intersection should be crossed on the right-hand half. In applying the sections which we have quoted, the purposes must be kept in mind. The excerpt taken from section 20 deals with automobiles passing each other when being driven in the same direction. Its purpose is to require the operator of the more slowly moving vehicle to keep to the right in order to allow the more swiftly moving vehicle unobstructed passage. That question is not involved in this case.

[5-7] It may be further remarked that there is not a word of testimony called to our attention indicating either the practicability or impracticability of the plaintiff driving his car at the time in question more closely to the easterly boundary of Tenth street than he was doing at the time he approached the intersection of G street. When there is no testimony upon the question, we do not think that the court, as a matter of law, can fix the exact practicable line. "As closely as practicable" has a different meaning as used in this section from "as closely as possible."

[8] It is a matter of common knowledge that buildings in cities and trees upon or adjacent the curb line of streets obscure the view of persons approaching on intersecting streets, and the practicable path for driving an automobile would be a sufficient distance from the curb line to enable the driver to most readily catch sight of an automobile approaching on an intersecting street, in order that, if necessary, he might bring his own machine to a stop, or slacken its speed, so as to avoid collision with or injury to another. In the absence of any such testimony, it becomes apparent that the section in reference to yielding the right of way to automobiles passing in the same direction has no application whatever to the questions presented by this action. In this particular, the appellant insists that the court, in giving instruction No. 9, at the request of the plaintiffs, misstated the law, in that it told the jury that the plaintiffs had a right to travel upon the right half of Tenth street. The court gave, in its instructions, the two sections of the Motor Vehicle Act which we have quoted, gave an instruction defining a public highway, and then gave instruction No. 9, of which the appellant strenuously complains. That instruction is as follows:

"If you find from the evidence in this case that Tenth street in the city of Modesto is a public highway, and that on said January 30, 1921, the plaintiff Jessie Waxman was riding in an automobile driven by plaintiff A. W. Waxman, on said Tenth street, in said city of Modesto, and that said automobile was proceeding in a northerly direction along said Tenth street and on the right-hand side of the center line of said Tenth street and on the right half of said Tenth street, and if you further find that the said automobile driven by said A. W. Waxman was at said time being so driven at the rate of about 12 miles an hour, and that said automobile was nearer to the center line of the intersection of their paths as herein explained at G street and Tenth street, in said city of Modesto, and if you further find that at said time and place, defendant, or his agent, was driving and operating an automobile, and was proceeding in a westerly direction along said G street, and that the car of defendant was further from the center line of intersection of their paths as herein explained at G street and Tenth street, and that the defendant, or his agent, negligently and carelessly drove the automobile driven by the defendant, or his agent, so that said automobile, at the time and place above mentioned, struck with force and violence the automobile in which the plaintiffs Jessie Waxman and A. W. Waxman were riding as aforesaid, and if you further find that, by reason thereof, the plaintiff Jessie Waxman was caused to suffer the injuries complained of, and that the proximate cause of the injuries to the plaintiff Jessie Waxman arose from the fact that the defendant, or his agent, was so driving and operating the automobile driven by defendant, or his agent, negligently and carelessly, and if you further find that neither said Jessie Waxman nor A. W. Waxman was guilty of negligence in the driving and operation of the automobile in which the plaintiff Jessie Waxman was then riding, then I charge that your verdict should be in favor of the plaintiffs for such amount as will compensate plaintiffs for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, not exceeding the amount claimed in the complaint, to wit, $1034.50."

In view of the testimony, and lack of testimony to which we have referred, we think the appellant's contention that the court erroneously instructed the jury wholly without merit. The court further instructed the jury, at the request of the defendant, that the defendant, in approaching the intersection of Tenth and G streets, being to the right of the plaintiff, would have the right of way, unless the defendant's automobile was further away from the point where the paths of the two approaching automobiles would intersect. It also instructed the jury that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiffs to prove their case. The appellant in this case calls attention to the language of this court, speaking through Justice Hart, in the case of Weaver v. Carter, 28 Cal. App. 241, 152 P. 323, and quotes from the opinion in that case a portion of a paragraph indicating that instructions similar to those given in the instant case were subject to criticism, but the quotation made by appellant is not complete. We add the remainder of the paragraph which we think is particularly applicable here:

"And we think it becomes very clear, when viewing the above-quoted instruction as a whole and by the light of the entire charge, rather than considering a detached excerpt therefrom only, that the objections of counsel to said instruction will be found to be groundless."

That is true of the instant case. All the instructions, taken together, clearly presented to the jury the law applicable to the case, and it does not appear that the defendant asked or requested any or further instructions covering points alleged to have been omitted, or not covered by the court.

Finding no error in the record justifying any interference with the verdict in this case, it is hereby ordered that the judgment of the trial court be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

MAZZERA v. RAMSEY et al. (Civ. 2828.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 11, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1925.)

1. Mechanics' liens ⊂=317—Complaint in action against contractor's sureties held to state cause of action.

Complaint, in owner's action against building contractor's sureties for amount paid to discharge claims for labor and materials in excess of amount due under contract, held to state a cause of action.

2. Mechanics' liens ⊂=164(1)—Not limited to amount due from owner to contractor, where contractor's bond not conditioned as provided in statute.

Where building contractor's bond was not conditioned as provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, liens for labor and material were not limited to amount due from owner to contractor.

3. Mechanics' liens ⊂=315—Right of mechanic to lien during time within which he may file claim of lien, constitutes cloud on owner's title.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1186, right of mechanic or materialman to a lien during time in which he may file, but has not filed, a claim of lien, constitutes a cloud on owner's title.

4. Mechanics' liens ⊂=315—Sureties on building contractor's bond, undertaking to complete building, required to deliver building to owner free of liens.

Sureties on building contractor's bond, undertaking to complete building under their contract of suretyship, were under legal obligations to pay mechanics and materialmen and to deliver building to owner, free of liens.

5. Mechanics' liens ⊂=315—Sureties liable for amount paid at their request to discharge claim.

If owner paid claims of mechanics and materialmen, with knowledge and consent, and at instance and request, of building contractor's sureties, he was entitled to recover amount so paid from them, even if not so entitled in absence of such consent and request.

6. Mechanics' liens ⊂=317—Evidence held to sustain finding that owner paid mechanics and materialmen with knowledge and consent of sureties on building contractor's bond.

Evidence held to show that owner made payments to mechanics and materialmen with knowledge and consent of sureties on building contractor's bond, and at their instance and request.

7. Mechanics' liens ⊂=313—Omission of word "owner" in building contractor's bond held mere clerical error, not affecting sureties' liability.

Where sureties on building contractor's bond expressly bound themselves to owner in amount of penalty of bond, omission of word "owner" or owner's name from clause providing to whom amount was to be paid held a mere clerical error, not affecting liability of sureties.

8. Mechanics' liens ⊂=315—Sureties on building contractor's bond undertaking completion of contract became subject to all of contractor's liabilities.

Sureties on building contractor's bond who, on abandonment of work by contractor, undertook completion of contract, thereby assumed performance of principal's contract, and being subrogated to rights of principal thereunder, necessarily became subject to all of his liabilities.

9. Mechanics' liens ⊂=315—Sureties on building contractor's bond undertaking to complete contract cannot thereafter assert invalidity of bond.

Where sureties on building contractor's bond undertook to complete contract, and received progress payments as they became due, they cannot thereafter assert invalidity of bond.

10. Principal and surety ⊂=75—Owner's refusal to pay installment to building contractor held not to release sureties who completed contract and received subsequent payments.

Sureties on contractor's bond, who completed contract on default of contractor and received progress payments as they became due, held not discharged by owner's refusal to pay a prior installment to contractor.

11. Principal and surety ⇐117—Owner's premature payment of installment to building contractor held not to have released sureties who completed contract and received all subsequent installments.

Owner's premature payment of installment to building contractor, who afterwards became entitled to payments from which premature payment was deducted, did not release sureties on contractor's bond, who on contractor's default completed contract and received all subsequent installments.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by John L. Mazzera against W. C. Ramsey and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, and Frank W. Sawyer, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Gumpert & Mazzera, of Stockton, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff, as owner, and George Balliet, as contractor, entered into a building contract containing the following provisions material to the determination of this appeal:

"Whereas, the said owner is desirous that the hereinafter mentioned one-story bungalow building No. 841 be built, erected, and fully completed for the sum of * * * $7,516.50, free and clear from all liens and claims of liens, and of any and every other claim and demand; * * * and whereas, the said contractor, with knowledge of the premises, is ready, able, and willing to furnish all labor and materials and to do and fully perform all work essential and proper in such complete performance and completion of the said building for the sum of * * * $7,516.50, subject to the covenants and conditions hereinafter contained and in consideration of the premises.

"Now it is hereby agreed: (1) That the contractor will at his own charge and cost, and within five days from the date hereof, begin and continuously prosecute and perform the said work in a thorough and workmanlike manner and fully complete the same, all according to the intent and meaning of the plans, drawings, and specifications referred to in this contract * * * for the sum of * * * $7,516.50. * * * (5) * * * The sixth payment to be made in the sum of $1,879 when building is accepted by architect and owner, and all vouchers are presented by contractor pertaining to the payment of all labor and materials for said building, otherwise the owner reserves the right to wait for thirty-five days after acceptance of said building before making the final payment to contractor. (7) * * * Should the contractor at any time during the progress of the work refuse, fail, or neglect without the fault of the owner to supply a sufficiency of materials or workmen to complete this contract expeditiously or any lawful extension thereof for a period of more than three days after having been notified by the said owner, the owner shall have power to furnish at market rates, material or workmen to finish the said work, and the cost thereof shall be deducted from the amount of such contract price, and, if such costs exceed such price, said excess shall within two days be paid to the said owner."

The contract provided for partial payments as the work progressed, to be made upon presentation of the architect's certificates. A bond for the faithful performance of the work by the contractor was given in the following form:

"Know all men by these presents, that we, the undersigned, W. C. Ramsey and T. F. Emerson, * * * are as sureties and guarantors held and firmly bound jointly and severally by these presents unto John Mazzera as owner; his executors, administrators, and assigns, in the sum of three thousand seven hundred and fifty-eight dollars and twenty-five cents * * * to be paid his executors, administrators, and assigns jointly and severally by these presents. * * * The condition of the above obligation is such that [here follow recitals to the effect that the contract was executed; that a copy thereof is attached to the bond; that the "contract was entered into upon the express consideration that the full and specific performance thereof should be secured and insured by this bond"; that it "is a bond of indemnity"; and that the contract and the plans and specifications are made a part of the bond]. Now therefore, if the above George Balliet shall well, faithfully, and specifically perform the said contract, and hand over to the said owner said work therein mentioned, within the time therein specified, full, completed, and in a clean condition and free and clear of liens as thereby required, and in entire accordance with all of the terms thereof, then this obligation to become null and void, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue."

The contract, plans, and specifications and the bond were recorded the same day that the contract was executed. A few days later the contractor entered upon the performance of the work and continued therein until the architect's certificate was issued showing that the second payment was due, at which stage he abandoned the contract. The sureties then undertook the completion of the building. A few days before it was finally completed, the work remaining to be done not appearing from the record, the men employed by the sureties in the construction of the building quit work. The plaintiff induced the men to return and complete the building by promising them to "see they got their money." It was stipulated at the trial that the building was finally "completed according to the plans and specifications."

The final payment of $1,879 was not made to the contractor or to the sureties, but the plaintiff paid the amount thereof and the sum of $1,879.02 additional, in the discharge of claims for labor and material in the construction of the building which the contractor and the sureties failed and refused to pay. No claims of lien were ever filed against the building, and such payments for labor and material were made by the plaintiff before the expiration of the time within which liens might have been filed. The complaint alleges, and the court found, that the plaintiff made such payments "with the knowledge and consent of defendants W. C. Ramsey and said T. F. Emerson, and at their instance and request." Emerson died after the payments had been made by plaintiff, and the executrix of his estate is made a party defendant. A claim against his estate for the amount of such payments was duly presented to the executrix and disallowed. The plaintiff was given judgment for the amount of all claims paid by him and defendants have appealed.

[1] Appellants contend that their demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. The foregoing facts, together with much evidentiary and unnecessary matter, are alleged in the complaint. That such facts constitute a cause of action is so apparent that no discussion of the question is deemed necessary.

[2] The most serious contention of appellants is that the payments made by plaintiff for labor and materials were voluntary. Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, among other things, provides:

"The liens in this chapter provided for shall be direct liens, and shall not in the case of any claimants, other than the contractor be limited, as to amount, by any contract price agreed upon between the contractor and the owner except as hereinafter provided. * * * In case said original contract shall, before the work is commenced, be so filed [in the office of the county recorder], together with a bond of the contractor with good and sufficient sureties in an amount not less than fifty (50) per cent. of the contract price named in said contract, which bond shall in addition to any conditions for the performance of the contract, be also conditioned for the payment in full of the claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in such work, and shall also by its terms be made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons who perform labor upon or furnish materials to be used in the work described in said contract so as to give such persons a right of action to recover upon said bond in any suit brought to foreclose the liens provided for in this chapter or in a separate suit brought on said bond, then the court must, where it would be equitable so to do, restrict the recovery under such liens to an aggregate amount equal to the amount found to be due from the owner to the contractor."

The bond herein considered was not so conditioned, and it follows that liens for labor and materials were not limited to the amount due from the owner to the contractor. In People v. Moxley, 17 Cal. App. 466, 468, 120 P. 43, it is said:

"The lien of a mechanic or materialman is a constitutional right and attaches to the structure as the material is furnished or labor performed. The statutory procedure enacted for the enforcement of such right has reference only to the remedy. It is true that if notices of lien be not recorded within the specified time, the lien is not enforceable. The lien, however, created by the Constitution, cannot be made subordinate to or dependent upon any legislative act. It exists with all of its force at all times between the furnishing of the material or the performing of the labor, and the expiration of the time within which such notices of lien may be filed."

[3] In Siegel v. Hechler, 181 Cal. 187, 192, 183 P. 664, 666, where a claim for which a lien might have been filed was paid without its having been so filed, the court referred to the claim as "a potential lien upon the building." Section 1186 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The liens provided for in this chapter are preferred to any lien, mortgage, or other encumbrance which may have attached subsequent to the time when the building, improvement, or structure was commenced, work done, or materials were commenced to be furnished."

[4, 5] Whether the right of a mechanic or materialman to a lien, during the time within which he may file, but has not filed, a claim of lien, be treated as a lien, a potential lien, or merely a right to a lien, it is clear that it constitutes a cloud on the owner's title. The sureties in this case, having undertaken the completion of the building under their contract of suretyship, were under legal obligation to pay mechanics and materialmen and to deliver the building to the owner free of liens. Under such circumstances, if the plaintiff paid such mechanics and materialmen, with the knowledge and consent and at the instance and request of the sureties, as found by the court, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount so paid from the sureties, whether he would have had the right to so recover the same in the absence of such consent and request or not.

[6] After the contractor abandoned the work, Ramsey said "he did not know anything about the job; Emerson was taking care of that; whatever he did was all right." The evidence shows without conflict that Emerson acted for the sureties in the completion of the building. Emerson said that the sureties and the owner would "work along together and get it (the building) finished as soon as we could." About the time the building was completed, the mechanics and materialmen were demanding payment of their claims, and several of them were threatening to file liens therefor. The attorney for plaintiff made a demand upon Emerson that the sureties pay these claims. About the same time Emerson demanded payment of the last installment of the contract price, but plaintiff refused to make the payment without the production of receipts, as provided in the contract, "showing that all labor done and all material furnished" had "been fully paid for." The attorney for plaintiff testified as follows:

"I further told Mr. Emerson, * * * 'Of course we will insist upon your liability and Mr. Ramsey on the bond, and we are not going to dismiss you from liability on the bond. Now you know more about that job than I do. Now we will have to work along together on this proposition and see if we can't straighten it out.' And he said, 'All right.' Then * * * I said, 'Now, Mr. Emerson, you state that you paid out certain moneys, and that there are certain receipts outstanding. Will you bring up whatever receipts and vouchers that you have in your possession, so that we will at least know the status of the job?' He said he would. * * * He did not bring them up. Porter Roberts brought them up. * * *

"Q. State whether or not all the checks which are shown on the bill of particulars of the complaint in this action were O. K'd by T. F. Emerson prior to the time they were paid. A. They were all O. K'd. * * * Before the checks were drawn out, or before they were signed and transferred, released, I made out an O. K. for Mr. Emerson. * * *

"Q. Now, he O. K'd them in writing on the stubs with his initials? A. Most of them, yes. * * *

"Q. And those he did not O. K. with his initials, he O. K'd verbally? A. He did. * * *

"Q. At the conversation which has been referred to, * * * was there anything said at that time relative to a deficiency? A. I told Mr. Emerson, * * * 'Now, you understand that we will hold you liable on your bond if there is any deficiency, you and Mr. Ramsey, as sureties, will (have) to pay it.' He says, 'Yes; I know that, but I don't know what the deficiency is.' * * * Mr. Emerson said, 'We do not want to quarrel about this thing; we will settle this thing up without any difficulty.'"

The witness further testified that, before paying any of the claims, he said, in a conversation with Emerson and one of the claimants, "Now, we are not going to admit any responsibility of paying these without we have Emerson's O. K." It fairly appears from the foregoing evidence that plaintiff made the payments in question pursuant to an understanding between the parties that he should pay them, and that the sureties would be liable to him for the amount thereof. It is therefore sufficient to support the finding of the court to the effect that the payments were made with the knowledge and consent of the sureties and at their instance and request. Since the claims were all approved by Emerson, as the representative of the sureties, no question can arise as to their validity or the reasonableness thereof.

[7-9] Appellants contend that the penalty of the bond is not made payable to the plaintiff but to his executors, administrators, and assigns. It is true that the bond, after providing that the sureties are bound to the owner, his executors, administrators, and assigns in the sum of $3,758.25, continues as follows: "to be paid his executors, administrators, and assigns." It is patent that the omission of the word "owner," or the owner's name, in the clause quoted, is a mere clerical error which in no manner affects the liability of the sureties. That clause might be omitted altogether without affecting their liability. By the preceding parts of the bond, the sureties expressly bound themselves to the owner in the amount of the penalty of the bond. It is not apparent in what manner the subsequent clerical omission referred to can be given the effect of unbinding them. All the terms of the contract are expressly made parts of the bond. On the abandonment of the work by the contractor, the sureties undertook the completion of the contract. Emerson said that "he was going to handle the financial affairs; that Mr. Balliet and he agreed upon that;" that Balliet had left, and "I am going to get the profit; Balliet will get none." The sureties, therefore, were "in the situation of a surety on a contractor's bond, who undertakes to finish the contract work for his principal. 'When a surety, either corporate or individual, in pursuance of the terms of an undertaking, assumes the performance of the principal's contract, such surety, by being subrogated to the rights of the principal thereunder, must necessarily become subject to all of his liabilities.' Ausplund v. Ætna Indem. Co., 47 Or. 10, 81 P. 577 [82 P. 12]; Hughes v. Gibson, 15 Colo. App. 318, 62 P. 1037." Watterson v. Owens River Canal Co., 25 Cal. App. 247, 253, 143 P. 90, 93. By undertaking the completion of the building, the sureties recognized the validity of their bond and prevented the owner from finishing the work. It does not appear whether the owner could have completed the building at less cost than that incurred by the sureties but, since they did the work in pursuance of their rights under the bond and received the progress payments as they became due, they cannot now be heard to assert its invalidity. They are in the same position as if they had been the original contractors.

[10] Appellants contend that the sureties were discharged by reason of the refusal to make the second payment to the contractor on his demand. The contractor testified that the plaintiff refused to make the payment to him, but that, the former had agreed that "Emerson was to attend to the finances." that later he received a check for the amount of the payment, which he indorsed to Emerson, and that Emerson cashed it, and that he did not abandon the contract because of plaintiff's refusal to make the payment to the witness. The sureties took complete charge of the work after the contractor abandoned it, and they were paid the third, fourth and fifth installments according to the terms of the contract. They were not released by plaintiff's refusal to pay the second installment to the contractor under the circumstances stated.

[11] The plaintiff paid the contractor $400 five days before the first payment was due. It is urged that this released the sureties. Emerson was present when the payment was made, and he said "it was all right." The $400 was used to pay for labor and material furnished during the first week's work under the contract. The contractor continued the work until the first and second payments provided for in the contract became due, and the amount thereof, less the payment of $400, was duly paid. Thereafter the sureties continued the work, and, as stated, the third, fourth, and fifth payments were made to them. The defendants did not plead that any payments were prematurely made, but their answer alleges "that the said Ramsey and Emerson properly distributed and paid all the preceding five installments that were paid by plaintiff under said contract toward the payment of the bills that had accrued up to the time of the payment of the said five several installments." Even if the premature payment had been pleaded, it would not be a defense, because, under the circumstances stated, the sureties were not prejudiced thereby. Bateman Brothers v. Mapel, 145 Cal. 241, 244, 78 P. 734; Dunne Inv. Co. v. Empire State S. Co., 27 Cal. App. 208, 150 P. 405, 411. The other grounds urged for a reversal are covered by the foregoing discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

Henry SANGUINETTI, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. W. C. RAMSEY and Mary M. Emerson, as the Executrix of the Last Will and Testament of T. F. Emerson, Deceased, Defendants and Appellants. (Civ. 2880.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 11, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1925.)

Appeals by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court of San Joaquin County, C. W. Miller, Judge, in an action to recover money paid for labor and materials. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, and Frank W. Sawyer, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Gumpert & Mazzera, of Stockton, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The defendants have appealed from the judgment herein in favor of the plaintiff.

This cause and that of Mazzera v. Ramsey et al. (Civ. No. 2828) 238 P. 101, were on the calendar for oral argument at the same time. In lieu of oral argument, each party has filed a single brief, covering both cases. In appellant's brief it is said: "The appeals in both cases are from judgments in favor of the respective owners against sureties upon a faithful performance builders' bond and practically involve the same points, any material differences will be pointed out herein." No material differences have been pointed out, and it would serve no useful purpose to repeat what is said in the opinion filed in the Mazzera Case.

The judgment is affirmed.

AMERICAN FRUIT GROWERS, Inc., OF CALIFORNIA v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. (Civ. 4412.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 18, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Trial court's finding of fact on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence as to cause of, or responsibility for, deterioration of lettuce, shipped for plaintiff by defendant carrier and its connecting lines, will not be disturbed.

2. Carriers ⟸134—Finding for shipper as to cause of decay of lettuce held supported by evidence.

Evidence held sufficient to support court's finding for plaintiff that rot and decay of lettuce was due to improper refrigeration by defendant and connecting carriers.

3. Carriers ⟸135—Measure of damages to shipment of perishable merchandise stated.

Where mode of ascertaining damages to shipment of perishable merchandise is not limited or determined by contract, basis of computation is difference between market value of commodity in good condition at point of destination, and market value of deteriorated product at same point at the time of arrival.

4. Carriers ⟸175—Connecting carrier's disposition of perishable merchandise, rejected by consignee, binding on initial carrier.

Disposition of decayed perishable merchandise by connecting carrier at point of destination, on consignee's rejection of shipment, is binding on initial carrier.

5. Appeal and error ⟸909(1)—Carriers ⟸175—Judgment against initial carrier, for loss on sale of damaged lettuce, sold elsewhere than at point of destination by terminal carrier on rejection by consignee, affirmed despite lack of evidence or findings of market value at such point.

Where terminal carrier, on receiving consignee's letter directing it to "make proper disposal" of carload of lettuce, rejected because of damaged condition, immediately proceeded to do so, agency was created requiring it to use all reasonable efforts and its best judgment in disposing of shipment, and, in absence of evidence to rebut presumption that its agent concluded that city to which it immediately shipped car from point of destination furnished better market, or that it did not exercise all reasonable efforts and judgment in making sale with least possible loss to consignor, to whom it credited amount received on freight charges, judgment for consignor against initial carrier for loss sustained must be affirmed, though there was no evidence or finding as to market value of deteriorated lettuce at point of destination.

6. Carriers ⟸177(4)—Terminal carrier held implied agent or trustee, required to use all reasonable efforts to protect consignor from loss on consignee's rejection of damaged shipment.

Consignee's refusal to accept shipment of lettuce because of damaged condition held to create implied agency or trust, charging terminal carrier with duty to use all reasonable efforts to protect consignor from loss.

7. Carriers ⟸185(1)—Presumed that sum derived from sale of damaged lettuce by terminal carrier on rejection by consignee was result of its reasonable efforts and exercise of judgment.

In absence of evidence to contrary, it will be presumed that sum derived from sale of damaged lettuce by terminal carrier on rejection by consignee was result of such carrier's reasonable efforts and exercise of judgment, and fairly establishes reasonable market value of damaged lettuce, whether consignee's direction to dispose of car created express agency, or there was only an implied agency or trust for consignor in such carrier.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by the American Fruit Growers, Inc., of California, against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and C. W. Cornell, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Howard L. Grace, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This action is based upon a claim for damages alleged to have been suffered to a carload of lettuce delivered by the plaintiff at San Fernando, California, for shipment to Des Moines, Iowa, by the defendant and its connecting lines. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $425.04, and from which judgment the defendant appeals.

Two propositions are urged by appellant in support of its appeal: First, that the damage suffered was not due in any manner to the fault or negligence of the defendant, but due wholly and solely to the action of the plaintiff in causing the carload of lettuce to remain at Des Moines, Iowa, for a period of 7 days. Secondly, that the evidence does not support the findings and judgment of the court in respect to the amount of damages suffered, and, particularly, that there is no evidence in the record showing the reasonable market value of the damaged lettuce at Milwaukee, to which the shipment was reconsigned by the plaintiff.

[1] The record discloses that the evidence bearing upon the question as to the cause of, or responsibility for, the deterioration of the lettuce is in marked conflict, and therefore, under the well-established rule, the finding of the trial court upon that issue will not be disturbed.

[2] Much of the evidence in the case was presented to the court by way of stipulations, the following material matters being included in the stipulations: First, that the shipment of lettuce, when loaded into the car at San Fernando, Cal., on May 11, 1920, was in good condition; second, that the shipment arrived at Des Moines, Iowa, on May 20th, where it remained in the car, awaiting instructions from the plaintiff, until May 27th, on which date plaintiff directed the connecting carrier to reship to Milwaukee, Wis., the consignee being J. O. Franklin & Sons; third, that the car arrived at Milwaukee on the afternoon of May 30th, and on May 31st J. O. Franklin & Sons, the consignees, were notified of its arrival; that on June 1st and 2d the lettuce was inspected by a government food inspector, and was found by him to be affected with rot and decay; that on the morning of June 2d, immediately after the report of the inspector, the consignees by telephone notified the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, which was the connecting carrier then having the car in custody, that they would not accept the lettuce because of its condition, and on the afternoon of June 2d confirmed this rejection by a written letter to the same effect; fourth, that upon refusal to accept the lettuce by the consignees at Milwaukee, the carrier, without notifying the consignor, diverted the carload of lettuce to Chicago, where, on June 8th, the lettuce was sold by the carrier for the sum of $201.23, which sum was credited to the account of the consignor on account of the freight charges; fifth, that the car of lettuce while en route was iced at the regular icing stations of the connecting lines, the stipulation setting forth the dates of icing and the amount of ice put into the bunkers at the various stations.

In addition to the foregoing stipulated matters, the plaintiff and defendant each produced an expert witness who gave evidence as to the reasons or causes for the decay in the lettuce. Plaintiff produced as such expert witness one Goulder, who, after stating that he had had an extended experience over a period of years in connection with the shipment of lettuce, having observed and examined over 100 carloads of lettuce shipped, and, basing his opinion upon his experiences and the stipulated matters and records, gave it as his opinion that the decaying and rotting of the lettuce was due to improper and insufficient refrigeration of the car. He testified that lettuce shipped in the condition as stipulated in this case, under proper refrigeration, would remain in good condition for a period of from 21 to 28 days. He further gave it as his opinion, based upon the stipulated record of the amounts of ice put into the car at the icing stations, and also the stipulated record showing the temperature of the car when it arrived in Milwaukee, that there had evidently been a marked variation in the degrees of temperature in the car during transit, and that this fact caused the decay and rot, which would not have resulted if an even temperature had been maintained, and which would have been the condition had the car been properly iced.

On behalf of the defendant, one Richardson testified as an expert. He stated that he had never had any experience with lettuce shipments, but had had experience in connection with the shipment of other perishable commodities. He gave it as his opinion that the decay and rot was due to heating of the lettuce, which could not be avoided even by proper refrigeration, and that the delay of the car for 7 days at Des Moines, in his opinion, accounted for the heating which caused the decay.

Taking into consideration the relative experience of the expert witnesses, it may be fairly urged that there was an abundance and even a preponderance of evidence to support the finding of the court in favor of the plaintiff on the question as to the cause of the rot and decay.

The second point urged by the appellant presents a more difficult question. The plaintiff, as it is conceded it had a right to do, diverted the car from Des Moines to Milwaukee, where it arrived on the afternoon of May 30th. The connecting carrier, the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, on the morning of May 31st, notified J. O. Franklin & Sons, the consignees at Milwaukee, of the arrival of the car. On June 1st and 2d, a government food inspector inspected the lettuce and made his written report, showing the lettuce to be in a decaying and rotting condition; whereupon, on the morning of June 2d, the consignee, over the telephone, notified the carrier that they would not accept the shipment of lettuce because of its deteriorated condition, and on the afternoon of June 2d confirmed this rejection with the following writing:

"Milwaukee, Wis., June 2d, 1920.

"W. G. Miller, Agt., C., M. & St. P. Ry., City —Dear Sir: Confirming telephone conversation of this p. m. with your Mr. Kosky, we have abandoned to the C., M. & St. P. car PFE 6099 shipped from San Fernando, Calif., May 11, 1920, containing 320 crates head lettuce. This car arrived at Milwaukee May 31st, and on account of poor condition we are unable to realize freight charges. You will therefore make proper disposal of this car.

"Yours very truly, J. O. Franklin & Sons."

Thereupon, without any further notice to the consignor, the carrier shipped the carload of lettuce to Chicago, and there, on June 8th, sold the lettuce for $201.23, which amount was credited to the plaintiff on account of the claim for freight charges.

It was stipulated by the parties that the market value of the lettuce, if it had arrived in good condition at Milwaukee, on May 31st, was from $2 to $2.25 per crate. But there was no stipulation, or, in fact, any evidence, as to the market value of the lettuce in its deteriorated condition at Milwaukee on the date of its arrival; nor was there any evidence as to the market value of lettuce in good condition, or in the deteriorated condition, in Chicago at the date of the sale, or at any time, unless the fact that the lettuce sold at Chicago on July 8th for $201.23 could be construed as evidence of the market value of the deteriorated lettuce. Under this second point appellant points out that there is no finding on the question of market value of the deteriorated lettuce at Milwaukee. This lack of evidence as to the market value of deteriorated lettuce, together with the fact that there is no finding on that question, is urged by the appellant as fatal to the judgment.

[3] It is well settled that where the issue is one of damages to a shipment of perishable merchandise, as in this case, and the mode of ascertaining or fixing the damages is not limited or determined by contract between the parties, the basis of computing such damages is the difference between the market value of the commodity in good condition at the point of destination, and the market value of the deteriorated product at the same point and at the time of arrival. It must also be conceded that the findings are inadequate and lacking in several respects. In view of the fact that we believe the judgment should be affirmed by reason of other considerations, the defects above referred to as urged by the appellant become immaterial.

[4, 5] The position and conduct of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, the connecting carrier at Milwaukee having in charge the carload of lettuce, and whose conduct in the matter is, of course, binding upon the defendant here, may be viewed from two standpoints, either one of which leads us to the conclusion that the judgment of the trial court was proper. Franklin & Sons, the consignees of the lettuce at Milwaukee, in their letter to the carrier refusing to accept the shipment of lettuce because of its damaged condition, closed their letter with the following instruction: "You will, therefore, make proper disposal of this car."

Assuming that Franklin & Sons were the agents of the plaintiff for the purpose of directing disposal of the lettuce—and under the evidence as appears from the record the defendant would hardly be in a position to controvert this assumption—it appears that upon receipt of this letter the carrier proceeded at once to comply with the instruction. An agency was thus created under which the law imposed upon the carrier the duty of using all reasonable efforts and its own best judgment in disposing of the shipment of lettuce. The carrier proceeded promptly to make disposition of the lettuce, and immediately after receiving the letter from Franklin & Sons, shipped the car of lettuce to Chicago and there sold it. It may be fairly presumed, and there is absolutely no evidence in the record to thwart this presumption, that the agent of the carrier concluded that Milwaukee did not offer an opportunity for "proper disposal of the car," and, believing that Chicago furnished a better market, shipped the car at once to Chicago. There is no evidence in the record to show that the defendant did not exercise all reasonable efforts and judgment in accomplishing the sale of the lettuce, with a view to the consignor suffering the least possible loss; and upon the sale of the lettuce the carrier credited the amount of the sale to the account of the plaintiff on its freight charges. The conduct of the carrier, from the time of receiving the letter rejecting the lettuce up to the point of crediting the proceeds from the sale to the plaintiff, was consistently that of an agent, and in good conscience the defendant will not now be heard to deny such a relation in disposing of the carload of lettuce.

[6, 7] If, on the other hand, it could be successfully controverted that an express agency had been created, by reason of the lack of authority on the part of Franklin & Sons to create such a relation as between the plaintiff and the carrier, there was unquestionably an implied agency or trust created in the carrier when the consignees refused to accept the shipment. In the case of Merchants' & Miners' Transp. Co. v. Branch (C. C. A.) 282 F. 497, the court, in dealing with a similar question arising out of damages suffered to a cargo of potatoes, said: "When goods cannot be delivered as directed, the carrier becomes a trustee for the owner, charged with the duty to use all reasonable efforts to protect him from loss." This rule seems to be well established by the authorities, and unquestionably the carrier proceeded to deal with the carload of lettuce on that theory, if not upon the theory of express agency. Upon either theory, the result is the same, that, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that the sum derived from the sale of the lettuce was the result of the reasonable efforts and exercise of judgment on the part of the carrier, and fairly establishes, for the purpose of computing the damage, the reasonable market value of the damaged lettuce.

The points that we have considered are the only ones urged by appellant, and we feel that the other points suggested do not require consideration. It suffices to say that, in view of the considerations upon which we base our conclusion, they are not material.

Judgment affirmed.

73 Cal. App. 136

KING v. CALIFORNIA BANK. (Civ. 4343.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1. California. June 4, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1010(1)—Trial court's findings, supported by substantial evidence, conclusive on appeal.

Trial court's findings of fact are binding upon appellate court, except where there is no substantial evidence to support them, notwithstanding satisfactory character of evidence to contrary.

2. Banks and banking ⟸154(8)—Findings in favor of alleged depositor held supported by evidence, and therefore conclusive.

In action in which bank depositor claimed two deposits of $400, and bank admitted only one, findings in favor of alleged depositor held supported by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. W. A. King against the California Bank. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Goudge, Robinson & Hughes, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Action brought to recover of defendant and appellant the sum of $452.78, claimed by plaintiff and respondent to have been deposited by her with the Home Savings Bank of Los Angeles, predecessor of appellant. Appellant admits a balance of $52.78 to be due respondent, leaving $400 as the actual amount in controversy. Plaintiff maintained both a commercial and a savings account with the Home Savings Bank, and claims that her husband, W. A. King, on November 8, 1919, deposited to the credit of her savings account in said bank the sum of $400, and that on November 10, 1919, he deposited to her commercial account in said bank a like sum of $400. Appellant admits that a deposit of $400 was made by the said W. A. King to the credit of plaintiff on November 8th, but denies that any other deposit of $400 was made by plaintiff, or by any one in her behalf on November 10, 1919, or at any other time.

[1] The testimony on behalf of appellant, as given by its officers and employees, and fortified by the books and records of the bank, if accepted as true, would present a strong case in appellant's favor. It is, of course, elementary that the determination reached by the trial court upon all matters of fact is binding upon an appellate court, except only in the single instance where there is no substantial evidence to support its findings. Therefore the only action within the power of this court is to inquire and determine whether there is any substantial evidence to support the findings of the trial court, and, if such evidence is found in the record, then the findings must stand, notwithstanding the satisfactory character of appellant's evidence.

The appellant's evidence tended to show that only one deposit was made by Mr. King to the credit of respondent, and that that deposit was made on November 8, 1919, and consisted of two checks for $15 and $265, respectively, and $120 in currency; that Mr. Schneider, the assistant manager of the bank, who received the deposit, made out an original deposit slip and a duplicate thereof; that the original slip showed the two checks with their respective amounts and $120 in currency; that the duplicate slip simply showed the amount of the deposit—$400. It was stamped "Duplicate" and bore the initials of Mr. Schneider, and was given to Mr. King at the time he made the deposit, for the reason he did not have Mrs. King's bank book with him at the time. Some time thereafter, Mr. King brought to the bank his duplicate deposit slip and Mrs. King's bank book and handed them to Mr. Mercer, who was then a teller in the bank, and the latter entered the deposit of $400 in Mrs. King's bank book and retained the duplicate deposit slip. This slip was then placed in the proper file in the bank's records, as had also been done with the original deposit slip. These slips were produced at the trial and the bank officials and employees testified that they were the only deposit slips to be found in the files or records of the bank showing a deposit of $400 made by Mrs. King on November 8th, or on November 10, 1919, or at any other time. These two deposit slips were admitted in evidence, and the original marked Exhibit A and the duplicate Exhibit 4. The bank books and records were introduced and they showed only one deposit of $400 made to the credit of the respondent. The evidence of appellant as a whole was to the effect that a deposit of $400 was made in behalf of respondent on November 8th, and that no other deposit of that amount had been made to her credit on that date or upon November 10th, or at any other time, and that the original and duplicate deposit slips admitted in evidence and marked Exhibits A and 4, respectively, were the only deposit slips in the possession of the bank showing a deposit of $400 made by or on behalf of respondent at any time.

Turning from the evidence in behalf of appellant to that produced by respondent, we have in the first place the testimony of W. A. King, the husband of respondent, who testified that he made two deposits of $400 each on behalf of his wife; that he deposited four $100 bills on November 8th to the credit of her savings account in said bank, and two checks for $15 and $265, respectively, and $120 in currency, amounting in the aggregate to $400, on November 10th to the credit of her commercial account. He further testified that the four $100 bills deposited by him on November 8th were taken by him from his safe at his home on the day he made the deposit, and that Mr. Schneider, who received the deposit, gave him a duplicate deposit slip with the words "Currency $400.00" written across the face of the slip, as he did not have Mrs. King's bank book with him at the time he made the deposit; that he took this slip home and placed it in his safe on the same day, and a few days thereafter he took this slip with Mrs. King's bank book to the bank and one of the tellers took up the deposit slip and entered the deposit in the bank book and returned the bank book to him, retaining the deposit slip; that some time thereafter, and after a dispute had arisen between the bank and himself regarding this second deposit, he went with Mr. Carroll Allen, an attorney at law, to the bank and that on that occasion the bank officials produced this deposit slip with the words "Currency $400.00" written across its face, and that he and Mr. Allen examined the same in the presence of the officers and employees of the bank. Mrs. King testified that she saw the slip with the words "Currency $400.00" written across its face, the day her husband brought it home and put it away in the safe. Mr. Carroll Allen also testified that he went with Mr. King to the bank, after the dispute had arisen between Mrs. King and the bank regarding this $400 deposit, and on that occasion the officers of the bank produced a deposit slip with the words "Currency $400.00" written across its face, and that it bore the name of Mrs. King, the date, and a stamp "Duplicate," with a signature or initials under the stamp, and that this deposit slip with the words "Currency $400.00" written across its face was neither Exhibit A nor Exhibit 4 admitted in evidence in this case.

[2] However impressed we may be with the testimony on appellant's behalf, we cannot say that the evidence of respondent does not substantially support the findings. With such a conflict in the evidence as is here presented, this court can only follow the conclusion reached by the trial court.

Judgment is therefore affirmed.

MALONE v. LOS ANGELES RY. CORPORATION. (Civ. 4348.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 23, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜692(3)—Exclusion of testimony as to presence of governor on plaintiff's truck at times of purchase and accident held not prejudicial to plaintiff.

Where record shows no offer to prove, at time of objection to question asked plaintiff on rebuttal as to date of purchase of truck damaged in collision with defendant's street car, that governor, which his counsel offered to show was on truck at times of purchase and accident limited speed to that provided by law, and plaintiff did not claim such fact in his brief on appeal, appellate court cannot say that plaintiff was prejudiced by exclusion of such testimony.

2. Trial ⊜63(1)—Testimony in rebuttal as to matter not testified to in chief held properly excluded.

Where plaintiff, without objection, offered testimony in chief as to speed of truck struck by defendant's street car, thus anticipating charge of contributory negligence, court properly excluded his testimony, first offered on rebuttal, as to presence of governor on truck when purchased and at time of accident.

3. Negligence ⊜83—"Last clear chance doctrine" stated.

"Last clear chance doctrine" involves propositions whether defendant actually saw plaintiff in dangerous position or position that any reasonable person would infer was likely to be dangerous, and if so that it was his duty to exercise every reasonable endeavor to avoid collision, failing in which plaintiff could recover, though contributorily negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Last Clear Chance.]

4. Trial ⊜260(7)—Instruction on last clear chance doctrine held sufficient, though not so clear as refused instruction requested by plaintiff.

Instruction, in action for damages to truck struck by defendant's street car, held sufficient statement of last clear chance doctrine though in somewhat involved and negative form, much less clear than refused instruction requested by plaintiff.

5. Appeal and error ⊜1068(5)—Refusal of instruction on last clear chance doctrine held not prejudicial error.

Refusal of plaintiff's instruction on last clear chance doctrine held not prejudicial error, if not sufficiently covered by instructions given, in view of abundant evidence justifying finding by jury that motorman of defendant's street car exercised every reasonable effort to stop it before collision with plaintiff's truck.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Walter F. Malone against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harry K. Sargent and F. L. Anderson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and J. Karl Lobdell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The action is one to recover damages alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff to his truck, arising out of a collision between his truck and the defendant's street car. The complaint charges that the defendant's car was at the time of the collision being "driven and operated at an excessive, dangerous, and unlawful rate of speed, and without any regard whatever for the safety of others using the said highways." The answer denies the charge of negligence, and in addition sets up the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the driver of the truck, who was the agent of the plaintiff. The case was tried before a jury, and, upon a verdict for the defendant, judgment was entered by the court accordingly. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The appellant, seeking to reverse the judgment of the lower court, urges two grounds: First, that the court erred in sustaining defendant's objection to plaintiff's offer to show, on rebuttal, that at the time of the collision there was a governor on plaintiff's truck which controlled and limited its speed; second, error committed by the court in refusing to give certain instructions requested by the appellant.

The accident occurred at the intersection of First and Townsend streets in the city of Los Angeles. First street, along which the defendant's car operated, runs east and west; while Townsend street runs north and south. It appears from the testimony that plaintiff's truck was moving in a northerly direction on Townsend street and approaching First street. The defendant's car was moving in an easterly direction, approaching Townsend street. The driver of the truck testified that when the street car was distant about 250 feet from the Townsend street crossing he observed the street car coming toward him, but he concluded that he had sufficient time within which to cross the tracks before the street car reached the crossing. Apparently in this conclusion he was mistaken, for the street car struck the rear end of his truck, causing the alleged damage.

[1, 2] The driver of the truck, as also other witnesses for the plaintiff, while on the stand in their direct examination, testified as to the rate of speed of the truck at the time it approached and crossed First street, and also testified as to what, in their opinion, was the speed of the street car as it approached Townsend street. A reading of the testimony covering plaintiff's case would indicate that the attorney for the plaintiff, in eliciting testimony from his witnesses, had in mind presenting to the jury the question of the speed of the truck as well as the speed of the street car. The witnesses for the defense, testifying as to the speed of the truck at the time it crossed the car tracks, estimated the speed in excess of that given by the truck driver and other witnesses for the plaintiff. The defense having rested, plaintiff was recalled to the witness stand by his counsel, and, when asked as to the date of the purchase of the truck in question, defendant's counsel objected, and the objection was sustained by the court. The record shows then the following colloquy:

"Mr. Sargent: If your honor please, the object of this examination is this: We propose to show that Mr. Malone purchased this truck about four months prior to the accident from the White Auto Company—a new truck; that at the time it was purchased there was a governor on the truck, it was sealed, and that that seal was not broken at the time of the accident.

"Mr. Lobdell: Now, if the court please, that opens an entirely new field of inquiry here.

"The Court: Objection sustained. That is not rebuttal."

Appellant in his brief argues that the testimony as to the governor on the truck should have been allowed on the theory that it operated in some manner to control the speed of the truck. It does not appear from the record that at the time the objection was made to his question he offered to prove that the governor did operate to limit the speed of the truck to less than 10 miles; 10 miles per hour being the limit provided by law for trucks traveling over a crossing. Nor does appellant in his brief at any point claim that the governor in question did or would prevent the truck from making more than 10 miles per hour. Hence we are not able to say that, even had the plaintiff been permitted to testify about the governor, or what it would show, the evidence would have tended to overcome the testimony of the defendant's witnesses.

Respondent in answer contends that, inasmuch as plaintiff in his case in chief offered testimony as to the speed of the truck, thus anticipating the charge of contributory negligence, it became his duty to offer all of the testimony he desired upon that question in his case in chief, and that any testimony on that issue was not proper rebuttal; that, in effect, the plaintiff occupied the position of offering, after the defendant had closed its case, matter on his case in chief, the allowance of which was entirely within the discretion of the court. This view has been sustained in the case of Casey v. Le Roy, 38 Cal. 697. Reason would support this rule. Plaintiff evidently went on the theory, in the presentation of his case, that the burden was upon him to show, not only the speed of the street car, but also the speed of the truck, and, having had the opportunity in his case in chief, without objection or hindrance from the defense, to present testimony which in effect was anticipating the evidence of the defendant on the charge of contributory negligence, he should not be allowed to occupy the time of the court by covering the same ground in rebuttal. Upon the authority of the case above cited, as well as the considerations enumerated, we are of the opinion that the ruling of the court was proper.

[3, 4] The second point urged on behalf of a reversal is that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury the following instruction:

"It is the duty of a motorman in charge of a street car to exercise reasonable care and diligence to discover any person or vehicle upon or near to the track in front of the car which he is operating, and, if he discovers any vehicle in charge of a person upon said track, or so near as to be likely to be struck by said car, and he has reason to believe that said person is unable to avoid his danger, it is the duty of said motorman to use every reasonable effort to stop the car, and if in such case he causes or permits his car to run with uninterrupted speed, and without effort to check or stop the same, until it runs into and strikes said vehicle, destroying it, the defendant would be guilty of negligence."

The purpose of the instruction was manifestly to instruct the jury on the doctrine of the "last clear chance." The refusal of the court to give this instruction was based upon the assertion that the substance of it was included in other instructions given to the jury.

From a careful examination of the instructions given to the jury, it appears that the only instruction which might be interpreted as covering the doctrine of the "last clear chance" reads as follows:

"If the motorman was keeping a reasonable lookout ahead, and if you further believe that, because of the conditions existing on the southwest corner of First and Townsend streets, it was impossible for the motorman to see or know of the approach of the truck until it came into view from behind the buildings, and that he became aware of its approach as soon as any other reasonable or prudent motorman, situated as he was, would have, and that he then immediately did all he could to bring his car to a stop, using the appliances he had at hand, and made every reasonable effort to avoid a collision, then the plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict must be against him and in favor of the defendant."

If the instruction actually given by the court as above quoted contains the essential provisions of the rule applicable to the doctrine of the "last clear chance," then no error was committed by the court in refusing plaintiff's offered instruction. The doctrine of the "last clear chance" involves: First, the proposition as to whether or not the defendant actually saw the plaintiff in a position of danger, or in a position that any reasonable person would infer was likely to be dangerous; and, second, if he did so see the plaintiff, that it was his duty to exercise every reasonable endeavor to avoid the collision, and, failing in so doing, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, although he was guilty of contributory negligence. While it must be conceded that the instruction requested by the plaintiff contains in much clearer form the law of the doctrine of the "last clear chance," we cannot say that the instruction given by the court did not contain a sufficient statement of the law on this subject. The court in effect, although in somewhat involved and negative form, declares to the jury the legal conclusion which would follow if the jury should find that the motorman perceived the plaintiff, as soon as a man under such conditions could reasonably have done so, and that if the jury so finds, and that he immediately did all in his power to avoid a collision, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. Upon careful study of these instructions, it seems to us that there was called to the jury's attention the essential elements involved in the doctrine of the "last clear chance," and while, as above suggested, the clear enunciation of those principles, as set forth in the refused instruction, would probably have been more helpful to the jury in having clearly in mind this rule, we are satisfied that sufficient information on the subject was given to the jury to enable them to make application thereof, if the facts warranted it.

[5] Furthermore, from a careful examination of the testimony in the case, we feel that there was abundant evidence to justify the jury in believing that the motorman of the street car exercised every reasonable effort to stop the car before the collision, and that the verdict of the jury from the evidence could not in any sense be said to be a miscarriage of justice.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MAGONI. (Cr. 830.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 1, 1925. Rehearing Denied July 1, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⊂⊃1159(3)—Finding of jury on contradictory evidence conclusive on appeal.

Where the evidence of a witness affirmed, and that of the defendant denied, the sales of intoxicating liquor charged, implied findings of the jury are conclusive on appeal.

2. Fines ⊂⊃11—Judgment of the superior court may provide imprisonment, in default of payment of fines for violating liquor law.

In a prosecution for violating the liquor law, imposition of imprisonment, in default of payment of fines imposed by the court, held authorized.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃1213—Trial court, in assessing fines upon defendant, may have inferred she was not a novice.

In a prosecution for two unlawful sales of intoxicating liquor, imposition of a fine of $1,000 upon each count was not excessive, and violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 8, and Const. art. 1, § 6, where the evidence showed that the defendant instructed purchasers how to avoid detection, the trial court may have inferred, in fixing the amount, that the defendant was not a novice in the unlawful sale of liquor.

4. Criminal law ⊂⊃1214—Rule applicable where contended that the fine imposed is excessive.

In order to justify the appellate court in interfering and setting aside a judgment of fine authorized by statute, the fine must be so excessive and unusual, and so disproportionate to the offense committed, as to shock public sentiment and violate the judgment of reasonable people concerning what is right and proper under the circumstances.

5. Criminal law ⊂⊃1044—Testimony admitted without objection below cannot be complained of on appeal.

Appellant cannot complain regarding testimony of district attorney admitted without objection below, and where the court was not asked to strike out the testimony or to instruct the jury to disregard same.

6. Criminal law ⊂⊃995(4)—Judgment providing for a fine or for imprisonment in default of payment not fatally uncertain.

In a prosecution for violating the liquor law, judgment providing for imprisonment, in default of payment of fine alternatively imposed, held not fatally uncertain because "no provision made for defendant in case a part of the fine is paid," although in such a case the judgment would be in more appropriate form if such provision were made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Mrs. Floyd Magoni (true name Rose Magoni) was convicted of the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, and she appeals. Modified as to sentence and affirmed.

William Klein, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. By separate counts in the information the defendant was charged with two unlawful sales of intoxicating liquor, alleged to have been made on different days.

She was convicted on both counts. Her motion for a new trial was denied. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction.

[1] One witness testified in detail that the defendant made the sales as alleged. The liquor described in the first count contained 10 per cent. of alcohol by volume, and that in the second count 47 per cent. The defendant testified that she did not make either sale. Under such state of the evidence the implied findings of the jury are conclusive on appeal.

The judgment provides that the defendant "be punished by a fine of $1,000 on the first count contained in the information, and that in default of payment thereof that she be imprisoned in the county jail of Lassen county, state of California, for the term of six months," and that she "be punished by a fine of $1,000 on the second count contained in the information, and that in default of payment thereof that she be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of Lassen, state of California, for the term of six months."

[2] Appellant contends that the provisions in the judgment for imprisonment in default of payment of the fines imposed by the court are unauthorized. The question may be considered as settled in this state contrary to appellant's contention. Ex parte Garrison, 193 Cal. 37, 223 P. 64; In re Kennerly, 190 Cal. 774, 214 P. 857.

[3, 4] Appellant contends that "the fine is excessive and is a violation of the eighth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and of section 6, art. 1, Constitution of California." The question is not whether this court would have imposed the fines under consideration, but whether, as a matter of law, the sentence imposed by the trial court is violative of the constitutional provisions cited. In People v. Oppenheimer, 156 Cal. 733, 737, 106 P. 74, 77, the court said:

"Whatever may be our views as to the policy of this section of the Penal Code [246], we are not warranted in saying as matter of law that the punishment of death for an assault with a deadly weapon with malice aforethought by one undergoing a life sentence in a state prison is either 'cruel' or 'unusual' within the meaning of those terms as used in our Constitution. The infliction of the death penalty by any of the methods ordinarily adopted by civilized people, such as hanging, shooting, or electricity, is neither a cruel nor unusual punishment (see In Re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 447, 10 S. Ct. 930 [34 L. Ed. 519]), unless perhaps it be so disproportionate to the offense for which it is inflicted as to meet the disapproval and condemnation of the conscience and reason of men generally, 'as to shock the moral sense of the people' (People v. Morris, 80 Mich. 634, 8 L. R. A. 685, 45 N. W. 591)."

The same rule is applicable where it in contended that the fine imposed is excessive.

"In order to justify the court in interfering and setting aside a judgment for a fine authorized by statute, the fine imposed must be so excessive and unusual, and so disproportionate to the offense committed, as to shock public sentiment and violate the judgment of reasonable people concerning what is right and proper under the circumstances. A statute does not violate the constitutional provision prohibiting excessive fines or the imposition of cruel and unusual punishments, because it authorizes a fine to be imposed for each sale of liquor without a license, for each act of extortion in charging excessive freight rates, for each animal one unlawfully may have in his possession, or for each day the statute is violated, or because it makes the deposit of each letter in a scheme to defraud a separate offense, even though the fine in the aggregate amounts to a large sum, since the punishment thus imposed is not the fault of the law but of the one who violates it.' 16 C. J. 1358.

Whatever view may be entertained as to the wisdom of the liquor laws or the gravity of the offense of selling liquors in violation thereof, it is not to be forgotten that such a sale is violative of both the federal and the state statutes, and is expressly forbidden by the national Constitution. A witness for the prosecution testified:

"Accompanied by Haacke we visited defendant's residence and had several drinks of jackass brandy served by the defendant, and for which Haacke paid 50 cents per drink. Mr. Haacke asked the defendant for a pint bottle of jackass. Defendant stated that she had to be awful careful. Afterwards Mrs. Magoni brought in a pint bottle, for which Haacke paid $3. A pint bottle of jackass, for which Haacke paid $3. * * * He proceeded to put it in his bib overalls, when Mrs. Magoni said, 'Don't put it there; if they catch you they will see it.' Mr. Haacke handed the bottle back to Mrs. Magoni, and she wrapped it up in a paper sack. She says, 'If you meet anybody in the road, * * * dash it to the ground and break it.'"

The trial court, in fixing the amount of punishment, may have inferred from this evidence that the defendant was not a novice in the unlawful sale of liquors.

[5] During the trial there seems to have been a "little bottle on the table" in the courtroom. Counsel for defendant, in arguing an objection to a question put to a witness for the prosecution relative to another bottle of liquor, said: "There are three counts in the original complaint and two counts in the information." The district attorney replied: "The defendant was held on this one (apparently referring to the bottle concerning which he was questioning the witness), and not on that little bottle on the table there." The district attorney testified, relative to three exhibits, "I delivered these three articles, and I believe that other bottle over there was with them, to the clerk." The other bottle referred to was probably the little bottle first mentioned, and which was not offered in evidence. It is contended that it was error for the district attorney to refer to this little bottle under the circumstances mentioned. Counsel for defendant made no objection to the testimony, or to the first remark of the district attorney relative to the bottle on the table, or to the presence of the bottle in the courtroom. Neither was the court asked to strike out the testimony nor to instruct the jury to disregard it or the previous remark by the district attorney. Under such circumstances the appellant is not in a position to complain.

[6] Appellant urges that the judgment is fatally uncertain because "no provision is made for defendant in case a part of the fine is paid." Judgments in substantially the same form as that in question here have been upheld. Ex parte Riley, 142 Cal. 124, 75 P. 665; Ex parte Chin Yan, 60 Cal. 78; Ex parte Ellis, 54 Cal. 204; Matter of Application of Robbins, 27 Cal. App. 677, 151 P. 14. It is proper to suggest that in such a case the judgment would be in more appropriate form if, after imposing a fine, it should provide "that in default of payment thereof the defendant be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of ——— at the rate of one day for every $——— of said fine remaining unpaid until said fine is satisfied, not exceeding ——— months." In order to avoid any possible uncertainty in the judgment, it is modified by adding to the part thereof herein quoted the following:

"Provided that upon part payment of the amount of said fines said imprisonment shall be reduced in the proportion of such part payment to said amount."

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

PURCELL v. CITY OF SAN GABRIEL. (Civ. 4578.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 2, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸217(1)—Engineer's contract held to require submission of plans for water system before bond election.

Engineer's contract to prepare and submit plans for municipal water system construed as requiring submission thereof as part of report to city trustees before calling of bond election by them.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸220(1)—Engineer, not submitting plans of water system before bond election, as required by contract, could not recover damages for breach by city, or reasonable value of services rendered.

Civil engineer, failing to submit plans and designs for proposed water system before bond election, as required by contract with city, held not entitled to recover damages for alleged breach of contract by city, or reasonable value of services rendered thereunder.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸220(1)—Civil engineer, failing to submit adequate plans of water system, as required by contract, not entitled to compensation.

Civil engineer, whose report to city trustees, as required by contract to submit plans for proposed water system, was not accompanied by plans, designs, or details sufficient to make it intelligible, made provision for pipe in less than half of city streets, incorrectly stated estimated length of many streets and area of city, etc., could recover no compensation, even if contract did not require submission of plans before bond election, which trustees failed to call.

4. Contracts ⟸321(1)—Incomplete performance bars recovery of damages for breach by other party, unless latter prevented further performance.

One failing to complete performance of contract cannot recover damages for breach by other party, unless he performed so far as able, and such other party prevented further performance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. L. Fleming, Judge pro tem.

Action by Gervaise Purcell against the City of San Gabriel. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hickcox & Crenshaw, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, and H. S. Farrell, City Atty., of San Gabriel, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. The defendant, the city of San Gabriel, was contemplating the installation of a municipal water system, and entered into the following contract with plaintiff, a civil engineer:

"Contract of Employment.

"This agreement, made and entered into this 8th day of February, 1921, witness:

"That, whereas, the city of San Gabriel, Cal., being desirous of owning and operating a water system and of acquiring the same by purchase, condemnation, or new construction, by means of a bond issue for the purpose of procuring funds therefor, and it being impossible for either the board of trustees of said city or the people of the city to intelligently determine how to proceed in such acquisition unless estimates of the value of the present plants in private operation and ownership, and comprehensive plans and designs, are prepared and submitted as to the proposed installation of a new system or extension of the present system now located in said city, in the event of purchase and cost of new construction, is made by a competent engineer.

"Therefore, the city of San Gabriel does hereby employ Gervaise Purcell to make such estimates, prepare and submit such plans and designs, and to report thereon to the city trustees within a reasonable time, and said Gervaise Purcell does hereby agree to use his best skill in making such estimates, preparing and submitting such plans and designs, and to report the same to said trustees within a reasonable time, and to co-operate with them and with any water committee that may be appointed by them or the chamber of commerce of said city, for the purpose of informing the voters of said city as to the merits of said municipal ownership.

"That said engineer shall be paid as compensation for such service as follows: Ten per centum (10%) of the total costs of such works, payable as payments are made on the said water systems, or parts of said system or systems.

"Provided, however, that said city shall compensate said engineer for any expense or cost he incurs in making excavations and surveys prior to the bond election held hereunder, and in the event said bond issue shall not be carried at said election, no further charge than herein set out shall be made by said engineer.

"Provided, also, that said board of trustees shall appoint, or cause to be appointed, by the chamber of commerce of said city, a water committee to act with the parties hereto for the purpose of informing the voters of the necessity and benefits of city ownership, to the end that said bond election may be carried by a large majority.

"Said board of trustees agree to submit the question of municipal ownership of water works, and a bond issue to pay for same, to the voters of said city within a reasonable time upon receipt of a favorable report from said engineer.

"Said Gervaise Purcell agrees that in the event bonds are voted by the city for a water works system, that he will perform all engineering services necessary in the design and construction of said waterworks, furnish valuations and conduct negotiations looking to the purchase of the existing plants and systems now operating in said city; that said services will be performed in a skillful and scientific manner and according to the best principles and theories of engineering in use in this locality, and said work on behalf of said engineer shall commence promptly hereafter, and shall be faithfully and diligently performed until the services and work herein described have been fully and completely furnished and performed, and that all of said services above mentioned and described shall be for the compensation herein mentioned.

"Time shall be the essence of this contract.

"This agreement made in duplicate, pursuant to resolution No. 51 of said city, adopted February 8, 1921, which is hereby made a part of this agreement.

"Witness our hands this 8th day of February, 1921. City of San Gabriel, by Geo. D. Dake, President of Board of Trustees. Gervaise Purcell, Engineer. Attest: Ira H. Stouffer, City Clerk of the City of San Gabriel."

After the execution of the contract the plaintiff made certain investigations as to the most feasible means, in his judgment, of obtaining a water supply for said city, obtained for said city certain options on water bearing lands, situated in or near said city, on which there was situated a well producing a supply of water; made an examination of the two private water systems that were then furnishing water to the inhabitants of said city, and made a physical valuation of their property, designed a circulating distributing system for conducting water to various sections of said city with a list of the streets of said city, and the class and length of pipe for each street, and made an estimate of the cost of the proposed system. These facts, with the exception of the valuation placed upon the two private systems already referred to, he embodied in a written report which he submitted to the board of trustees of the defendant within a reasonable time after his employment. He did not, however, at that time, or ever, prepare or present to the board of trustees any plans or designs of said proposed system other than what were contained in said written report. The city refused to call an election for the purpose of submitting to the electors the question of said bond issue, and thereupon plaintiff instituted this action. The complaint contains two counts, one based upon the contract of employment, wherein plaintiff claims there is due him the sum of $20,000, being 10 per cent. of the estimated cost of the proposed system; the second count is based upon the reasonable value of plaintiff's services, in which he asks for the same amount as is claimed by him in the first count. The court found in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

[1] Appellant concedes that the evidence is sufficient to support the findings, but contends that the trial court erred in its construction of the contract of employment between the parties. The trial court held that by the terms of the contract the appellant was to prepare and submit to the board of trustees the plans and designs prior to the submission of the question of a bonded indebtedness to the electors of said city. Appellant contends that he was under no obligation to prepare or submit such plans and designs until after said electors had declared in favor of said bond issue, and said board of trustees required the plans and designs for the purpose of installing the water system. Appellant concedes that the plans and designs contemplated by the contract were never submitted by him to the board of trustees of the respondent.

We think a reasonable construction to be given the contract is that the parties intended that the plans and designs were to be used not only for the purpose of advising the board of trustees in its acquisition of a municipal water system for the city, but also for the purpose of enabling the people of said city to intelligently determine whether they would favor the city incurring a bonded indebtedness for such a system. This intention clearly appears from the preamble immediately preceding the formal parts of the contract in the use of the following words, "it being impossible for either the board of trustees of said city or the people of the city to intelligently determine how to proceed in such acquisition unless estimates of the value * * * and comprehensive plans and designs are prepared and submitted as to the proposed installation, * * * is made by a competent engineer." Then follows the paragraph of the contract whereby the appellant is employed to make such estimates, to prepare and submit such plans and designs, and to report thereon to said city trustees within a reasonable time. We think this paragraph indicates that it was in the contemplation of the parties that the plans and designs were to accompany the report of the engineer, and were to be submitted to the board of trustees with said report as a part thereof.

[2] The contract further proceeds with the appellant's agreement to use his best skill in making such estimates, preparing and submitting such plans and designs, and to report to said trustees within a reasonable time. This language of the contract also indicates that the parties contemplated that the plans and designs, and the report itself, were practically inseparable, and were to be submitted to the board at one and the same time. In a further paragraph of the contract the board of trustees of said city agreed to submit to the voters the question of municipal ownership of waterworks and a bond issue to pay for the same, within a reasonable time, upon receipt of a favorable report from the engineer. While it is not entirely clear, yet, construing the contract as a whole, we are of the opinion that the report mentioned in this paragraph of the contract refers back to the report already mentioned in the preceding paragraphs, and which was to be submitted along with the plans and designs, and as a part thereof. This being so, the neglect of the appellant to submit as a part of his report any plans and designs of the proposed water system was a failure on his part to perform the terms of his contract of employment. The board of trustees was under no obligation to call the bond election until such plans and designs had been filed as a part of the report. Having failed to perform the terms of the contract on his part to be performed, he had no standing in an action for damages for an alleged breach thereof on the part of respondent. Neither can he recover the reasonable value of his services rendered, for the reason that said services were rendered under the contract which provided that the only compensation to be paid appellant (except for certain expenses and costs incurred in making excavations and surveys prior to the bond election, which are not involved in this action) was to be paid him only when an election had been held, and the electors of said city had voted to incur said bonded indebtedness. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the trial court gave the correct construction to the contract.

[3] The court further found "that the said report was incomplete in many particulars, that the same was not accompanied by any plans, drawings, designs, or details, which were sufficient to make said report intelligible or otherwise, or at all; that the data contained in said report was incorrect and was insufficient." The findings then specify wherein said report was incorrect and insufficient. Among these specifications were the following: There were 48 streets in said city, and said report made provision for laying pipe in only 21 of said streets; the estimated length of many of said streets was incorrectly stated in said report, the area of said city, as stated in said report, and to which said water system was to supply water, was 1,400 acres, while the true area was 1,850 acres, and there was a failure to provide for certain main pipe lines and conduits necessary to complete the water system which appellant had planned and reported to said board of trustees. The court further found that said report provided for a supply of only 140 inches of water, which was wholly inadequate to meet either the present or future needs of said city. This finding of the court would preclude any recovery on the part of appellant, even if the court had given the contract the construction claimed for it by him. The court, in effect, found that appellant had not submitted any adequate report as called for by his contract of employment. Until appellant had submitted such a report to the board of trustees, he was not entitled to any compensation under the contract, nor was said board of trustees, or said respondent, under any obligation to take any further action thereunder.

The appellant makes the further point that any departure on his part from the terms of the contract were acquiesced in and waived by the respondent. There is nothing in the evidence to justify this claim, and the findings of the court are directly to the contrary.

[4] Finally appellant contends that having performed the contract in so far as he was able, and the respondent having prevented its further and complete performance, appellant is entitled to recover damages for its breach. If the facts of the case or the findings of the court would support such a contention, we would readily agree with appellant, but it is apparent from what we have already said that this claim finds no support from any source.

The judgment is affirmed.

LA MESA, LEMON GROVE & SPRING VALLEY IRR. DIST. et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT, IN AND FOR ORANGE COUNTY, et al. (Civ. 5117.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 1, 1925.)

1. Statutes ⟸64(5)—Jurisdiction in condemnation proceedings by city, so as to authorize alternative writ of prohibition, not affected by unconstitutionality of clause in act making ordinance exclusive evidence of existence of conditions necessary.

Even if clause of Code Civ. Proc. § 1241, declaring city ordinances conclusive evidence of existence of conditions necessary to condemn property, be unconstitutional as local or special legislation, jurisdiction of superior court in condemnation proceedings by city would not be affected so as to authorize alternative writ of prohibition.

2. Prohibition ⟸5(3)—Does not lie to prevent trial of proceedings by city to condemn land outside corporate limits.

Prohibition does not lie to prevent trial of proceedings by city to condemn property outside its corporate limits, on ground that court is without jurisdiction, whether city can or cannot condemn such property.

Application by the La Mesa, Lemon Grove & Spring Valley Irrigation District and another for an alternate writ of prohibition to the Superior Court in and for Orange County and the Judges thereof. Petition denied.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for petitioner La Mesa, Lemon Grove & Spring Valley Irr. Dist.

Crouch & Sanders, of San Diego, and Flint & MacKay, of Los Angeles, for petitioner Cuyamaca Water Co.

CONREY, P. J. Application for alternative writ of prohibition.

By the petition, it appears that there is pending an action commenced by the city of San Diego against petitioners in the superior court of San Diego county, which action on change of venue was transferred to respondent superior court of the county of Orange. Said action is to be tried on June 15, 1925, and, unless prevented by the issuance of an alternative writ of prohibition herein, respondent will proceed with the trial thereof. Petitioners have stated several grounds upon which they claim that respondent court is without jurisdiction to hear or determine said action.

Concerning the claim that there is such want of jurisdiction because the city of San Diego is not following the constitutional or statutory procedure for eminent domain, the specifications relating to those defects or errors of precedure raise questions relating to the sufficiency of the complaint in the action. We think, however, that they do not affect the jurisdiction of respondent court to determine the questions thus presented.

[1] Petitioners say that there is a want of jurisdiction because the provisions of section 1241 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorizing a city by ordinance to determine certain jurisdictional facts in eminent domain, are unconstitutional. Said section 1241 provides that, where the legislative body of the city shall have found and determined by resolution or ordinance that certain facts exist, such resolution or ordinance shall be conclusive evidence of the existence of certain conditions which are necessary in the exercise of the power of eminent domain. The point suggested by petitioners is that said section violates the constitutional provisions that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, and that the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in cases where a general law can be made applicable, because said section provides for the determination of certain facts by the legislative body of "a county, city and county, or an incorporated city or town," but does not give like authority to irrigation districts and other public bodies vested with the right to maintain proceedings in eminent domain. Even if it should be held that, for the reasons suggested by petitioners, the conclusive evidence clause of said section is unconstitutional, such conclusion would not affect the jurisdiction of the court in the action.

[2] Petitioners further contend that respondent court is without jurisdiction of said action because the property sought to be condemned is outside the corporate limits of the city of San Diego, and that the city of San Diego has no right by condemnation proceedings to acquire property outside the corporate limits. Citation is made of sundry authorities, which state the proposition that a municipal corporation can exercise the power of eminent domain only when expressly authorized by the Legislature. Therefore, notwithstanding the fact that the statutes do give to cities the right to acquire property for public use, and conceding that the use of property for the waterworks of a city is a public use, yet it is contended that without express authority this cannot include the right to acquire such property outside the corporate limits of the city. So it is contended that respondent court is without jurisdiction to authorize the condemnation of such property at the instance of the city and for the stated use. Counsel in presenting their application conceded that on sundry occasions cities in this state have been permitted to condemn lands and water rights and rights of way for sewers outside of city limits. But they say that they have not found any California decision directly upon the point which they now urge. It would seem that, if there had been merit in the proposition, it would have been urged upon the attention of the trial court, or of the Supreme Court, in some of those cases which were more seriously litigated, such as City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 57 P. 585, and City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 P. 604. In City of Pasadena v. Stimson, at page 255 (27 P. 608), the court said:

"In short, the plaintiff, being a city with sewage to dispose of, and having a sewer farm to which it has apparently a right to conduct it, has necessarily the right to construct such a sewer as the statute, section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure, contemplates. * * *"

McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 44 P. 358, 31 L. R. A. 794, 53 Am. St. Rep. 191, was a case wherein the defendant city challenged the validity of a contract which it had made for the disposition of sewage by conveying it some distance from the city limits. The Supreme Court, holding that there was no force in this objection, said:

"Proper sewers are in this day so essential to the hygiene and sanitation of a municipality, that a court would not look to see whether a power to construct and maintain them had been granted by the charter, but rather only to see whether by possibility the power had been expressly denied. * * * Disposition of the outfall is an essential part of the maintenance of a sewer system, and it must often be necessary for inland cities to arrange for that disposition without their corporate limits."

Counsel for petitioners have stated in their brief that the right of prohibition in eminent domain proceedings has not been questioned in this state so far as they are aware. They therefore rely upon authorities taken from other states, and particularly upon the decision of the Supreme Court of Montana in State ex rel. McLeod v. District Court, 67 Mont. 164, 215 P. 240. That is a case wherein it was held that upon the facts there presented the city of Livingston had no right to condemn and take for a public highway a strip of land outside the city limits, in order to connect the city with a park owned by it. And the court further held that the writ of prohibition should issue to prevent the court from proceeding in the action.

We find, however, that there is direct authority in this state indicating that prohibition does not lie in this action, even if the objections of petitioners to the validity of the proceedings in the court below could be successfully maintained. In Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Superior Court, in the Third appellate district (15 Cal. App. 679, 115 P. 1091, 1100), the petitioners applied for a writ of prohibition to prevent the superior court from proceeding in an action brought by the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, a New York corporation, to condemn certain property for use as a part of plaintiff's telegraph line. It was contended by petitioners that foreign telegraph corporations are not authorized by the laws of California to exercise the right of eminent domain, and that therefore the superior court was without jurisdiction in said action. The District Court of Appeal decided the case on its merits and discharged the alternative writ which had been issued. A petition having been presented for a rehearing of said cause in the Supreme Court, the court denied that petition without regard to the merits of the controversy, and upon the sole ground that the remedy by writ of prohibition was not available to the petitioners. The court said (page 701 [115 P. 1100]):

"It is sought by this proceeding to prohibit the superior court from hearing an application by a foreign corporation to condemn private property for a public use upon the ground that the superior court has no jurisdiction to listen to such an application by such a party. It is true that the capacity of a foreign corporation to exercise the power of eminent domain in this state is purely a question of law, but it is a question as much within the jurisdiction of the superior court as other questions of law arising in similar cases which are held to be reviewable here only on appeal."

An interesting Missouri decision, based on the same principle, is found in State ex rel. Union Depot R. Co. v. Southern R. Co., 100 Mo. 59, 13 S. W. 398.

Apparently, the situation here is essentially like that which was considered by the Supreme Court in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Superior Court, supra. The contention of the petitioner there was, and the contention of petitioners here is, that the superior court is without jurisdiction to hear and determine an action in eminent domain, if the case presented by the plaintiff in the action shows on its face that the plaintiff has not been authorized and is without authority to maintain any action to condemn the property sought to be taken.

The petition is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by the Yolland Ice & Fuel Company against James Mulcahy. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, of Stockton (A. P. Hayne, of Stockton, of counsel), for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant has appealed from the judgment herein in favor of the plaintiff.

The complaint alleges, and the court found, that the defendant is indebted to plaintiff on an open book account for goods, wares, and merchandise, sold and delivered to defendant by plaintiff at his special instance and request, in the sum of $939.09, which was the reasonable value thereof, and which defendant agreed to pay. A bill of particulars was furnished defendant, and it is not claimed by appellant that he did not purchase and receive the merchandise therein set forth, or that the charges therefor are unreasonable. His claim is that he paid plaintiff in full for such merchandise before the action was commenced.

The defendant was a contractor at the time the indebtedness was incurred, and, according to the bill of particulars, the merchandise, which consisted of gravel, sand, rock, cement, lime, and plaster, was purchased for use on several jobs which the defendant had under construction. The dates of these purchases ranged from February 8 to December 26, 1918. The defendant testified that he paid this indebtedness June 9, 1918, by giving the plaintiff a check for $1,100 in full settlement thereof. Witnesses for the plaintiff testified that this check was given in payment of other sums which the defendant owed the plaintiff at that time, and the court found accordingly.

[1] Appellant contends that evidence of this other indebtedness was improperly admitted because not alleged in the complaint or set out in the bill of particulars. There is no merit in the contention. It was not the indebtedness for which the suit was brought, and evidence thereof was properly admitted to show that the payment of $1,100 was made in liquidation thereof, and not in satisfaction of the indebtedness for which the suit was brought.

The case was tried November 26, 1920, and when the parties rested the court announced that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. At some subsequent time, not disclosed by the record, the court set aside the order for judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the reason stated by the trial judge at a hearing had December 3, 1923, as follows:

"I set aside the order for judgment, not upon the theory I did not think that the case was proven that the plaintiff was entitled to recover as the evidence was put before me, but I felt that the defendant had not a proper opportunity to examine the account that was proven in court."

Counsel for defendant said:

"We are satisfied to let the matter stand as it now stands. * * * We are fully satisfied with the evidence adduced on the part of the defendant."

After further colloquy between the court and counsel for the respective parties, the court ordered judgment for plaintiff. Appellant seems to contend that his rights were in some manner prejudiced by the delay in the disposition of the case, but in what respect does not appear.

[2] Appellant contends that there is no evidence to support the finding that the plaintiff kept books of account. That portion of the plaintiff's ledger "relating to the account of James Mulcahy, * * * showing the application of the payment of that $1,100 to the various accounts as testified to by Mr. Louttit." the plaintiff's bookkeeper, was admitted in evidence, but is not included in the record on appeal. Louttit testified that the payment was applied to an old balance in the sum of $206.86, "to the Naylor job, $674.49, and the United States Hotel job, $224.65." If there is anything in the ledger account so admitted in evidence which is favorable to appellant, it is fair to presume that he would have had it included in the record.

[3] Appellant urges that there is no evidence to support the finding that, "in addition to the goods, wares, and merchandise amounting to said sum of $939.09, plaintiff furnished to defendant other goods, wares and merchandise, on certain jobs," to the payment of which the said $1,100 was applied, and that the said $1,100 paid "no part or portion of the $939.09 set forth in finding IV hereof, and the account thereof was kept separate and apart in the books of plaintiff herein from the said items of wares, goods, and merchandise making up and amounting to the said sum of $939.05." The appellant cannot be heard to complain that evidence, the plaintiff's ledger which the record shows was admitted, but which he has failed to have included therein, does not support the findings. 2 Cal. Jur. 689.

The judgment is affirmed.

STERLING LUMBER CO. v. KINSEY.

(Civ. 2826.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 28, 1925.)

Appeal and error ⟹704(2)—Failure to prove other indebtedness, upon which payments received for lumber were said to have been applied, precludes recovery of debt.

Where, in an action on lumber accounts, evidence by plaintiff's manager showed that part of defendant's payments were applied to "other indebtedness" not shown in the bill of particulars, but the record fails to disclose any evidence proving such indebtedness, a finding that plaintiff was not entitled to recover balance alleged due was justified for failure to show that proper application had been made of defendant's payments.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Ross Campbell, Judge.

Action by the Sterling Lumber Company against W. T. Kinsey, in which defendant filed cross-complaint. From a judgment denying recovery to either party, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. S. Page, of Oakland, for appellant.

E. J. Dole and F. A. Cromwell, both of Petaluma, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action to recover from defendant the total sum of $634.65, alleged to be due plaintiff on two different accounts.

The plaintiff is engaged in the lumber business, its principal place of business being in the city and county of San Francisco. One K. Benneche was, at the time that some of the transactions involved herein took place, the owner of a lumber business at Penn Grove, Sonoma county. During the time that said Benneche was engaged in conducting said lumber business, the defendant, Kinsey, a building contractor, dealt with and purchased lumber from Benneche for the purposes of his (defendant's) business. While these relations existed between Benneche and Kinsey, the former sold and transferred his lumber business to the plaintiff, but remained at Penn Grove as manager for plaintiff of said lumber business. After this transfer of said lumber business and the properties connected therewith, Kinsey continued to buy lumber at said lumber yards as so conducted by the plaintiff.

The complaint sets up two causes of action, both in the form of common counts. The first is for the sum of $243.90, and is based on an account accruing after plaintiff became the owner of the lumber business mentioned, and the other for the sum of $390.75, and founded on an account with said Benneche, and incurred prior to the time of his transfer of the business to plaintiff. The complaint alleges that the last-mentioned account was by Benneche assigned to plaintiff.

The answer consists of specific denials of all of the material averments of each count of the complaint. Defendant filed a cross-complaint, in two different counts, alleging, in the first, that plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of $40 for services and labor rendered by him for plaintiff, and, in the second, for the sum of $164.60, for money had and received. The plaintiff met the cross-complaint by specific denials of its averments.

The cause was tried by the court, sitting without a jury. The judgment is that neither the plaintiff nor defendant is entitled to recover anything from the other by reason of their respective affirmative pleadings.

The plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from the judgment.

The defendant, as stated, during the period covering the transactions involved herein, was a building contractor, and had contracts for the erection of different buildings or structures. He purchased building materials at the plaintiff's lumber yards in Penn Grove from time to time, or as the exigencies of his several building contracts required, during said period of time, and, as to each contract, maintained an account with the plaintiff and its predecessor, Benneche. Both the plaintiff and the defendant filed in the action a bill of particulars, specifically showing the numerous debit and credit items constituting the several accounts. Notwithstanding these bills of particulars, the accounts, as they were introduced in evidence, present, on their face, a veritable labyrinth of figures, the signification of which, as basic essentials of the issues tendered, cannot properly be understood without first subjecting the accounts thus constituted to the usual processes of an accountant, or some person having the ability, the time, and the patience to essay a task of such magnitude. An accounting should have been ordered and had. The court found specifically, however, that the defendant was not indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $243.90, as alleged in the first count of the complaint, or in any sum, nor was he indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $390.75, as alleged in the second count, or in any sum; that the materials set forth in plaintiff's bill of particulars as to the first count or cause of action set forth in the complaint, "excepting that but 13,000 instead of 35,000 cedar shingles were delivered to defendant; that said materials were used on different jobs or contracts, some not the subject of this litigation, and that defendant has paid on the purchase of said materials the sum of $4,321; that during a period of about two years last past that the defendant has had numerous transactions with the plaintiff, or with plaintiff's assignor K. Benneche; that the determination of a correct balance between plaintiff and defendant involves the examination of numerous accounts outside of others pleaded in plaintiff's amended complaint, or in defendant's cross-complaint, or as shown by plaintiff's bill of particulars filed herein; that as to said accounts not included in the issues herein there is a dispute between plaintiff and defendant; that because of said facts, this court finds that it is impossible to establish a true balance between plaintiff and defendant; that plaintiff has failed to sustain his case by preponderance of evidence."

If the trial court found itself unable, from the evidence before it, "to establish a true balance between plaintiff and defendant," certainly this court cannot be expected to do so. But the case presents a situation which does not necessitate a minute examination and a reconciliation of the numerous items making up the general account to justify approval of the finding that the plaintiff failed to establish his case by a preponderance of the evidence. To substantiate this conclusion, it is necessary only to refer briefly to the testimony of the plaintiff's manager, K. Benneche, also assignor of the claim constituting the basis of the second count of the complaint. He stated that the defendant had made payments on the account which amounted, in the aggregate, to the sum of $4,321, but that he had applied all of said amount, save and except the sum of $1,971, to the extinguishment of other indebtedness of the defendant to plaintiff, and which was not included in the plaintiff's bill of particulars. Plaintiff, however, failed to prove the "other indebtedness" to the satisfaction of which the payments made by defendant were applied. We have searched the record in vain for any such evidence. While it was not necessary for plaintiff to include in its bill of particulars such other indebtedness, it was incumbent upon it to prove it so that it might be made to appear that it had made a proper application of the moneys paid plaintiff by defendant. It follows, of course, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The judgment is affirmed.

Hankins & Hankins, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action for the return of the purchase price paid for certain hay which was destroyed by fire prior to actual delivery. The facts are as follows:

Hackfeld & Co., Limited, a corporation, engaged in the export business (predecessor of plaintiff herein), and defendants Chas. E. Goss & Son, a corporation, hay dealers of San Francisco, entered into a contract for the sale and purchase of some 800 tons of double compressed No. 1 wheat hay at the price of $31 per ton.

Defendants owned a warehouse in San Francisco, and bought hay from the growers, and resold the same to local buyers and also to wholesalers and exporters. As a part of their export business in handling hay they owned certain high-power presses, which were used for the rebaling or double compressing of hay, the process being to unbale and brake up the ordinary size bales as received from the growers, and then recompress or rebale the same under high compression, thereby reducing the size of each bale about one-half.

The object of this change was to permit of the export shipment of a greater quantity in a given size space for the purpose of economy in shipment. Other than the decreasing of the size of the bales, nothing else was done to the hay. The plaintiff, American Factors, Limited (at the time of the transaction known as Hackfeld & Co.), were exporters, and in the conduct of their business purchased hay in San Francisco for sale in the Hawaiian Islands. About July 25, 1918, at San Francisco, plaintiff's predecessor, Hackfeld & Co., made the purchase in question. The hay was paid for in full according to the terms of the agreement of sale. The price included delivery f. o. b. at Matson Navigation Company's docks, when and as ordered by direction of plaintiff. The time of delivery was limited by the agreement to June 1, 1919, but at the expiration thereof, plaintiff not having ordered all of the hay purchased, the time for the delivery of the balance was extended by mutual consent. When partial deliveries aggregating some 500 tons had been made, the warehouse of defendants was destroyed by fire.

At this time there was approximately some 302 tons of hay not called for or delivered. Demand for delivery of said balance was thereupon made by plaintiff upon defendants, who refused to comply therewith, claiming that 189½ tons of the hay had been double compressed and set aside for plaintiff and so entered in defendants' books. The balance of 112½ tons, so defendants claimed, had been likewise compressed and was in defendants' warehouse at the time of the fire, but had not actually and physically been set aside for plaintiff, and was more or less mixed with other hay.

On this 112½ tons defendants collected insurance, and so notified plaintiff, and prior to the commencement of this action they offered to pay the amount of this insurance money to plaintiff or to replace the hay. Plaintiff demanded delivery of the entire remaining 302 tons or the return of its purchase price, which demand was refused, and this action followed. At the trial defendants contended that the intent of the parties was to make an actual sale of the hay, and not an agreement of sale, and that, as they had prepared the same so as to have it ready for delivery upon the orders of plaintiff, title passed and the risk of loss or damage was upon plaintiff. In other words, defendants claimed a constructive delivery by reason of a segregation. Plaintiff denied that any segregation had ever been made in its favor of the whole or any part of the undelivered portion of the hay so as to distinguish it from other hay in defendants' warehouse, and further denied that any notice of segregation or indemnification was ever asserted by defendants until after the fire. It also claimed that defendants had agreed to assume all carrying charges, including storage and insurance, pending actual delivery, which was to be made f. o. b. at the Matson dock, and in consequence of which defendants must suffer the loss. The trial court found that defendants had agreed to assume the payment of the carrying charges including insurance. It further found that of the 302 tons of hay so undelivered no part was ever segregated by defendants in their warehouse or anywhere else to the order of plaintiff with its knowledge or consent or at all. It accordingly further found that no delivery had ever been made.

[1] Judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $11,610.17. If there is any evidence in the record to sustain the finding that no segregation had ever been made all questions concerning the effect of the agreement with reference to storage charges and insurance become unimportant, as does also the further contention of appellant that no title passed until there was a delivery f. o. b. Matson Dock under the rule laid down in Lewis v. Farmers' Grain, etc., Co., 52 Cal. App. 211, 198 P. 426. Upon this subject defendants offered testimony to show that the hay had been segregated in certain bins. It further appeared, however, that some of this hay had been withdrawn by defendants to fill an order of the Hakalau Plantation Company, and that other hay was placed in the bins for the account of such company of the same character called for by the contract; and also that other hay had been withdrawn from the bins by defendants, which would indicate that the hay was deposited in the bins for the convenience of the defendants in the conduct of their export business, and that it was of a fluctuating character and under the control of defendants. This evidence, in our opinion, was sufficient to support the finding that there was no such segregation as passed title in plaintiff. The case thus presents the situation where the vendor of personal property was to put the article purchased into a deliverable state as a condition precedent to the passing of title and the vesting of the property in the vendee.

[2] The learned trial judge, in ordering judgment for plaintiff, expressed his views in writing upon the law relating to this subject. As we are of the opinion that his conclusion is correct, we hereby adopt it as part of our opinion. It is as follows:

"The defendants claim that they so segregated the hay and appropriated it to the plaintiff's contract, that at the time of the fire the title was in the plaintiff, and the hay was at plaintiff's risk. Appropriation cannot rest, however, upon the mere intent of one party. Appropriation must be manifested by acts, and must have the assent of the buyer as well as the seller. I do not think that the evidence here indicates an actual appropriation of the property to the buyer with the buyer's assent.

[3] "The mere fact that the hay was double compressed and put into bins, without notification to the buyer, did not of itself vest title in the plaintiff. The defendants still had such control of the hay that, even after it was put into bins, they were at liberty to use it in filling orders of other parties, while, if the hay really belonged to the plaintiff, the application of it to other orders would have amounted to conversion by the defendants. The record shows that the defendants did in fact deliver to the Hakalau Plantation Company certain double-compressed hay from bins claimed to have contained hay appropriated exclusively to the plaintiff. The very fact that before the fire the defendants did so act indicates that they did not regard the hay as the actual property of the plaintiff.

[4] "I am of the opinion that in reality the defendants merely agreed to sell plaintiff hay to be supplied as needed out of defendants' fluctuating stock. And in general, where a quantity of hay is sold out of a larger lot, the title does not vest in the buyer while anything remains to be done by the seller in preparing the goods for delivery. This principle of law is treated at some length, with a review of the earlier English and American authorities in Messer v. Woodman, 22 N. H. 172, 53 Am. Dec. 241.

"See, also, Davis v. Hill, 3 N. H. 382, 14 Am. Dec. 373; Lawry v. Ellis, 85 Me. 500, 27 A. 518.

[5] "After having been compressed, the hay had to be delivered free of charge at the dock of the Matson Navigation Company; and until it was so delivered by defendants it is my view that title was not intended to vest, and that the hay was at the risk of the defendants.

"In Smith v. Sparkman, 55 Miss. 649, 30 Am. Rep. 537, there was a sale of five bales of cotton which at the time was in bulk in the seller's warehouse, and which he was to haul to a certain gin for packing, then from the gin to the town of Canton. Full payment was made in advance, as was done in the case at bar. A creditor of the seller levied an attachment on the cotton, when part of it was at the gin and the rest still in the seller's warehouse. It was held that the title was still in the seller and the cotton subject to attachment by his creditor.

"So in Davis v. Hill, 3 N. H. 382, 14 Am. Dec. 373, a quantity of hay was sold from a lot in the seller's barn, to be weighed out of a certain mow whenever the buyer saw fit to call for it. In this case also the hay was fully paid for in advance. Before any delivery occurred, the seller died and his administrator refused to make delivery; whereupon the buyer brought an action in trover, claiming title in himself. The court held, however, that the title had not passed, and judgment therefore went in favor of the administrator.

"In Andrews v. Cheney, 62 N. H. 404, we find a case closely parallel to the case at bar. There plaintiff had bought goods of the defendant and had paid for them in full. The plaintiff had selected the goods from samples, and defendant agreed to have the goods in stock in about two weeks. Within the stipulated time the goods were received by the defendant, and he then not only set them apart, but marked them with the plaintiff's name. The goods were, however, burned before the plaintiff called for them, and the question was whether the loss fell on the buyer or the seller. The court held that the goods were still the goods of the seller, saying:

" 'The defendant was not concluded by his selection. He might have sold or otherwise disposed of the particular article set apart by him, and substituted others in their place. A contract of sale is not complete until the specific goods on which it is to operate are agreed upon. Until that is done, the contract is not a sale, but an agreement to sell goods of a particular description. It is performed on the part of the vendor by furnishing the goods which answer the description. If, as in the case of a sale by samples, the specific goods are not ascertained by the agreement, the property does not pass until an appropriation of the specific goods to the contract is made with the assent of both parties. If the plaintiff authorized the defendant to make the selection, the property immediately on the selection vested in the plaintiff. It not appearing that the plaintiff gave such authority, the goods at the time of the fire were the property of the defendant and their destruction was his loss.'

"This reasoning I believe to be sound and to justify judgment in the case at bar for the return of plaintiff's money, with interest."

72 Cal. App. 622

Ex parte EISEMAN. (Cr. 1265.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 12, 1925.)

1. Bail ⟸63—Trial judge held to have properly made order of arrest and recommitment on receipt of information that bail furnished insufficient.

Under Pen. Code, § 1310, subdiv. 2, held, that trial judge, on receipt of letters informing him that bail furnished by convicted defendant was insufficient, was authorized summarily to order defendant's arrest and recommitment.

2. Bail ⟸63—Notice not prerequisite to order of arrest and recommitment for insufficient bail.

Under Pen. Code, § 1310, subdiv. 2, notice to convicted person is not prerequisite to trial judge's making order of arrest and recommitment when it "satisfactorily appears" to him that bail is insufficient.

3. Bail ⟸63—Refusal, on order of arrest and recommitment, to hear evidence relative to sufficiency of bail, erroneous but not prejudicial, where right to give bail pending appeal not denied.

Trial judge, in ordering arrest and recommitment of convicted person under Pen. Code, § 1310, subdiv. 2, because of insufficient bail, erred in refusing to hear evidence relative to sufficiency of bail; but such error was not prejudicial, where court stated that when new bond is presented it will consider qualifications of bondsmen.

Application by J. J. Eiseman for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of City and County of San Francisco to secure release from custody on ground of illegal commitment after having been released on bail pending appeal. Writ discharged and petitioner remanded.

See, also, 230 P. 669.

Edward A. Cunha, R. P. Henshall, and Robt. R. Moody, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Wm. M. Murphy, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

R. M. J. Armstrong, of San Francisco, for Sheriff.

KNIGHT, J. Habeas Corpus. Petitioner seeks to be released from the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, upon the ground that he was illegally recommitted after having been released on bail pending an appeal from a judgment of conviction.

The minute order upon which the recommitment is founded is in the following form:

"In this matter it satisfactorily appearing to the court, that the bail of the defendant J. J. Eiseman is insufficient. It is hereby ordered by the court that the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco arrest the defendant and detain him in custody until legally discharged. Thereupon the bail was fixed in the sum of fifty thousand ($50,000) dollars."

The facts leading up to the making of said order, briefly stated, are as follows: Following petitioner's conviction on eight counts of an indictment charging violation of the Corporate Securities Act, an order was made admitting him to bail in the sum of $50,000, pending appeal A personal bond was furnished for that amount, which was approved by the trial judge, and petitioner was released from custody. Subsequently the trial judge received information from officials of those counties wherein the sureties claimed to be the owners of property of sufficient value to justify their qualifying for the amounts specified in said bond, to the effect that the bail was insufficient. This information was conveyed to the judge through letters written by said officials in response to inquiries made by one of petitioner's attorneys at the request of the judge. Upon receipt of those letters petitioner's attorneys were informally notified by the judge to appear in court, with the petitioner on January 17, 1925. At the time appointed, in open court and in the presence of petitioner and his attorneys, the judge produced said letters, read the material portions thereof into the record, and pointed out that from the facts stated therein the bail was wholly insufficient, in that the sureties were not the owners of property of sufficient value to support the statements made by them in their affidavits of qualification. After briefly commenting upon the situation, the judge, addressing counsel for petitioner, said:

"Now, gentlemen, do you desire to make any explanation of that matter before I make an order?"

In response, the attorney by whom the inquiries had been made stated that he had met the bondsmen only once, but that if the bail was insufficient petitioner "would be willing to strengthen the bond," or "add to it," so that the same would meet the requirements of the court. Said attorney then requested that the court defer making its proposed order in the premises until the following Monday, at which time, he said, counsel would present certain telegrams and other communications received by them in support of the financial ability of the bondsmen to respond in the amounts for which they had become sureties. This request was denied, the judge stating that the bail was clearly insufficient. Thereupon the arrest of petitioner was ordered, and he was recommitted to the custody of the sheriff. The court then suggested to the district attorney that the matter of the attempted qualification of the sureties, under oath, be investigated, and such action be taken as the ascertained facts warranted. Before the hearing concluded, counsel for petitioner stated that said sureties, all of whom were nonresidents of the city and county of San Francisco, would be in San Francisco the following Monday, and would like to be heard; but the judge replied that no testimony would be taken, except in a proceeding before a committing magistrate or the grand jury; that he "did not want to see them." Counsel then inquired "Well, if I am able to present bondsmen who will qualify for the amount of the bond set by your honor, you will hear testimony?" and the judge replied, "You present the bond and then we will see about the bondsmen's qualifications." Petitioner was then taken into custody and has since been detained by the sheriff in pursuance of said order.

The contention of petitioner is that having been once duly admitted to bail, and having been released upon a bond which was accepted and approved by the court, it was beyond the jurisdiction of the court, thereafter, to order the petitioner recommitted unless the matter of the sufficiency of the bail was heard and determined at a formal hearing, after due notice to petitioner, and an opportunity afforded petitioner to produce evidence in support of the sufficiency of the bail, which, in the instant case, was not done.

[1] We are of the opinion that the court's action, under the circumstances, in making the order of arrest and recommitment, upon the strength of the statements contained in said letters was justified, and finds full support in subdivision 2 of section 1310 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows:

"The court * * * to which an indictment, information, or appeal is pending, * * * may, by an order entered upon its minutes, direct the arrest of the defendant and his commitment to the officer to whose custody he was committed at the time of giving bail, and his detention until legally discharged, in the following cases: * * * (2) When it satisfactorily appears to the court that his bail, or either of them, are dead or insufficient, or have removed from the state. * * *" (Italics ours.)

[2] It is apparent, we think, that the Code provision just quoted does not contemplate, as a prerequisite to the making of the order of arrest, notice to the convicted person, but allows the court to act summarily in the premises "when it satisfactorily appears" that the bail is insufficient. Necessarily such must be the law, if the order of arrest and recommitment shall in all cases be made effective, because if, after learning that the bail was insufficient, the court were powerless to cause the arrest of the convicted person until an order to show cause was issued and served, and an investigation was conducted in a formal manner, the convicted person might, if he were so inclined, become a fugitive and thereby render useless any order the court might make at the conclusion of such formal hearing. The very nature of the proceeding, it would seem, demands that the court act promptly in making the order of arrest.

[3] After making said order for the arrest and recommitment of petitioner in the instant case, however, the court erred, we believe, in refusing to hear evidence in his behalf, including the testimony of the bondsmen, relative to the sufficiency of the bail. While, as above indicated, the information conveyed by said letters was sufficient to warrant the court in exercising its power under section 1310 in causing the arrest of petitioner, we think that following the making of such order petitioner should have been permitted to produce the testimony of the bondsmen, and such additional evidence as he deemed necessary, for the purpose of disproving, if possible, the statements made in said letters. The question of the sufficiency of the bail could then have been determined in the light of all the evidence produced, and the bondsmen again accepted if it developed from said evidence that the statements in said letters were not well founded. It will be noted, however, that the order made by the court does not deprive the petitioner of the right to give bail pending appeal; and moreover the court has stated according to the record that when a new bond is presented it will consider the qualifications of the bondsmen, which, we assume, will include any of those bondsmen who attempted to qualify on the bond in question; therefore the error of the court, in previously refusing to hear petitioner's evidence has not been prejudicial—petitioner may still be released from custody whenever sufficient bail is given in the original sum of $50,000.

For the reasons stated the writ is discharged and petitioner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⟸33 — Purchaser to rescind contract need not show that property purchased was worth less than purchase price.

To rescind a contract for fraud, the purchaser need not be able to show that property purchased was worth less than the purchase price, it being sufficient if he was induced by false representations to buy property which, if representations had been true, would have been worth more than it actually was.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⟸123—On rescission of contract vendor is entitled to finding of value of purchaser's use and occupation of trial court.

In action by purchaser to rescind contract, vendor is entitled to finding as to value of plaintiff's use and occupation, but appellate court cannot supply such finding.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⟸341(5)—Plaintiff entitled to rescission of contract for fraud entitled to recover interest on amount paid under contract.

Where plaintiff is entitled to rescind a contract for fraud, he is entitled to recover interest upon the amount paid under the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by Elvira Kane and J. J. Kane against J. W. Ott and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

J. Stewart Ross and R. B. Whitelaw, both of El Centro, for appellants.

Hickcox, Crensbaw & Trude, of El Centro, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them in an action in which plaintiffs asked for a rescission of a contract by which they purchased certain land in the Imperial Valley from the defendants. Plaintiffs alleged that the contract had been induced by false and fraudulent representations, which allegations were denied by the defendants. In response to evidence offered by the plaintiffs, the court found that the parties had entered into the contract for the purchase and sale of the land in question, and that the plaintiffs had paid $1,000 upon the purchase price thereof and given their promissory note for $6,000, the balance of the purchase price, secured by first mortgage upon the property; that plaintiffs performed all the terms of their contract; that plaintiff Elvira Kane, who negotiated the purchase for the plaintiffs, had come to the county of Imperial and the state of California only shortly before entering into said contract; that she was entirely unfamiliar with conditions and land in said county and state, and knew nothing of business transactions, nor of farming; that she made the purchase without the aid and advice of her husband, the other plaintiff in the action, who was ill and living in Arizona; that, at the time of the purchase of said land by Elvira Kane, she informed defendant J. W. Ott that she was purchasing said land for the purpose of raising alfalfa and as good land for that purpose; that the defendant J. W. Ott is a business man with many years of experience in farming, who was familiar with land and soil in Imperial county, and especially with the land involved here; that said land was poor land, heavily impregnated with alkali and unsuited for growing alfalfa; that said land was not leveled nor bordered, and that it was necessary to do such work before planting; that such leveling and bordering would cost about $1,000; that the area of said land was not more than 26 acres; that said defendant at the time of the purchase, falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff Elvira Kane, with intent to deceive her by said representations, and with knowledge of their falsity and to induce her to make the contract for the purchase of the land, that the tract of land in question contained more than 29 acres, and was suitable for growing alfalfa, and would produce abundant crops of alfalfa; that said land was free from alkali; that all of said land was ready for planting, except that it had to be bordered, which would cost about $100.

[1-3] As we have stated, these findings are supported by the record. Also, the trial judge viewed the premises before making his findings with reference to the condition of the land. Appellants contend that some of the representations therein set forth are mere matters of opinion, and do not permit of a rescission of the contract. We shall not take time to discuss each representation separately. It has been held that a judgment such as this may rest upon any one material representation which is false. Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 98 P. 1047; Thomas v. Hacker, 179 Cal. 731, 178 P. 855. In Scott v. Delta Land, etc., Co., 57 Cal. App. 320, 207 P. 389, the court, after citing the foregoing authorities, holds that representations as to the productive quality of the soil, if they furnished an inducement to the vendees to enter into the contract made by them, would afford ground upon which to base a rescission when their falsity was established. It has been held that a misrepresentation as to the quantity of land is sufficient to warrant a rescission. Fox v. Robinson, 18 Cal. App. 585, 123 P. 813; Quarg v. Scher, 136 Cal. 406, 69 P. 96.

[4] Appellants assert that no damages were shown. There was testimony that plaintiffs received about three acres of land less than the acreage represented by defendants; that if a portion of a tract of this size was impregnated with alkali, it would reduce the sale value of the land $50 or $60 an acre. It is not essential to the right to rescind a contract for the purchase of property that the purchaser should be able to show that the property purchased was worth less than he paid for it. It is enough that he was induced by false representations to buy property which, if the representations had been true, would have been worth more than it actually was worth. Davis v. Butler, supra.

[5, 6] There is no finding as to the value of the use and occupation of the land during the time plaintiffs had possession of it, and no evidence in the record upon this question, and appellants are urging their right to an allowance upon this item. In support of their right they cite the case of Montgomery v. Meyerstein, 186 Cal. 459, 465, 199 P. 800. Respondent replies to this contention by stating that, although the evidence showed, without contradiction, that about $800 had been expended by plaintiffs in an effort to cultivate the land, the trial court found that only $100 had been so spent, and therefore must have allowed $700 for the use and occupation of the land. Apart from the fact that there is nothing in the record to indicate that such a position was taken by the trial court, we are also confronted with the discrepancy between the findings and the judgment with reference to this matter. The finding is that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the $1,000 paid upon the purchase price of the land and also $100 expended in its cultivation, but the judgment, perhaps through inadvertence, is for $1,800. These portions of the record must be harmonized with each other. We might correct the judgment to make it conform to the findings, but we are powerless to make a finding of fact as to the value of the use and occupation of the land. It is also to be observed that the plaintiff is entitled to recover interest upon the amount paid by her under the contract, and this amount should enter into the calculations to be set forth in the findings.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to receive evidence solely upon the question of the value of the use and occupation of the land, and make a finding upon the same and upon the amount of interest due upon money paid by plaintiff, and then enter judgment in accordance with the findings. It is so ordered, and also that each party to this appeal shall bear his own costs.

1. Appeal and error ⟸1170(3)—Technical error, if any, in overruling demurrer to complaint, disregarded where no miscarriage of justice.

In action for specific performance of contract for exchange of real property, although pleadings should have been more specific about value of defendant's house, so as to demonstrate that the transaction was fair and equitable to defendant, but proof showed that respective values of properties were such as to make exchange fair, the Court of Appeal was constrained, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, to disregard technical error, if any, in overruling defendant's demurrer to complaint; it appearing from entire record there was no miscarriage of justice.

2. Escrows ⟸9—Party waiving time limit, cannot repudiate arbitrarily thereafter, where other party has completed its part.

In an action for specific performance of contract for exchange of real properties, an escrow agreement of April 6th limited time of performance to 30 days, but contained a clause extending the period in the event the conditions were not completed within the time specified. On September 5th, after continuous negotiations, defendant notified the escrow holders that she would not complete the exchange. Held, that defendant, having waived the time limit, could not arbitrarily cancel the agreement thereafter, the plaintiff having completely performed everything required on her part.

3. Husband and wife ⟸267(9)—Husband estopped from claiming that he should not convey community property where wife signed contract with his consent.

Where a wife, with husband's approval and consent, signed contract for exchange of real property with plaintiff, and her husband subsequently signed her name and appended his initials to instructions under an escrow agreement, and took an active part in negotiations, held, in an action against the husband and wife for specific performance, that the husband was estopped from claiming that, because he did not sign the original contract, and the property, although in his wife's name, was community property, he should not be bound to convey.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Rose A. Parry against Amy I. Campbell and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Douglas L. Edmonds, Louis F. Labarere, and John A. Cronin, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

James F. McBryde and Eugene J. Wix, both of Glendale, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is taken by the defendants from a judgment against them enforcing specific performance of an agreement between them and plaintiff for the exchange of real property.

After a careful reading of a lengthy transcript upon appeal, it has become evident that there is ample evidence to support the findings of the court, and we shall state the facts as found by the trial court: On April 6, 1922, defendant Amy I. Campbell, with the authorization, knowledge, consent, advice, and approval of her husband, defendant W. A. Campbell, entered into an agreement with plaintiff by which she was to exchange a house in Los Angeles county for a certain ranch in Riverside county belonging to plaintiff. The terms of the exchange were clear and definite. The house was to be free and clear of all incumbrances, except a mortgage of $3,000, and the ranch was to be free and clear of incumbrances, save and except a first mortgage of $3,500 and a second mortgage of $7,250, to be given by Amy Campbell to plaintiff as a part of the purchase price of said ranch. An escrow agreement was entered into, the Glendale State Bank to act as escrow holder and to carry out the instructions of both parties with reference to the several matters and things to be done before the trade could be consummated. The details of the escrow agreement are set forth in the findings, but the enumeration of them here would only serve to lengthen and complicate this opinion. It is sufficient to say that plaintiff did everything required of her under the agreement and placed the bank in a position where it could consummate the trade. A deed from plaintiff to defendant, conveying the title to the ranch, was in the hands of the bank, but before delivering and recording the same the bank was to use funds in its possession under the escrow agreement to pay off an incumbrance against the property. In the meantime defendants had taken possession of the ranch and lived upon it for several months, and had placed plaintiff in possession of the house to be transferred to her. On September 5, 1922, defendant Amy I. Campbell notified the bank to return her papers and that she would not go on with the exchange. The two days preceding September 5th had been holidays at the bank, and this fact, together with the rush of business, had prevented the bank from consummating the trade before September 5th, although everything required of plaintiff had been done by her prior to that time. As this situation involves one of the "storm centers" of the appeal, we repeat the finding of the court with relation to it:

"That prior to September 5, 1922, and at all times thereafter and at all times mentioned in said complaint the plaintiff was ready and willing to perform and did tender and cause to be tendered to the defendant Amy I. Campbell the papers, instruments and money on her part to be performed, and that the said bank had the necessary papers but was not given sufficient time to complete its work by said defendants, all of which was without the fault of the plaintiff, and that the defendant had presented the papers to the said bank, but that said bank did not have sufficient time to complete the instructions as given by said defendants, all of which was without the fault of the plaintiff, and that it is true that, if the said bank had not been stopped on September 5, 1922, it could have completed its work and shown the Perris Valley ranch free and clear of incumbrances except such as were set forth in the instructions, and that the bank had other instructions and moneys in additional escrows that, if this escrow between Parry and Campbell had not been stopped, would have allowed the said bank to complete all of the instructions of both the plaintiff and defendants."

It is further found that there was no misrepresentation, concealment, circumvention, fraud, or unfair practices upon the part of the plaintiff in securing defendant's consent to the contract between them, and that the estimated values of the respective properties for the purpose of trade were fair and equitable.

The first contention of appellants is that their demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, because the complaint does not allege sufficient facts to show that the consideration for defendant's agreement was adequate and that the contract was in all respects just and reasonable as to the defendant. The rule is unquestioned; our concern is with its application in the instant case. The complaint sets forth the agreement of the parties and embodies the escrow instructions to the bank. They indicate that defendant's house was to be valued at $8,000, and was to be deeded to plaintiff, subject to an incumbrance of $3,000, and in exchange therefor defendant was to receive the ranch, subject to a mortgage for $3,500, and to give to plaintiff a second mortgage upon said ranch in the sum of $7,250. The complaint also alleges:

"That the property agreed to be exchanged by plaintiff to defendant Amy I. Campbell, to wit, the ranch hereinbefore described, is of the value of $15,750 and upwards, and that the said exchange of property is a fair and just exchange, and that the said exchange is a fair and equitable and just deal, particularly in so far as it concerns the defendant Amy I. Campbell, and that the terms of said exchange, particularly in so far as they affect the defendant Amy I. Campbell, are fair, just, and equitable, and that all the consideration, terms, and conditions of the agreement of exchange are fair, just and equitable."

[1] While it is true, perhaps, that under some decisions this pleading should have been more specific about the actual value of defendant's house, so as to demonstrate that the transaction was fair and equitable to defendant, nevertheless the proof shows conclusively that the value of the house and the value of the ranch were such as to make the exchange fair and equitable, and, even though technical error may have been committed in overruling the demurrer, in the light of the entire record before us, there has been no miscarriage of justice, and we are constrained, therefore, under section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution, to disregard such error, if error there was. Baker v. Miller, 190 Cal. 263, 212 P. 11.

[2] It is contended that because the bank, through stress of business and because of intervening holidays, had not actually completed the details of the transfer by September 5, 1922, and as more than 30 days had elapsed from the date of the escrow instructions, the defendant had the right, upon that date, to decline to proceed with the exchange. This position is built upon the statement in the escrow instructions (following an enumeration of the documents handed to the bank) as follows:

"All of which you are authorized to use, provided you can hold for me within 30 days from date a certificate of title made by the Title Guarantee & Trust Company on the following described property:" (Describing the house owned by defendants.)

However, the same document contains the following clause:

"In the event the conditions of this escrow have not been complied with at the expiration of the time provided for herein, you are instructed to complete the same, at the earliest possible date thereafter, unless I shall have made written demand upon you for the return of the money and instruments deposited by me."

This latter clause is repeated by defendant in her letter of instructions to the bank, which was dated April 6, 1922. Difficulties were encountered in consummating the exchange, and the parties sent amended instructions to the bank from time to time. As late as August 14, 1922, Mrs. Campbell wrote to the bank returning to it, unsigned, a note and mortgage which had been sent to her for her signature, and stating that she desired some other arrangement. It is apparent, therefore, that she waived the 30-day limitation, and that she had no right to arbitrarily cancel the agreement on September 5th, when the other party had completely performed the same. As the trial court found, the delay on the part of the bank was without fault on the part of plaintiff who had done everything required of her, and the bank was as much the agent of defendants as of the plaintiff in this matter. Upon this question the trial court found:

"That while it is true that the escrow was not completed within 30 days, according to the terms of the original contract, it is true, and the court so finds, that the time within which said contract was to be completed was continued indefinitely by reason of another provision of the contract contained in the escrow instructions (quoting the provision hereinbefore set forth). That it is true the parties by consent permitted the period within which each was to perform, to continue indefinitely and, until September 5, 1922, when defendant notified the escrow agent of her conclusion to cancel said contract, and that the same was then and there terminated. That it is true that no opportunity was given plaintiff by defendants to perform after the period for performance had been extended and had become indefinite; that under the circumstances, the time that has elapsed was not unreasonable."

[3] The only other point urged upon the appeal is that the defendant W. A. Campbell, who is the husband of Amy I. Campbell, should not be bound to convey this property because he did not sign the contract, and the property, while standing of record in the name of the wife, is shown by the testimony to be community property. Under the facts of the case, this defendant is estopped to set up such a claim. It is true he did not sign the original contract, but the testimony shows, and the finding of the court was, that it was signed by his wife, after consultation with him, and with his entire consent and approval, and he signed his wife's name and appended his own initials to some of the supplemental instructions sent to the bank. Under the circumstances of this case, it was not necessary for his contract to have been in writing, because the plaintiff was given possession of the house, and both defendants went into possession of plaintiff's property. For months W. A. Campbell acquiesced in this situation, and took an active part in the negotiations with the bank over the completion of the transaction. Under such circumstances, the court had power to decree specific performance against him had he been the sole owner of the property.

The judgment is affirmed.

PARRY v. CAMPBELL et al. (Civ. 5233.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 25, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 23, 1925.)

Exceptions, bill of ⊂=39(1)—Statutory limitation of time for presentation of bill of exceptions applicable although bill presented to clerk instead of judge personally.

The provision under Code Civ. Proc. § 650, that a proposed bill of exceptions and amendments must be presented within 10 days after service of the proposed amendments to the judge who tried the case, upon 5 days' notice to adverse party, applies equally where the bill of exceptions and amendments thereto are presented to the clerk for the judge instead of to the judge personally.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Rose A. Parry against Amy I. Campbell and another for specific performance of a contract for exchange of real property. From an order appointing a receiver, defendants appeal. Dismissed.

Douglas L. Edmonds, Louis F. Labarere, and John A. Cronin, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

James F. McBryde and Eugene J. Wix, both of Glendale, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order appointing a receiver to take charge of certain properties, and collect the rents, issues, and profits thereof, pending an appeal in an action between the same parties arising out of an alleged breach of contract of exchange of said properties, which appeal has this day been decided by this court and the judgment affirmed. Parry v. Campbell, 238 P. 127, numbered 5185 of the records of this court.

The plaintiff and respondent has made a motion to strike the transcript from the files and a motion to dismiss the appeal. The ground for these motions is that the bill of exceptions, which constitutes the transcript upon appeal, was not prepared, proposed, served, or presented to the clerk or the court or counsel within the time allowed by law, nor was proper notice of the time of settlement given counsel. These objections were made by plaintiff and respondent, who appeared specially for this purpose at the hearing in the trial court when the bill of exceptions was settled and allowed, and the trial court held that the law does not require the presentation of said proposed bill of exceptions or of said proposed amendments thereto within 10 days after service of said proposed amendments to said proposed bill of exceptions, and does not require the giving of 5 days' notice to the adverse party of the time of said settlement, when the bill of exceptions and amendments thereto are presented to the clerk for the judge who tried the case instead of to the judge personally, and the bill of exceptions was settled and allowed.

We are unable to find authority for the distinction above made and the Code of Civil Procedure (section 650) does not express it. The language pertinent here is as follows:

"The proposed bill and amendments must, within ten days thereafter [after service of proposed amendments], be presented by the party seeking the settlement of the bill, to the judge who tried or heard the case, upon five days' notice to the adverse party, or be delivered to the clerk of the court for the judge."

The limitation as to time seems to apply as well to a delivery to the clerk for the judge as to a delivery to the judge himself, and, as we have stated, we are unable to find any authorities construing the section otherwise. That being true, the appellant had no right to have his bill of exceptions settled after the expiration of the time mentioned in the Code. It is said, in Moultrie v. Tarpio, 147 Cal. 376, 81 P. 1112, with reference to the foregoing language of the Code:

"Compliance with this requirement is essential to the right of a party to have his bill of exceptions settled, and if he fails to so comply, his right is gone, unless he be relieved from the effect of such failure by the trial court under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

The motion to strike the transcript from the files is granted. It follows that the appeal must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

DODD v. MADDOX et al. (Civ. 2851.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 19, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 16, 1925.)

1. Mechanics' Liens ⊂=313—Bond to secure performance of building contract binding on surety, though plans and specifications forming part of contract not filed with county recorder.

A bond given to secure the performance of a building contract is binding upon the sureties in action by assignee of materialmen, despite the fact that the plans and specifications forming a part of the contract were not filed with the county recorder.

2. Mechanics' liens ⊂=313, 315—Failure to file contractor's bond before commencement of work does not invalidate contract or release sureties.

Failure to file a contractor's bond before commencement of the work does not invalidate the contract or relieve the sureties of liability for claims of materialmen.

3. Mechanics' liens ⟸315—Part payment by owner to assignee of materialmen held not to prejudice sureties or relieve them from their obligations on contractor's bond.

Where owners of property made part payment to assignee of claims of materialmen, such payment did not prejudice sureties, or relieve them of their obligations on the contractor's bond, but merely relieved them to the extent of the sum paid by the owner, Civ. Code, §§ 2845, 2849, 2850, relative to rights of sureties, being inapplicable.

4. Mechanics' liens ⟸313—Fact bond was not given in proper amount and not filed held not to prevent materialmen from prosecuting personal action to recover on bond.

That a contractor's bond was not given in the proper amount, and that filings were not had so as to protect owners from liens under provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, does not prevent materialmen from prosecuting their personal action to recover upon the bond.

5. Mechanics' liens ⟸315—Invalidity of construction contract as between parties because not recorded as required by law does not relieve sureties on bond of contractor from liability.

Invalidity of construction contract as between parties because not recorded as required by law does not relieve sureties on bond of contractor from liability to materialmen.

6. Mechanics' liens ⟸315—Assignee of materialmen may maintain action against sureties on contractor's bond, irrespective of filing of liens on building.

Plaintiff assignee of materialmen, furnishing materials which were used in construction of building, may maintain an action against the sureties on the contractor's bond, given to secure performance of building contract, irrespective of filing or nonfiling of liens against building, such proceeding being merely a cumulative remedy.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by R. H. Dodd against Everett Maddox, Mary M. Emerson, executrix of the last will and testament of T. F. Emerson, deceased, and W. C. Ramsey. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, and Frank W. Sawyer, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Stephen N. Blewett and Cecil S. Johnson, both of Stockton, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff brought this action as the assignee of certain materialmen, to recover upon a builder's bond given for the benefit of the owners, and also, for all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the work described in the contract referred to in said bond, at the request of the contractor therein named. The bond also provided that it should inure to the benefit of all persons performing labor or furnishing materials to be used in the work contracted to be performed; that recovery might be had upon said bond in any suit brought to foreclose liens on the premises, and also that an independent or separate action might be brought to recover on the bond. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendants appeal.

It appears from the transcript that the total amount of the assigned claims aggregated the sum of $2,118.37, no part of which was paid by the contractor; that after the claims had been assigned to the plaintiff, the owners, out of the sum of $1,220 remaining in their hands, and being the unpaid balance on the contract price, paid to the plaintiff the sum of $900, and retained in their hands the sum of $320 to protect themselves against liens and asserted claims of others than the assignors of the plaintiff herein. The action is prosecuted for the remainder due on the assigned claims, to wit, $1,218.37.

The bond sued upon is in the following words and figures, to wit:

"Contractor's and Builder's Bond.

"Know all men by these presents: That Everett Maddox and T. F. Emerson and W. C. Ramsey, as sureties, are held and firmly bound unto Ward L. and Olive Jones in the sum of seventeen hundred ($1,700.00) dollars of the United States (which sum is an amount equal to at least fifty per cent. [50%] of the contract price named in the contract hereinafter referred to), to be paid to the said Ward L. and Olive F. Jones and any and all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the work described in said contract at the request of the contractor named therein, or any person acting for him, or by his authority, and to their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, for which payment well and truly to be made we bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators by these presents.

"Dated the 14th day of July, 1922.

"The condition of the above obligation is such that

"Whereas, on the 14th day of July, 1922, the above named principal, Everett Maddox, as contractor, entered into a written agreement with said Ward L. and Olive F. Jones as owner, for the erection of a building on that certain lot of land situated in the oaks lot 18, block 12, which contract is hereby referred to and made a part hereof.

"Now, therefore, in addition to any and all conditions for the performance of the contract above mentioned, this bond is also conditioned for the payment in full of the claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the work described in said contract, or in performing said contract, and shall inure to the benefit of any and all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the work described in said contract, so as to give such persons a right of action to recover upon this bond in any suit brought to foreclose the liens provided for in chapter II of title IV, part III, of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, or in a separate suit brought on this bond.

"And now, therefore, further, if Everett Maddox, the said contractor, shall faithfully perform said contract according to its terms, covenants, and conditions, and shall also pay in full the claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the work described in said contract, then this obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect. Everett Maddox,
"Principal.
"T. F. Emerson,
"W. C. Ramsey,
"Sureties."

[1, 2] Although stated as 50 per cent. of the contract price, an error was made in computation, and the bond was given for a sum slightly less than one-half of the contract price of the building. This, however, does not affect any of the questions tendered for decision here, for the reason that the action is not prosecuted by the owners, and no question of limiting the amount of claims or liens to be paid by the owners is involved in this case. The suit is by materialmen, through the agency of their assignee. It also appears from the contract that there was a failure to file the plans and specifications and bond within the time prescribed by the codes, and this objection is urged by appellant as a reason for reversal herein. However, these questions have been decided adversely to appellant's contention, and we need not further consider the same than to refer to the decisions of the Supreme court relating thereto. A bond given by a contractor to the owner of a building, guaranteeing performance of the contract according to the conditions thereof, is valid and binding upon the sureties, notwithstanding the plans and specifications forming a part of the building contract were not filed with the county recorder. Blyth v. Robinson, 104 Cal. 239, 37 P. 904; McMenomy v. White, 115 Cal. 339, 47 P. 109. Likewise, it is held that the failure to file the contractor's bond before the work was commenced does not invalidate the contract or relieve the sureties. Hollenbeck-Bush P. Mill Co. v. Amweg, 177 Cal. 160, 170 P. 148; Hammond Lumber Co. v. Willis, 171 Cal. 565, 153 P. 947.

[3] It is also argued that the payment by the owners of the sum of $900 to the plaintiff in this action, after the claims of materialmen had been assigned to him, prejudiced the sureties, and therefore relieved them from their obligations. We see nothing of merit in this contention. The payment of the sum of $900 by the owners, instead of prejudicing the sureties, relieved them to that extent, and instead of being sued for the total sum of the bond, the action was prosecuted against them to recover only the sum of $1,218.37. Our attention is also called to sections 2845, 2849, and 2850 of the Civil Code, but these sections are not applicable to this case. No attempt was made in this case to require the creditors to proceed other than as the action was prosecuted. The principal on the bond in this case was made a party to the action. There is nothing in the case which involves section 2849 of the Civil Code, relating to a surety being entitled to the benefit of every security for the performance of the principal's obligations. It does appear, however, that the surety had the benefit of the payment of the sum of said $900, on account of the claims for materials furnished, held by the plaintiff.

[4, 5] The fact that the bond was not given in the proper amount, and that the filings were not had so as to protect the owners, under the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in that materialmen might have enforced liens against the property of the owners, does not prevent the materialmen from prosecuting their personal action to recover upon the bond. Palmer v. White, 70 Cal. 220, 11 P. 647. It is also held that the fact that a construction contract is invalid as between the parties, because not recorded, as required by law, does not relieve the sureties on the bond of the contractor from liability. Watterson v. Owens River Canal Co., 25 Cal. App. 247, 143 P. 90.

[6] The appellants herein rely upon the case of Hubbard v. Jurian, 35 Cal. App. 757, 170 P. 1093, and other cases announcing and following the rule therein set forth. The case of Hubbard v. Jurian and others, covering the same interpretation of bonds such as involved herein, cannot, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in General Electric Co. v. Amr. Bonding Co., 180 Cal. 675, 182 P. 444, longer be considered as authority upon the points here involved.

The facts before us are, in principle, practically identical with the issues determined in the General Electric Company Case. After setting forth the fact that the action might be had upon the bond to recover in any suit to foreclose liens, or upon a separate suit upon the bond, as provided for herein, and also further stating that the record showed that no liens had been filed, the Supreme Court considers the ruling had in Hubbard v. Jurian and other cases, and holds as follows:

"We are of the opinion that the cited cases were improperly decided so far as they held that a bond like the one before us is incapable of enforcement unless the claimants seeking to bind the sureties have filed their liens within the prescribed time."

In the case at bar no liens were filed. In the General Electric Company Case no liens were filed. The provisions of the two bonds are identical, and it therefore follows that the opinion of the Supreme Court, to which we are referring, is controlling, and it must be held, in accordance therewith, that the plaintiff in this case, as the assignee of the materialmen furnishing materials which went into and were used in the construction of the building contemplated to be erected, and for the performance of which the sureties executed the bond here set forth, may maintain this action against the sureties, irrespective of the filing or nonfiling of liens against the building. As has been said in several cases, this proceeding is a cumulative remedy. The following cases have also followed the rule laid down in the General Electric Company Case, supra; Purington v. Olsten, 45 Cal. App. 621, 188 P. 288; Crocker Wheeler Co. v. American Bonding Co. of Baltimore, 45 Cal. App. 793, 187 P. 928; Standard Iron Works v. Maryland C. Co., 56 Cal. App. 601, 206 P. 136.

The judgment of the trial court is hereby affirmed.

GALLETTA v. JUSTICE COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 5223.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 2, 1925. Rehearing Denied July 1, 1925.)

1. Dismissal and nonsuit ⟸81(2)—Superior court may vacate order of dismissal inadvertently or improvidently made.

Superior court has jurisdiction, in proper case, to vacate order of dismissal on notice within 6 months from entry thereof, if inadvertently or improvidently made, and such order is not void, though erroneous on facts, and such relief may be had by one in whose favor order was made.

2. Evidence ⟸82—Validity of order vacating order of dismissal presumed.

Every presumption is in favor of validity of order vacating order of dismissal, and any state of facts consistent with its validity will be presumed as against one which will defeat it.

3. Justices of the peace ⟸166(4)—Writ to quash execution on justice's court judgment in action dismissed by superior court on appeal denied after subsequent vacation of order of dismissal.

Mandamus to justice's court to recall and quash execution on judgment in action dismissed by superior court on appeal will be denied after subsequent vacation of order and dismissal of appeal, as involving collateral attack on orders of superior court, which record does not show were void, where facts presented or those on which court acted in vacating order are not shown.

Petition by A. Galletta for writ of mandate to the Justice Court of the City and County of San Francisco to recall and quash execution on judgment for Felix Lehman against petitioner. Writ denied.

H. Slikerman, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

M. H. Hernan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. Petition by A. Galletta for a writ of mandate to the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco, to recall and quash an execution issued from that court.

An action was brought by respondent, Felix Lehman, against petitioner in said justice's court to recover the sum of $100. Judgment therefor was entered during the year 1915, and petitioner appealed therefrom on questions of law and fact to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Thereafter no action by either party was taken in the superior court until July 24, 1924, when respondent, Lehman, moved to dismiss the appeal under the provisions of section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure, upon which motion the court made and on November 6, 1924, entered its order and judgment dismissing the action; whereupon respondent on November 21, 1924, moved the court, on due notice to petitioner, for its order vacating the previous order and judgment, and for its order dismissing the appeal in accordance with the motion originally made, on the ground that the first order, in dismissing the action, had been inadvertently made by the court. After hearing, the court vacated the original order, restored the original motion to its calendar, and, after further consideration, made and entered, on January 5, 1925, its order dismissing the appeal; whereupon, pursuant to section 982, Code of Civil Procedure, the papers in the case were returned and filed in the justice's court, execution issued therefrom, and motion made by petitioner therein for the order of the justice court recalling and quashing the execution, which motion was denied. In the meantime—the exact date not appearing from the record, but apparently later than the date of the original order—petitioner filed in said superior court his motion to dismiss the action under the provisions of section 581, Code of Civil Procedure, for want of prosecution by respondent, which motion was presented on January 5, 1925, and by the court denied by and as a part of its order last mentioned dismissing the appeal.

Petitioner contends that the superior court, upon the making and entry of its order dismissing the action, thereby lost jurisdiction of the case, and that its subsequent orders vacating its original order and dismissing the appeal were void, that no judgment existed after the making of the original order dismissing the action on which the execution might issue, and that it was and is the duty of the justice's court to recall and quash the execution. Petitioner does not contend that the superior court would have been without jurisdiction to dismiss the appeal in the first instance, or that the facts on which the motion therefor was based were not sufficient to justify such action under the provisions of section 981a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The record does not show the facts presented or on which the superior court acted in vacating its original order dismissing the action.

[1] The court had jurisdiction in a proper case, upon notice, and within 6 months from the entry of the original order of dismissal, to vacate such order if inadvertently or improvidently made, and such order, although erroneous on the facts, was not void, and such relief might be had by one in whose favor the order was made. Wolters v. Rossi, 126 Cal. 644, 59 P. 143; Consolidated Construcion Co. v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 184 Cal. 244, 193 P. 238; Wiggin v. Sup. Ct., 68 Cal. 398, 9 P. 646; Brackett v. Banegas, 99 Cal. 623, 34 P. 344.

[2] Every presumption is in favor of the validity of the order vacating the order of dismissal, and any condition of facts consistent with its validity will be presumed to have existed, rather than one which will defeat it. Canadian, etc., Co. v. Clarita Land and Imp. Co., 140 Cal. 672, 74 P. 301.

[3] The proceeding before us is in effect a collateral attack upon the orders of the superior court which were not, so far as shown by the record, void. Wiggin v. Sup. Ct., 68 Cal. 398, 9 P. 646; Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) § 312; Frey v. Sup. Ct., 22 Cal. App. 421, 134 P. 733.

For the foregoing reasons the writ is denied.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

WEATHERBEE v. SINN et al. (Civ. 5118.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 2, 1925.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟸187—Time not essential, though originally of essence, where defaults are subsequently waived.

Time, originally of essence of contract, ceases to be essential, where defaults are subsequently waived, and becomes material thereafter only if vendor again makes it essential by proper notice and demand.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟸187—Vendor's acceptance of past-due payments does not eliminate provisions as to future occurrences.

Vendor's acceptance of past-due payments waives all past defaults in performance, but does not eliminate, as to future occurrences, provisions making time of essence, releasing vendor from obligation to convey if vendee fails to comply with terms, and forfeiting payments already made in such case; only effect as to future being to give vendee reasonable time after the payment to perform his part of contract.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⟸317—Reasonable time for performance after waiver of vendee's default primarily fact question for trial court.

Reasonable time for performance after waiver of vendee's default depends on circumstances of each case and is primarily fact question for trial court.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⟸215—Vendees' assignee could not complain of insufficiency of notice of termination of contract, where action to quiet title was dismissed as to vendor, which received all payments made for want of service.

Defaulting vendees' assignee cannot complain that notice to vendees terminating contract was unreasonable as to time, where corporate vendor, which alone received all payments made under contract, was never served in assignee's action to quiet title and action was dismissed as to it.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⟸231(15)—Vendees' acknowledgment of recorded contract, insufficient to give vendor's successors constructive notice.

Acknowledgment of contract by vendees alone is insufficient to give vendor's successors constructive notice which would otherwise result from recordation thereof after proper acknowledgment by vendor.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⟸215—Equities held not with assignee of vendees in default as against subsequent purchasers.

Where vendees were in possession of and lived on improved premises for over five years, paid only small monthly rental, to which contract provided that payments should be applied in case of default, and made no attempt to comply with contract for several months after receiving notice of termination, equities were not with their assignee as against subsequent purchasers in latter's suit to quiet title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by J. B. Weatherbee against Fred Sinn and others, in which named defendant filed cross-complaint. From a judgment for defendants and cross-complainant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Drew, of Fresno, for appellant.
Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action to quiet title to certain lands.

The complaint contains two counts—the first being one to quiet title, the other to recover the sum of $600, as money paid on the contract to purchase certain real property. The facts are as follows: On or about the 12th day of June, 1916, Ewing, McDaniel & Meux, a corporation, entered into an agreement with A. P. Weatherbee and R. S. Weatherbee, assignors of plaintiff herein for the sale and purchase of an acre of land described as lot 6 of Woodrow Acre, Fresno county, Cal. The corporation agreed to sell, and the Weatherbees agreed to buy, the land and improvements thereon for the sum of $1,250. The contract required the payment of $25 upon the execution of the instrument, and the balance of the purchase price at the rate of $15 per month, payments to first apply upon interest and the balance upon principal; it also required the vendees to pay all taxes and assessments which might become due upon the property from the date thereof. It contained a provision that, in the event of failure on the part of the vendees to comply with its terms, the vendor could be released from all obligations in law and equity to convey the property, the vendees to waive all rights thereunder, and all money paid thereon to be considered as liquidated damages for the nonfulfillment thereof, the moneys received by the vendor to be applied as a reasonable rental for the use and occupancy of the said premises.

Time was declared to be of the essence of the contract. The vendees went into possession and payments were made by them at irregular intervals; the last being on May 16, 1921. At this time the Weatherbees were delinquent in an amount of $242.60, and, after application of the payments to the interest, the unpaid portion of the principal was the sum of $1,001.68 or thereabout, and none of the taxes for the year 1921 were paid by the vendees. On August 26, 1921, and after the vendees had been in actual occupancy of the premises for a period of over 5 years, and about the time they had abandoned their possession, a communication was sent to each of them by the company notifying them of their noncompliance with the terms of the contract. This notice demanded the payment of the amount of which the vendees were in default by September 1st following and advised them that, unless the amount was then paid, the company would declare the contract terminated and all rights thereunder forfeited. In reply to this communication, R. S. Weatherbee telegraphed the company asking for time to comply with the terms of the demand. No further action in this connection was had between the parties except that plaintiff made a tender some several months thereafter, a matter hereinafter referred to, and, the vendees having failed to make the payment, the corporation on October 4, 1921, conveyed the title of the property to defendant J. F. Ewing. A few days later, and on October 15, 1921, Ewing and his wife sold the same to one A. D. Becker, who assigned his interest to defendant Sinn, and he subsequently received a deed from the Ewings on December 18, 1921. At the time of these later transactions in relation to the sale of the property, the original agreement between the corporation and the Weatherbees was of record, but its execution was never acknowledged by the vendor corporation. On December 12, 1921, when the purchasers were some 7 months in default under the agreement, and some 3½ months prior to the conveyance of Ewing to Sinn, A. P. Weatherbee and R. S. Weatherbee, by J. B. Weatherbee, plaintiff herein, tendered J. F. Ewing, without knowledge of the sale to Becker, the sum of $310 in cash, being the amount of the principal and interest due up to that time on the original contract. Ewing refused to accept. An attempt was made at the trial to prove that this tender was not made in good faith, but on the contrary that it was made for the sole purpose of laying a foundation for the present action. No finding, however, was made upon this subject.

In the prayer of the amended complaint, plaintiff had asked that he be decreed to be the owner of an equitable interest in the premises, and that his title to the land be quieted, and on his second cause of action that he be repaid the sum of $637.50 for money paid by his predecessor in interest to the said defendants Ewing, McDaniel & Meux, Inc., and to J. F. Ewing, and for the further sum of $500 damages for breach of contract. Defendants Fred Sinn, J. F. Ewing, and Ada Ewing answered the complaint, setting forth that, by reason of the default on the part of the vendees, the contract of sale had been terminated, and defendant Fred Sinn, by cross-complaint, asked that his title to the property be quieted as against the plaintiff.

No service of summons was ever made upon the defendant Ewing, McDaniel & Meux, Inc., nor was any appearance made by the corporation and as to it the action was dismissed.

Under the facts as above narrated, the court found in effect, among other things, that plaintiff did not have any title or interest in an equity in the property. It further found that plaintiff's assignors were in default in the payment of installments due under the contract, and that they had forfeited all their rights thereunder. Additional findings were to the effect that at the time defendant Sinn took his conveyance he had no notice or knowledge of the contract of the Weatherbees nor of any claim by them to the property, or by any person claiming under them.

The findings being in favor of defendants and cross-complainant, the court rendered judgment to the effect that the action be dismissed as to the corporation (it never having been served) and that plaintiff take nothing, and that the title to the defendant Fred Sinn be quieted in the property as against plaintiff.

It is here claimed that the evidence fails to support the findings, and the notice attempting to terminate the contract between the corporation and the Weatherbees is insufficient in form and effect to support the finding that the contract was terminated for the reason that it was inadequate and unreasonable in length of time of service. In support of this contention it is argued that, where time is made of the essence of the contract with reference to payments under contracts of the character here involved, and this covenant has been waived by the acceptance of money after it is due, such conduct will be regarded as creating such a temporary suspension of the right of forfeiture as can only be restored by giving a definite and specific notice of an intention to enforce it.

[1] It is true that where time is originally of the essence of a contract, and defaults have been subsequently waived, time ceases to be essential and becomes only material thereafter until the vendor again makes it essential by a proper notice and demand. Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 P. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126; Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 P. 751.

[2] The acceptance by the vendor of past-due payments waives all past defaults in performance, but does not alter the terms of the contract with regard to the future or eliminate as to future occurrences provisions that time is of its essence, that if the vendee fails to comply with its terms the vendor shall be released from all obligation to convey, and that payments already made shall be forfeited by such failure; its only effect as to the future is to give the vendee a reasonable time after the payment within which to perform his part of the contract. Hoppin v. Munsey, 185 Cal. 678, 198 P. 398.

[3] In such a case the question as to what is a reasonable time for performance after waiver of default on the part of the vendee depends upon the circumstance of each particular case, and is primarily a question of fact for the determination of the trial court. Id.

[4] Even if we assume that the notice here involved was insufficient as being unreasonable as to time, still we fail to see how plaintiff is in any manner benefited thereby. The corporation alone received all the payments that had been made under the contract, but it was never served, and the action against it was dismissed, and it is in no manner affected by the judgment.

[5] The trial court found that defendant Sinn had no notice whatever of the rights of the Weatherbees in the property. True it appeared that they had placed their agreement upon record, but its execution had never been acknowledged by the vendor corporation, and it constituted therefore no constructive notice to any one claiming under the vendor. An acknowledgment by the vendees alone under a contract of purchase of real property is insufficient to give the successors of the vendor the constructive notice which would otherwise result from the recordation thereof after proper acknowledgment by the vendor. Keese v. Beardsley, 190 Cal. 465, 213 P. 500, 26 A. L. R. 1538; Bell v. Sage, 60 Cal. App. 149, 212 P. 404. We are of the opinion therefore that the finding that defendant Sinn had no notice of the rights of plaintiff's assignors is conclusive against plaintiff herein, and is decisive of the case.

[6] The point is stressed that all the equities are with plaintiff, reference being made to the fact that some $600 had been paid under the contract, which sum was forfeited by the judgment. The equities are certainly not with the plaintiff. Plaintiff's assignors had been in possession and lived upon the premises, which were improved, for a period of over 5 years and the total sum they paid amounted to a very small monthly rental which the contract provided the payments made should be applied to in the event of a default. After receiving their notice, they made no attempt to comply with the contract until several months thereafter. However this may be, as above stated, we are of the opinion that the finding that defendant Sinn had no notice of the rights of plaintiff or his assignors is conclusive so far as the plaintiff is concerned, and whatever rights he may have, if any, are against the corporation and not against the defendants.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOLTHAM v. SAVORY et ux. (Civ. 5059.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 2, 1925.)

1. Evidence ⊂⇒461(1) — Mutual agreement, canceling terms of contract sued on, relating to employment as broker and to another matter, held cancellation of entire agreement, precluding admission of parol testimony to show contrary intent.

Mutual agreement in writing, that all matters, to show that provisions for plaintiff's employment as broker were not canceled, were fully settled and adjusted, and contract "hereby canceled by mutual consent of said parties hereto," held to have canceled whole contract, and parol evidence was not admissible to show contrary intent, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1638, 1639.

2. Evidence ⊂⇒461(1)—When parol evidence is admissible in connection with a written instrument stated.

Where language used in a contract is ambiguous or fairly susceptible of either one of two interpretations contended for by the parties, parol evidence is admissible to construe the contract according to the true intent of the parties at the time of its execution.

3. Reformation of instruments ⟸1—Remedy of party desiring to sue on one part of agreement, whole of which by mistake was canceled, held suit to reform cancellation.

Remedy of party desiring to sue on one part of agreement, whole of which by mistake was canceled, held suit to reform the cancellation.

4. Brokers ⟸43(2)—Broker could not prevail, in absence of some memorandum in writing subscribed by party sought to be held or his agent.

In broker's action to recover commissions, broker could not prevail, in absence of some note or memorandum in writing, subscribed by defendant or his agent, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 6.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by Mollie J. Holtham against George E. Savory and wife. From an adverse judgment and from an order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Berry & Watson, of Stockton, for appellant.

Thomas W. Forsyth, of San Franscisco, for respondents.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This action is for the recovery of a real estate broker's commission in the sum of $1,500. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment went for the defendants. From this judgment, and the order denying a new trial, the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The facts necessary for a correct understanding of the questions involved on this appeal can be thus briefly stated:

Defendant George E. Savory owned approximately 200 acres of land in San Joaquin county, Cal. Appellant is a duly licensed real estate broker. On January 6, 1923, they entered into the following written contract, to wit:

"Superintendent's Contract.

"Stockton, Calif., Jan. 6, 1923.

"This contract is between George E. Savory, to be known hereafter as the party of the first part, and Mollie J. Holtham, to be known hereafter as the party of the second part.

"The party of the second part is to plant, seed and take off a crop of grain or hay (or plant as otherwise directed) on the Simms ranch of about 110 acres located at Simms Station off the French Camp road and the Murphy ranch of about 90 acres located about 1,800 feet east of same on the same road, the property of the first party.

"When the hay or grain has been taken off, the party of the second part is to plant the same acreage with Egyptian corn as a second crop and to harvest and put the same under shelter or as otherwise directed.

"For the services of the party of the second part, the party of the first part agrees to pay a salary of one hundred and twenty-five dollars ($125) or a Dodge touring car 1916 model valued at $300 and $100 monthly cash. If said party of the second part can rent the buildings on either or both places, said rent shall be placed to the credit of the party of the first part;

"The party of the first part hereby agrees that the Dodge touring car of $300 value may be applied as part payment on a Chevrolet coach car 1923 model and credit same to the credit of the party of the second part said $300, to be deducted from the salary of the party of the second part at the rate of twenty-five dollars ($25) per month, said party of the second part agreeing to pay the balance due on the Chevrolet coach of $834.63 in three payments of three months each to protect the party of the first part.

"The party of the first part places the said properties in the hands of the party of the second part for sale for the period of one year from date at a price to be subject to his approval.

"This contract to expire when ranches are sold or on January 1, 1924.

"[Signed] Geo. E. Savory, Owner.

"[Signed] Mollie J. Holtham, Superintendent."

Soon after the execution of this contract, the plaintiff moved upon the property and took possession thereof, and remained upon the premises until on or about the 26th of August, 1923, when she removed from the land and took up her residence in Modesto, Cal., leaving a caretaker in charge of the ranch.

Some time prior to October 16, 1923, a controversy arose between the plaintiff and defendant, George E. Savory, with reference to the payment of certain bills contracted by plaintiff while on the ranch, and the use and possession by plaintiff of an automobile, mentioned in the foregoing contract, belonging to defendant, George E. Savory. During this time the defendants resided in San Francisco, and plaintiff went to San Francisco and there met the defendants, and they all went to the office of defendants' attorney, and there, in the presence of all parties, the attorney for the defendants wrote on the original contract, and at the end thereof these words:

"October 16, 1923. All matters herein contained are fully settled and adjusted and the foregoing contract is hereby canceled by mutual consent of said parties hereto;"

And the same was then and there signed by both plaintiff, Mollie J. Holtham, and defendant, George E. Savory.

Thereafter, and before January 6, 1924, the ranch was sold to one Paul C. Fisher for $30,000, and plaintiff then brought this action to recover a 5 per cent. commission upon the sale price. Defendants answered, denying all of the allegations of the complaint, and as an affirmative defense, alleged that the said original contract relied upon by plaintiff had been canceled by mutual consent, and pleaded the purported cancellation of October 16, 1923, above set forth. A trial was had; plaintiff took the witness stand in her own behalf, and, after a number of preliminary questions had been propounded to her by her own counsel on direct examination, and after both the original contract and the purported cancellation were placed in evidence, she was asked by her own counsel this question, "Did you have any conversation with Mr. Savory with respect to the sale of the properties on October 16, 1923?" to which an objection was interposed upon the ground that it was "an attempt to alter the terms of a written instrument." Then followed considerable discussion between counsel and the court, and, among other things, the following occurred:

"Mr. Watson: I am only attempting to show the court and explain what the parties understood at that time. It is a well-known fact, and it is elementary, that the acts and circumstances surrounding the facts are admissible to explain an ambiguity; and that is our purpose in offering this evidence, if your honor please.

"The Court: Well, I don't really see anything about it, except cancellation.

"Mr. Watson: That is our case, if your honor please, * * * it is our honest conclusion that the brokerage contract was not canceled, but the superintendent's was. There was nothing in dispute between them, except their mutual accounts, and those were settled. There were two contracts there which ran to separate dates. * * * There was nothing in dispute so far as the brokerage contract was concerned. There wasn't anything earned at that time by the plaintiff. * * * There is absolutely nothing so far as I can glean from the purported cancellation referring to the brokerage contract at all; and the facts and circumstances surrounding bear that contention out. * * * We might just as well have a ruling upon that * * * if your honor holds that it is a cancellation. * * *

"The Court: That is the way it looks now. Everything contained within the four corners of the paper referred to, and it sees no ambiguity; the meaning is clear, distinct, direct, and positive, and it has all the effects and earmarks of a cancellation. I don't know how else it could be effected. Anything further?

"Mr. Watson: It is a question of law.

"The Court: Anything further?

"Mr. Watson: There is no use going any further, if your honor please, and that is the reason we are submitting the issue at the present time.

"The Court: Very well. Judgment for the defendants."

[1] Therefore the sole question for determination on this appeal is: (1) Did the trial court err in holding that the purported cancellation of October 16, 1923, prevented the introduction of parol testimony?

Section 1638 of the Civil Code provides:

"The language of a contract is to govern its interpretation, if the language is clear and explicit, and does not involve an absurdity."

Section 1639 of the same Code provides:

"When a contract is reduced to writing, the intention of the parties is to be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible; subject, however, to the other provisions of this title."

The "other provisions" referred to by this section, however, are not applicable to clear and explicit terms of a contract freely entered into without any attendant circumstances of fraud, mistake, or accident. Halfhill Co. v. Fishermen's Exch., 50 Cal. App. 231, 195 P. 68.

Measuring the wording of the cancellation of October 16, 1923, by the foregoing rules, we see no escape from the conclusion that it is clear, explicit, and unambiguous and only susceptible of one meaning, and that is that the entire contract, with all of its provisions, is cancelled. Indeed, it would be difficult to imagine the use of more apt words to convey this meaning.

[2] The rule contended for by appellant is only applicable where the language used in the contract is ambiguous, or fairly susceptible of either one of two interpretations contended for by the parties, in which event parol evidence is always admissible for the purpose of construing the contract according to the true intent of the parties at the time of its execution. Balfour v. Fresno C. & I. Co., 109 Cal. 221, 41 P. 876; Joy v. Rousseau, (Cal. App.) 236 P. 972. But it is our judgment, as above stated, that the wording of the cancellation contract leaves no room for an application of this rule.

[3] If the contention of appellant be correct, and and it was in fact the intention of the parties to only adjust and settle the superintendent's contract, then appellant's remedy would have been first an appropriate action to reform the cancellation of October 16, 925, but such is not the form of action here resented.

[4] In view of the conclusion that we have reached, that the entire contract was canceled, the other points presented on this appeal become immaterial; for, in the absence of some note or memorandum in writing, subscribed by the respondent, George E. Savory, or his agent, appellant could not prevail in this action. Section 1973, Code Civ. Proc., subd. 6.

It follows, therefore, that the judgment should be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

JAEGER v. JAEGER. (Civ. 5119.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 4, 1925. Rehearing Denied July 3, 1925.)

Divorce ⟸308—Court by order may require payment by father of medical expenses of child of divorced parents incurred prior to entry of such order.

Under Civ. Code, § 138, as amended in 1905, providing that court at any time after divorce may make its order for the custody, care, education, maintenance, and support of minor children of the marriage, a court may by such order provide for the payment by the father for the support of the child prior to the entry of the order as well as thereafter, and an order requiring estate of father to pay for the medical expenses of child incurred prior to entry of order is valid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Lillian Fisk Jaeger against Samuel Allen Jaeger, by James R. Edwards, guardian of his estate. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harry T. Kyle, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

R. M. Barrett, of Santa Rosa (Edgar D. Peixotto, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

CASHIN, J. Respondent, Lillian Fisk Jaeger, was formerly the wife of Samuel Allen Jaeger, an incompetent person, who appears as appellant herein by James R. Edwards, the guardian of his estate. The only issue of the marriage was Pualeilani Jaeger, a minor, whose age at the date of the orders hereinafter mentioned was four years, and of whose person and estate respondent has, since June 23, 1922, been the duly appointed, qualified, and acting guardian. By a final decree of the superior court of Sonoma county, entered on July 27, 1922, the parties were divorced, the grounds therefor being the fault of appellant. The care and custody of said minor by said decree were awarded to respondent. By the decree appellant was ordered to pay to respondent the sum of $100 each month for her support, and for the maintenance, support, and education of the minor the further sum of $30 each month. After the interlocutory decree, and before the entry of the final decree, after proceedings regularly had, appellant was adjudged to be incompetent, and the said James R. Edwards was duly appointed and qualified as the guardian of his estate. Thereafter, during the month of February, 1923, the said minor, due to an attack of tonsilitis, followed by pneumonia, became ill, the condition of illness and convalescence continuing until the month of August, 1923. Her condition made necessary an operation, the employment of physicians and nurses, and the purchase of medicines. On April 13, 1923, the superior court, on application of respondent, and the consent of appellant through his guardian, given in open court, made its order for the payment by appellant of the sum of $66 for the services of nurses for the minor theretofore rendered and made necessary by such illness. The illness continuing, respondent, between the date of said order and the month of August, 1923, procured the services of physicians and nurses, one of said nurses having been employed prior to and paid pursuant to the order made in April, and the furnishing of medicines for the minor, but made no application to the court for orders directing appellant to furnish or pay for such services and medicines until October 29, 1923, after the recovery of the minor. On the date last mentioned respondent filed her petition for the order of the court directing appellant to pay the additional expenses incurred, amounting to the sum of $993.85, alleging that the estate of appellant was ample, that the guardian of his estate had on hand funds sufficient to pay, and, according to the testimony of respondent, that she was without estate, and her earnings, with the amount allowed by the final decree for her support, were not sufficient therefor and for the extraordinary demands due to such illness; that she had borrowed the sum of $518.85, which had by her been paid on account of the expenses incurred, and that of such expenses the sum of $475 remained unpaid, together with the sum so borrowed. The court, after due notice and hearing, made its order directing the guardian to pay to respondent from the estate of appellant in the due course of administration thereof the sum of $993.85, as and for the maintenance and support of the minor, in addition to the monthly payments theretofore ordered. From this order the appeal was taken.

It is not denied by appellant that the services or medicines were necessary, that the charges therefor were reasonable, that the estate of appellant is able to pay, or that had the application been made before the services and medicines were furnished, the court, the necessity appearing, would have had authority to make the order; but contends that the services and medicines having been procured in advance thereof it was without power to make the order appealed from.

We are satisfied that the petition was sufficient to support the order if the court had authority on the facts to grant the relief prayed. The court acted pursuant to the provisions of section 138 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 43), which section, as originally enacted, was as follows:

"In an action for divorce the court may, before or after judgment, give such direction for the custody, care, and education of the children of the marriage as may seem necessary or proper, and may at any time vacate or modify the same."

The section was amended in 1905 to read:

"In actions for divorce the court may, during the pendency of the action, or at the final hearing or at any time thereafter during the minority of any of the children of the marriage, make such order for the custody, care, education, maintenance and support of such minor children as may seem necessary or proper, and may at any time modify or vacate the same."

Prior to the adoption of the codes, the statute (Stats. 1851, p. 187, § 7), authorizing courts to make orders subsequent to judgment for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, provided:

"In any action for a divorce, the court may, during the pendency of the action, or at the final hearing, or afterwards, make such order for the support of the wife, and the maintenance and education of the children of the marriage, as may be just, and may at any time thereafter annul, vary or modify such order, as the interest and welfare of the children may require."

In the case of Wilson v. Wilson, 45 Cal. 399, on appeal from an order of the district court, made pursuant to the statute of 1851, supra, requiring the divorced husband to pay the plaintiff (wife) certain sums for the future and past maintenance of the minor child of the marriage, there having been no provision made therefor in the decree, and the wife having incurred the expense necessary for such past support, the order was affirmed, the court holding that, under the statute, supra, where it is shown that the interest and welfare of the child required it, and that such order is just, it was within the power of the court to provide for the payment by the husband of the past as well as the future maintenance of the child. Section 138 of the Civil Code, as originally enacted, empowered the court to "give such direction for the custody, care, and education of the children of the marriage as may seem necessary or proper," either by the original decree or a modification thereof. In the case of McKay v. McKay, 125 Cal. 65, 57 P. 677, relied on by appellant, an appeal from an order of the superior court directing the payment by defendant (the divorced husband) of sums for the past and future support of the children of the marriage awarded by the decree to the plaintiff (wife), and in which decree no provision was made for the maintenance of the children, the court, in reversing the order for the past and affirming the order for the future support, referred to the case of Wilson v. Wilson, supra, and held that, the Wilson Case having been decided prior to the adoption of the codes, and under a statute expressly authorizing the court to make an order subsequent to the judgment for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, could not be regarded as an authority under a different provision of the code; that the provisions of section 138 of the Civil Code in form in force, in the use of the term "direction" instead of "payment," implied that the action of the court was to be limited to the "care, custody, and education" which the children were to subsequently receive under its direction.

The facts of the McKay Case, as shown by the opinion, were that the plaintiff after the decree married one Polastri, who took the children into his own family and supported them as members thereof; that plaintiff claimed no compensation for such support; that as to any compensation therefor such would be to recompense Polastri for moneys spent upon the children. The court held that under the provisions of section 209 of the Civil Code, while Polastri was not bound to maintain his wife's children by McKay, yet, having received them into his family and supported them, it was to be presumed that he did so as a parent, and that where such was the case they were not liable to him for their support, nor he to them for their services, and that he could have no claim on defendant McKay for such support. The court proceeds to discuss the general rule that where the children have already been sufficiently cared for by the voluntary act of the mother or of strangers the court is not empowered to compel the father to reimburse these persons for such expenses. Citing Loveren v. Loveren, 100 Cal. 493, 35 P. 87, and section 208, Civ. Code.

After the decision in the McKay Case, section 138 of the Civil Code was, by the statute of 1905, page 43, amended to read as above. In Harlan v. Harlan, 154 Cal. 341, 98 P. 32, the court, in considering the apparent conflict between the decision in the McKay Case and that of Shattuck v. Shattuck, 135 Cal. 192, 67 P. 45, held that the word "care," as used in section 138 of the Civil Code as originally enacted, is a broader term than the word "maintenance," and that, combined with "custody and education," it included every element of provision for the physical, mental, and moral welfare of the child; that an order for the benefit of the children is equally within the jurisdiction of the court under said section 138, whether it uses the term "maintenance and support" or the broader and more inclusive expression "custody, care, and education"; and further that "all that was held in McKay v. McKay was that the court should not, by an order made in such a case, compel the husband to reimburse the wife or a third party for past expenditures incurred for the benefit of the children." The court in the McKay Case did not indicate its dissent from the decision in the Wilson Case, supra, based upon the provisions of the statute then in force, but was of the opinion that, under the language of section 138 of the Civil Code as originally enacted, the court was without power to do more than to give such direction as might be proper for the future custody, care, and education of the children of the marriage. The amendment includes not only the power to make such order for the "maintenance and education"—the language of the statute of 1851 on which the decision in the Wilson case, supra, was based—but also for the "custody, care, education, and support" of such children, with power under both statutes to modify the order in proper cases. The Wilson and McKay Cases, both in law and fact, were clearly to be distinguished, as is in our opinion to be distinguished from the latter the case at bar. In the instant case the court modified the original decree providing for the "maintenance, support, and education" of the child by providing by its order of April 13, 1923, for additional payments to meet the expense, as may be inferred from the testimony of the mother, of what might reasonably have been believed to be an illness of short duration due to tonsilitis. Pneumonia following, immediate recourse to the services of physicians, the incurring of expense for medicines, and the further services of the nurses theretofore employed and whose employment was impliedly authorized by the order of April, 1923, became necessary. Had respondent been able to adduce at the hearing in April, 1923, evidence reasonably supporting the conclusion that the existing illness of the child would develop into conditions so serious and prolonged, the court would have had power to order the payment of the necessary expenses from time to time as needed; but from the nature of such cases evidence of such necessity would rarely appear to the ordinary observer, and the opinions of skilled medical practitioners as to the expense of treating and the duration of a disease would be largely matters of conjecture. Such circumstances, the emergency shown, and her dependent condition preclude the inference that her act in procuring relief for the child was voluntary in the sense that it was deliberate, or that no reliance was placed by her on orders previously made and to be made in the future by the court.

The case of Gay v. Gay, 146 Cal. 237, 79 P. 885, was an apeal from an order made after judgment of divorce rendered in favor of the plaintiff wife. The order required the husband to pay certain sums for her maintenance pending the appeal from the judgment, and in part provided for the payment of a sum covering a period preceding the motion and order. It was urged that the superior court was without power to order what was in effect a reimbursement of the cost of the wife's past support. The court, in distinguishing the decision in Loveren v. Loveren, supra, wherein an order for the reimbursement of a wife for expenses paid out of her separate estate or for moneys obtained upon her own credit was reversed, said:

"In the case cited, the rule that payments for past expenses shall not be allowed, is not absolute, but is subject to the qualification that such an order may be made whenever it appears that such payment is necessary to enable the wife to further prosecute or defend her case. And the same qualification to the rule should apply to applications by the wife for support. If it should appear to the court that it was necessary, in order to insure the support of the wife upon the amount to be paid to her periodically in the future, that existing wants or expenses incurred by her should be provided for, the court, within the qualification announced * * * would have the right to do so."

The court further held with reference to the order before it on appeal that the superior court, in making such order, properly took into consideration that in the interim between the entry of the judgment and the making of the order the wife was in indigent circumstances; that necessarily, being without means, she must have been restricted in supplying herself with many things suitable to her condition in life, or that, if these things were supplied, they must have been obtained upon credit asked and extended on the faith of a subsequent allowance to be made by the court; that under this state of circumstances it would be only proper for the court to make an immediate allowance in gross adequate to meet present actual wants arising therefrom, or to discharge her indebtedness and restore her credit, or for both purposes; that the court, by doing this in the first instance, realized that it would leave her free from embarrassment through existing wants or present indebtedness, obviate the necessity of devoting any part of the future allowance to the payment of such indebtedness, and so enable her to live in the future upon the allowance provided for that purpose.

The reasoning of the court in Gay v. Gay, supra, in construing the language of section 137 of the Civil Code, and applying the section so construed to the facts before it, is equally pertinent to the present case. Neither section 137 nor section 138 of said code expressly provides for allowances for past support either of the wife or children; but considering the purpose of both, and that the first bears such construction in support of an order based on facts analogous to those in the instant case—wherein it is apparent from the evidence that the allowance originally made for the support of the wife and child was insufficient to meet the necessities due to the illness of the child, that both were without other means sufficient therefor; that if the necessity was to be met the credit of the wife must be pledged, based upon the faith of a subsequent allowance by the court, and that to place the burden upon them or either would in effect deprive them of the possibility of living upon the allowance provided for the future—we are led to the conclusion that the language of section 138, Civil Code, as amended, makes it equally clear that the section permits an order under similar conditions to accomplish like results.

The amendment adopted in 1905 to section 138 of the Civil Code was a substantial re-enactment of the statute of 1851, supra, which statute had been judicially interpreted by the court in Wilson v. Wilson, supra. No intention to the contrary being shown, and the Wilson Case, in respect of the court's interpretation of the law then in force, not having been overruled, it may fairly be inferred that the Legislature intended that the amendment should bear the same interpretation which had been given to the original act. Black's Law of Judicial Precedents, p. 235; Black's Interpretation of Law, p. 607; Lewis' Sutherland Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 399. It is our opinion that in view of the purpose to protect the interests of the children and to enforce the obligations of the parents (Harlan v. Harlan, supra), a reasonably liberal construction of the language of the section as amended leads fairly to the conclusion that the order appealed from in this case was authorized thereby.

The order is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEW HOE. (Cr. 1242.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 1, 1925.)

1. Homicide ⊂=250—Evidence sufficient to sustain conviction for murder.

In prosecution for murder, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

2. Criminal law ⊂=1137(5)—Answer to improper question asked witness by trial court held not prejudicial, where requested by counsel for accused.

In murder prosecution, where trial court asked officer if, in obtaining written statement from accused, latter had been asked whether deceased had said that accused had shot him, on belief that counsel for accused, in looking over list of questions, had not objected to that one, answer to question, after objection had been made, and court had withdrawn it, but resubmitted it on request of counsel for accused, held not prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Lew Hoe was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Sylvester J. McAtee, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment upon a verdict of a jury finding him guilty of murder. Appellant's statement of facts fairly summarizes the outstanding features of the record, which are:

[1] Lum Wing Lock, the deceased, lived in a room on the second floor of a building on Grant avenue in San Francisco, Cal. Another room close by was occupied by his son, Lum Sing Gum, and a companion, Mock Jim. In another room, No. 35, upon the same floor, lived the defendant and appellant. At about 6 o'clock on the morning of March 8, 1924, the deceased was shot while he was in a kitchen upon the same floor, but at a little distance down the hall from the room of the deceased. This was a community kitchen, and not directly connected either with the sleeping room of the deceased or of the appellant.

The deceased was shot twice in the back, the bullets penetrating the abdomen and passing through the body. The weapon with which the shooting was done was held so close to the body of the deceased as to leave powder burns upon his clothing. He died within a few hours.

Mock Jim. the young Chinese who occupied the same room with Lum Sing Gum, the son of the deceased, testified that on that morning he had left his room to go to a toilet situated on the opposite side of the hallway from where the kitchen was located. He saw the deceased walking ahead of him in the hallway, and saw him enter the kitchen. Mock Jim entered the toilet, and while there he heard some one walking in the hall, and then he heard a pistol shot. He put his head outside the door of the toilet and saw the defendant a few steps away from him, firing his revolver into the kitchen. He heard three shots fired, and retreated again into the toilet as the defendant turned and started back to his room. While the shots were being fired, Mock Jim heard the deceased call out: "Save my life, Lew Hoe is shooting me." After the defendant re-entered his room, Mock Jim went to the kitchen and assisted the son of deceased in carrying the wounded man into the hall.

The testimony of Mock Jim is corroborated by the testimony of Lum Sing Gum, son of deceased, who stated that, while he was still in bed, Mock Jim left the room which they were occupying together; that shortly afterwards the witness heard a shot; that he jumped out of bed and heard two other shots fired in rapid succession and heard his father cry out: "Save my life, Lew Hoe is shooting me." Lum Sing Gum ran into the hallway in time to see the defendant walk rapidly down the hall and enter his own room. He did not see any weapon in the hands of defendant, but stated that defendant had his hand in his coat pocket.

The police officers were called and they knocked at the door of the room occupied by defendant and demanded admittance in English and in Chinese, but the defendant refused to open the door, and the officers broke it open and found the defendant. They asked him about a revolver and, he replied that he had "no gun." Upon searching the room, the police found a revolver under the mattress of defendant's bed. There were no cartridges in it, but one of the officers testified that when it was found the barrel was still warm as though the weapon had recently been discharged. Defendant also denied that he had any cartridges for this revolver. After defendant had been taken to the police station, a further search of his room revealed three cartridges of a size to fit his revolver, hid away in the bottom of a chopstick holder upon the wall of the room.

The foregoing testimony sustains the verdict, regardless of the conflict raised by the denials of defendant, and regardless of the unexplained circumstance that no empty cartridge shells were found in defendant's room after a most careful search.

[2] The only ground urged by the appellant for a reversal of the judgment is that the court was guilty of misconduct with relation to certain evidence offered by the prosecution. This was a written statement signed by defendant before the trial. When it was offered in evidence, it was objected to. However, counsel for defendant stated that all portions of this statement were admissible except one question and answer, which he indicated to the court with his finger. The court said he would ask questions of the police officer based upon this written statement of defendant, and objections could be made to each question. A number of questions were asked, and the answers were given by the officer by refreshing his recollection with the signed statement of defendant. No objection was made until the court asked the officer if defendant had been asked: "Did Lum Wing Lock say that you shot him?" Objection was made, upon the ground that this embodied an accusation which had been immediately denied by defendant and was therefore inadmissible against him, and the action of the court in stating it before the jury was assigned as misconduct. The court replied that this was not the statement which counsel had indicated he would object to, and that the court understood that the question to which counsel had pointed was: "Did you shoot Lum Wing Lock? A. No." The court had omitted this question and answer from his examination of the witness. When counsel insisted that he had objected to the question which the court had asked and not to the one which was omitted by the court, the objectionable question was ordered stricken out. However, counsel for defendant insisted that the answer to this question should also be read to the jury, since they had heard the question, and the court had the answer repeated by the witness, which was: "Yes, but he tell a lie."

Conceding that the question and answer were not admissible, nevertheless no prejudice could have resulted to the defendant from a mere reading of the question alone, because the jury did not know but what the answer to it was in the negative. It was only when the counsel for defendant insisted upon the answer being read into the record that the fact came before the jury that deceased had made an accusation against defendant. It is apparent that there is no prejudicial error presented by this incident which would warrant a reversal of this judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

TROY v. TROY. (Civ. 4952.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 27, 1925. Rehearing Denied and Opinion Modified June 25, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 24, 1925.)

1. Contracts ⇐332(1)—Complaint need not allege ownership of loan.

In action to recover a loan, where neither complaint nor proof in any way suggested assignment or transfer by plaintiff of any rights, complaint held not required to allege that plaintiff was owner and holder of obligation.

2. Pleading ⇐236(5)—Amendment as to due date of note sued on not abuse of discretion.

In action to recover loan which had been evidenced by writing, trial amendment of complaint as to due date, in order to conform to proof, held not abuse of discretion, notwithstanding it was made after motion to strike evidence as not in conformance with pleadings.

3. Limitation of actions ⇐25(1)—Action on note not barred.

Action to recover loan, evidenced by writing, payable on or before 90 days from April 11, 1913, held not barred, where action was commenced on April 10, 1917, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 337.

4. Pleading ⇐238(3)—Evidence held admissible to show plaintiff was not estopped to seek to amend to conform to proof.

Where action to recover loan, evidenced by writing, was commenced on facts as disclosed to attorneys by plaintiff's son, and complaint alleged improper due date, admission of son's testimony as to telling attorney of having forgotten due date held admissible to show that plaintiff should not be estopped by allegations of her pleading from setting up proper due date to conform to proof.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1012(1) — Weight of testimony is for trial court, and will not be disturbed, except for abuse of discretion.

In case tried by court, weighing of testimony is function for trial court, which appellate court will not disturb, except for abuse of discretion.

6. Husband and wife ⇐232(3)—Wife's testimony as to lending husband money and letting him have custody of note evidencing it not inherently improbable.

In action to recover loan, testimony of wife that she loaned former husband money, and let him have custody of writing evidencing loan, and that he had refused to return same to her, held not inherently improbable.

7. Husband and wife ⇐232(3)—Finding that husband did not have contract with wife for $5,000 for legal services rendered her sustained.

In action to recover loan by wife against former husband, evidence held to sustain finding that husband did not have express contract with wife for $5,000 a year for legal services rendered her.

8. Trial ⇐397(3)—Refusal to find reasonable value of husband's services as wife's attorney sustained, where not in issue.

In action by wife to recover loan to former husband, where latter counterclaimed on basis of alleged contract for $5,000 per year for services as her attorney, failure of trial court to find reasonable value of husband's services to wife held not error, in absence of any allegation of promise of wife to pay reasonable compensation.

9. Appeal and error ⇐716—Appellate court interested only in conclusions of trial court and not reasons.

Reasons of trial court as indicated by a memorandum written by him for guidance of counsel in preparing finding will not be considered on appeal; conclusions only being considered.

10. Appeal and error ⇐715(2) — Irregularities occurring in courtroom must be presented by bill of exceptions.

Although, under Code Civ. Proc. § 658, irregularities of court, adverse party, or attorney for adverse party not occurring in courtroom may properly be presented by affidavit, all irregularities occurring in the courtroom must be presented by bill of exceptions made up from reporter's notes showing occurrence, objection, and exception.

11. Witnesses ⇐391—Questions in impeachment may be leading.

Where, on cross-examination, a party has made certain statements that questions to another witness, introduced for impeachment purposes, are leading is not improper.

12. Judgment ⇐570(4)—Action dismissed several months before trial of present action held not a bar to latter.

In action against former husband to recover loan, a former action between same parties for an accounting held not a bar, where latter case was dismissed on motion of defendant several months before trial in present case.

13. Judgment ⇐590(1)—Divorce decree in action alleging cruelty in borrowing money and not returning it held no bar to action to recover loan.

In action to recover loan by wife against former husband, decree in divorce action in which wife had alleged cruelty of husband in borrowing money and not returning it held not a bar, especially where loan sued for was not especially alleged in divorce decree, and where no accounting between husband and wife was asked or made.

14. Fraudulent conveyances ⇐241(2) — Conveyance of property by wife could not be complained of by husband as fraudulent, in absence of judgment against her.

In action to recover loan by wife against former husband, in which latter counterclaimed, refusal of court to allow him to amend by alleging her fraudulent conveyance of her property to defeat any sum he might recover held proper, as he had obtained no judgment at time of motion, and could not complain of her disposition of property.

15. Appeal and error ⇐760(1) — Appellate court will not search lengthy record for alleged error.

Appellate court will not search lengthy record for alleged error in absence of direction thereto by counsel.

16. Witnesses ⇐286(5)—Admission of memorandum book, on redirect examination of party, to show it was not manufactured, as was sought to be shown on cross-examination, not error.

Where plaintiff had referred to memorandum book, in which she kept record of financial transactions, and defendant, on cross-examination, had attempted to prove that memorandum book had been recently manufactured by witness, and that items had not been entered as of date that they occurred, admission, on redirect examination, of memorandum book to show it was not manufactured as claimed held not error.

17. Appeal and error ⇐207 — Argument to which no objection was offered at trial will not be considered error.

Argument of attorney, even if going outside the record, to which no objection was made at trial, will not be considered prejudicial error.

18. Appeal and error ⇐911(3)—Judicial duty presumed regularly performed, in absence of competent evidence to contrary.

Although presiding judge was not the regular judge for county, and there was nothing in record to show his authority to preside, judicial duty will be presumed to have been regularly performed, in absence of any competent legal evidence to the contrary.

On Petition for Rehearing.

19. Appeal and error ⊜762—Objection that judge, hearing motion for new trial, had no jurisdiction waived, where not presented in opening brief.

Objection that judge who heard motion for new trial, had no jurisdiction of such hearing held waived, where not presented in opening brief.

20. Appeal and error ⊜760(1)—Objectionable argument must be pointed out in appellant's opening brief.

In relying for reversal on alleged improper argument, even if matters objected to were contained in bill of exceptions, they would not be considered on appeal, where location of matter objected to was not stated in opening brief.

21. Appeal and error ⊜715(2)—Objections to conduct of counsel must be contained in bill of exceptions and not affidavits.

Objections to conduct of counsel in presenting evidence and the rulings thereon must be contained in bill of exceptions, and not in affidavits, for consideration on appeal.

22. Appeal and error ⊜970(1)—Trial court held not prejudiced by improper offer of evidence.

It will not be assumed on appeal that trial court, sitting without jury, in trial of civil action, was prejudiced by suggestions of fact contained in questions or offers of evidence to which objections were sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Emmett Seawell, Judge.

Action by Hortense S. Troy against Robert P. Troy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Seawell, J., and Houser, Justice pro tem., deeming themselves disqualified, not participating herein.

Robert P. Troy and H. H. McPike, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Francis J. Heney, of Los Angeles, John D. Rutledge, of San Francisco, and W. S. White, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment rendered against him in an action commenced by the plaintiff to recover $17,000 alleged to have been loaned by the plaintiff to the defendant. The appellant has brought up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions—a record consisting of 1500 pages. The appellant has filed three briefs, and the respondent has filed three. Those facts will account for the length of this opinion.

In the original complaint, and likewise in the amended complaint, the plaintiff alleged that "on April 11, 1913, defendant herein borrowed from plaintiff herein, and plaintiff herein loaned to defendant herein, the sum of $17,000; and on said date defendant herein promised in writing to repay said sum of $17,000 to said plaintiff. * * *" In the original and amended complaints the above language was followed with the phrase "within a reasonable time after said April 11, 1913." During the trial, and after the plaintiff's evidence had been introduced, the trial court allowed the plaintiff to strike out the phrase last quoted, and to insert in lieu thereof, "on or before ninety (90) days from and after the said 11th day of April, 1913, with interest thereon at the rate of 6½% per annum." In the original and amended complaints the second paragraph was "that a reasonable time for repayment of said sum, after said April 11, 1913, has elapsed." In the same order last above mentioned the trial court authorized the plaintiff to strike out those words, and to insert in lieu thereof "that defendant has paid the said interest thereon up to and including the 31st day of December, 1915, but has not paid said interest, or any part thereof, since the said 31st day of December, 1915, and said interest is now due, owing, and unpaid from defendant to plaintiff."

[1] The appellant makes the attack that the plaintiff's complaint does not allege that she is the owner and holder. Neither in the complaint nor in the proof as introduced at the trial was there any suggestion of assignment or transfer by the plaintiff of any of her rights. The whole theory of the plaintiff's case was that she claimed to have loaned the defendant money, and that at the time of the loan, or about that time, a writing evidencing the loan was executed by the defendant to the plaintiff. Under such facts it was not necessary that the allegations referred to should have been incorporated in the complaint. 8 C. J. 885, § 1158; Pryce v. Jordan, 69 Cal. 569, 11 P. 185.

[2, 3] The appellant also complains because the trial court allowed the amendment mentioned above. An examination of the testimony given by the plaintiff discloses that the amendments but conform to the proof. A mere comparison of the allegations contained in the original complaint and the allegations contained in the complaint as finally amended is a sufficient refutation of the statement that any of the amendments changed or purported to change the cause of action. Conceding that there is an inconsistency between an obligation which is payable in a reasonable time and one which is payable in three months, such inconsistency was not a legal objection to an allowance of an application to amend, but was a circumstance to be considered by the trial court after the submission of the whole cause for the purpose of determining the rights of the parties. Having determined that the writing executed contained the statement that it was payable "on or before ninety days from and after the 11th day of April, 1913." it is clear that the trial court was correct in holding that an action commenced on the 10th day of April, 1917, was not barred by the statute of limitations. Code Civ. Proc. § 337.

[4] The action was commenced in the city and county of San Francisco at a time when the plaintiff was at Los Angeles. The plaintiff's son, W. S. White, an attorney at law, called upon and stated certain facts to T. M. O'Connor and William A. Kelly, both attorneys at law, and employed them to commence the action. During the presentation of the plaintiff's case she called as a witness Mr. W. S. White for the purpose of showing that the variance between the allegations of the original complaint and the sworn testimony given by the plaintiff while on the stand arose by reason of a want of information by the agents of the plaintiff as to the facts and not by reason of inconsistent statements of the plaintiff. Over numerous objections he was allowed to testify regarding the facts as he had stated them to Mr. O'Connor. In that behalf the witness testified as follows:

"At that time I told Mr. O'Connor something about whether the note bore interest or what rate of interest. I told him that the note bore interest, and as to the rate of interest I was not certain. I told him that I had a conversation with my mother both concerning the interest and the maturity of the note. I told him that I had a conversation, several conversations, with Mrs. Troy relative to the principal and maturity of this note, and as to both the maturity and the amount of interest I was not certain. And also I stated I was not certain as to how much interest had been paid on the note. I told him I was not certain because I had forgotten it. It was in the office of O'Connor & Kelly that the attachment suit was prepared. I was present when the word 'interest' was stricken out of the writ of attachment. We did not know just how much interest had been paid on the note, and therefore we could not allege the amount in the complaint; consequently we could not make an affidavit upon which the sheriff could have a writ of attachment; so in order to be certain, and have a proper attachment for $17,000, we struck out the amount of interest, because it was an uncertainty involved."

Conceding that Mr. White's testimony was hearsay, it is patent that the statements did not purport to include any testimony to the effect that the $17,000 was a loan, or that the loan had not been repaid. Furthermore, for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff should not be estopped by the allegations of her pleadings, the testimony was not objectionable. The appellant did not ask the trial court to limit the testimony, and there is nothing contained in the record showing that the trial court used the testimony for any purpose other than that for which it was proper to use it.

[5, 6] When the plaintiff commenced the presentation of her case, she took the stand, and testified in support of the allegations contained in her complaint. Thereafter she was cross-examined. She gave sworn testimony sustaining every allegation contained in her complaint. True it is that there are some inconsistencies and contradictions in her testimony, but they went merely to the weight of her testimony, and the weighing of the testimony was a function of the trial court which this court may not disturb, unless there was an abuse of discretion. In this instance we are not in the least inclined to hold that there was an abuse of discretion. The plaintiff testified that she paid the defendant the money and that it was a loan. The defendant later admitted receiving the money, but claimed that it was not a loan. The plaintiff claimed that the defendant executed to her on the next day a promissory note reciting the facts alleged in her complaint as finally amended; that later he brought the note to her at their house, and after he had read it he induced her to let him have the custody of the paper; that she did so; and that thereafter the defendant never returned the paper to her. All of these facts, it may be conceded, were contradicted by the defendant, but the conflicts in the evidence were wholly for the trial court. The defendant cites numerous passages, and argues that the showing made by the plaintiff is inherently improbable. We cannot so hold.

[7, 8] The defendant interposed a pleading marked cross-complaint and counterclaim. Therein he pleaded that from the 10th day of January, 1904, to the 28th day of October, 1916, he acted as the manager and attorney at law of the plaintiff; that he so acted under an express agreement that his compensation should be $5,000 per annum. He alleged that he received on March 27, 1913, $17,000 from the plaintiff, and that there remained due and owing to him the sum of $32,000. Throughout the trial of the case it was therefore the contention of the defendant that, although he received from the plaintiff the said sum of $17,000, he did not receive it as a loan. In this connection it is pertinent to note that the plaintiff and defendant intermarried July 22, 1904, and they lived together as man and wife until the latter part of the year 1915, when they separated. The defendant devotes a great deal of time and space to show that he was employed by and performed services for the plaintiff, and that his cross-complaint and counterclaim therefore should have been sustained by the trial court. If the mere fact of a husband rendering services to his wife constituted a cause of action, there might be something in the appellant's contention. However, respondent argues it was her claim that any services rendered by the defendant for the plaintiff were rendered gratuitously and not otherwise, and that there was no connection whatever between the rendition of services by the defendant and the payment by the plaintiff of $17,000 to the defendant. In support of that contention the trial court found the facts as claimed by the respondent. Conceding that there may be some contradictions in the evidence, it is clear from an inspection of the record that the trial court was clearly correct in holding that the preponderance of the showing was to the effect that the defendant did not hold any express contract in the sum of $5,000 or any other sum. In this connection the defendant complains because the trial court did not make a finding as to the reasonable value of the defendant's services, but it is a sufficient reply to that contention that the pleadings on which the trial was had did not present the issue. In so far as there was anything purporting to be an allegation of a promise to pay the defendant "reasonable compensation," the trial court found the fact against the appellant in finding No. 14.

Many attacks are made on the findings, and we have noted the most of them above. The first finding purports to reply to the allegations contained in paragraph 1 and paragraph 2, of plaintiff's complaint as finally amended. However, it contains some words not responsive to the allegations mentioned. It refers to the writing "evidencing" something. The defendant claims that language is a conclusion of law. Conceding that it is, the contention reaches nowhere. The other findings sufficiently support the judgment.

[9] In ruling the case the learned judge who presided at the trial wrote a memorandum for the guidance of counsel in preparing findings. The defendant caused the memorandum to be inserted in the bill of exceptions, and thereafter in his brief the defendant proceeded to dissect the memorandum, and now asks this court to express its opinion as to whether the reasons assigned by the trial judge are correct or incorrect. However, this court is merely concerned with the conclusions of the trial judge and not with his reasons. In the interest of time this court will not therefore go further into that subject.

[10] In his motion for a new trial the defendant included all of the statutory grounds, including "irregularity in the proceedings of the court, jury, or adverse party, * * * by which either party was prevented from having a fair trial." In support of his motion based on the ground last stated the defendant cites passages contained in an affidavit that is printed in the bill of exceptions, folios 3918 to 4406. As to any irregularities of the court, or of the adverse party, or of the attorneys for the adverse party, that did not occur in the courtroom, it is patent that the proper method of presenting them is by affidavit. Code Civ. Proc. § 658. However, as to any irregularities which occurred in the courtroom it is equally patent that the bill of exceptions, made up from the reporter's notes showing the occurrence, the objection, and the exception, is the proper embodiment of such matters. Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 78 P. 540. In this connection appellant complains regarding "leading questions involving misconduct and reversible errors," but the facts presenting this alleged error are contained in the affidavit above mentioned, and are not set forth in the bill of exceptions.

[11] The plaintiff had rested her case. The defendant had introduced the greater part of his case. Among other things, he had taken the stand, and had been examined and cross-examined at great length. As one of the witnesses for the defense, the defendant took the stand and testified in support of the allegations of his pleadings. On cross-examination one of the attorneys for the plaintiff called to the attention of the witness a certain date in the year 1905, at 1776 Bush street, San Francisco, and a conversation alleged to have been held between the witness and the plaintiff in the presence of Miss Hortense White and William S. White, no one else being present, and thereupon counsel asked the witness if at the time mentioned he had a conversation with the persons named in which the question of putting Mrs. Troy's property in a trust was discussed. The witness neither affirmed nor denied, but made an answer in the nature of an explanation. Thereupon other questions regarding the same subject were propounded, some of which were answered in the negative. Almost immediately thereafter similar proceedings were had regarding a conversation between the witness and Mr. W. S. White in the month of April, 1913, while riding in an automobile in the vicinity of the residence of Abe Ruef, in which conversation it was claimed the witness had said in substance that for anything he might do for his wife he would not think of charging one cent, because she was his wife. The witness answered the question in the negative. Thereafter the plaintiff called W. S. White as a witness, and propounded substantially the same questions to him. Over the objection of the appellant that the question was leading, the court allowed the witness W. S. White to answer the questions. That questions in impeachment are leading is not a sound objection.

During the progress of the trial, after the plaintiff had rested her case, the defendant moved that all of the testimony of the plaintiff be stricken out because in the original complaint and the amended complaint she alleged that the note in question was payable in a reasonable time, and because she had not alleged that the same bore interest, whereas the plaintiff had introduced evidence to the effect that the note was payable in 90 days, and that it carried interest at the rate of 6½ per cent. As we have shown in another part of this opinion, permission was asked and granted allowing the plaintiff to amend her pleading to conform to the proof.

Counsel has not quoted passages from the record informing us as to whether the amendments were made before or after the motion to strike out was made. Assuming, in support of the appellant's point, that the amendments were made subsequently, the irregularity was not so grave as to constitute a reversible error.

[12, 13] Immediately thereafter the appellant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. If the trial court accepted the testimony of the plaintiff as being true, and on the hearing of a motion for a nonsuit the trial court was bound to so accept it, it is quite clear that the attack as made was not well founded. The motion was based on the further ground that there was no proof that the alleged obligation was ever delivered and that there was no proof of a contract. For the same reasons the motion was not well founded. The motion was also based upon the same variance that the motion to strike out was based upon. The same reasoning that demonstrates that it was not a reversible error to deny the motion to strike out is equally applicable to the ruling of the trial court denying the motion for a nonsuit. The motion for a nonsuit was also based on the claim that another action, No. 85258, which was an action commenced by the same plaintiff against the same defendant to obtain a decree in accounting, was a bar to the case on trial. The record shows that the action last mentioned was dismissed on motion of the defendant November 1, 1920, several months before the trial of this action commenced. That action having been dismissed, the order of dismissal was not a bar to this action. Neither does the fact that action 85258 was commenced and was pending for a while support the contention of the defendant that the plaintiff split, or attempted to split, her cause of action. The motion was also based on the ground that a divorce action was commenced by the plaintiff against the defendant, action known as No. 85872, and that the judgment therein was a bar. In that action the plaintiff alleged as an act of cruelty that the defendant borrowed from the plaintiff numerous sums of money, and thereafter did not repay them. The $17,000 alleged loan was not specified in the allegations nor findings. In the divorce action no judgment was asked or entered to the effect that the defendant was indebted or was not indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $17,000. The judgment in the divorce case was no bar in this. We do not find that the trial court committed error in denying the motion for a nonsuit. While speaking of the divorce action, it may be noted at this time that the defendant admitted that the judgment roll in the divorce action did not show the judgment in that case to be a bar, and he sought to introduce evidence to prove that nevertheless in the divorce action evidence was introduced of and concerning the $17,000 claim. The evidence was objected to and excluded. The fact, if it be a fact, that in the divorce case the parties introduced evidence without the issues made by the pleadings would not strengthen the defendant's contention in this case.

[14, 15] The defendant asked permission to amend his answer by inserting allegations therein that the plaintiff committed a fraudulent act by deeding away her property without consideration prior to the commencement of this action for the purpose of defrauding the defendant out of any sum that might be awarded against her. The application was made on the further ground that shortly before she commenced this action she did, by false assurances of her love and affection, cause him to make her a gift of property of the value of $25,000. As the defendant had not at the time the motion was made obtained any judgment against the plaintiff, he was not in a position to complain regarding the disposition she had made of her separate property. As to when the defendant asked permission to allege plaintiff's misconduct regarding the obtaining of a fraudulent gift of $25,000, as to what the contents of the proposed pleading were, and as to the procedure followed by the defendant, he has not called any part of the record to our attention so that we can be informed thereon. We are not called upon to search such a lengthy record for material that may or may not support such a contention.

[16] While the plaintiff was on the stand giving testimony regarding financial transactions between herself and the defendant, she testified that she kept a memorandum book, which she produced, but did not offer in evidence. On cross-examination the defendant propounded to her many questions attempting to prove the fact that the memorandum book had been recently manufactured by the witness, and that the items therein were not entered as of the date that the transaction occurred. Thereafter, on re-direct examination, the plaintiff offered the memorandum book as a piece of evidence to show that it was not manufactured as claimed. Over the objection of the defendant the trial court admitted the book in evidence, and in doing so it committed no error.

The defendant makes numerous points to the effect that the attorney for the plaintiff was guilty of misconduct in the trial of the case. These acts of misconduct, each and all, are claimed to have occurred in the courtroom when the reporter was present and as the trial proceedings were being had. Although a bill of exceptions of many hundred pages is before us, no passage is cited which it is claimed shows any of the facts excepting passages contained in an affidavit made by the defendant and presented to the trial court on his motion for a new trial. We do not understand that such is the proper practice. Gay v. Torrance, supra. Furthermore, in the trial of an action before the court, when no jury is present, it is not at all clear what word of mouth on the part of opposing counsel could or would constitute reversible error on appeal, nor what procedure would support the point. However, be that as it may, the record before us certainly does not show any fact or facts in this connection which would constitute reversible error. These matters are set forth in the record, transcript pages 1310–1429 inclusive. No one of the assignments justifies special consideration in this opinion.

[17] On the trial of the case, when the plaintiff was on the stand as a witness, the check for $17,000 drawn in favor of the defendant was exhibited to her, and she testified regarding filling in the blanks on the check and filling in the blanks on the stubbook. Later she offered the check in evidence, but did not offer the entries on the stubbook. Still later, during the trial, she offered in evidence the entries made on the stubbook. The offer was objected to, and the objection was sustained. During the arguments it is claimed that the plaintiff's attorney went outside of the record and argued that the entries on the stubbook should have been received in evidence. It does not appear from the record whether an objection was made that the argument was outside of the record, or what relief, if any, was asked for. It does not appear, therefore, that any error was committed, or, if error was committed, that the error was in the least prejudicial. On the same kind of a record the defendant assigns certain acts as being misconduct on the part of the court. We have read the entire record. There is nothing in any one of the assignments.

[18] The defendant makes several points to the effect that the judge who presided at the trial had no authority to so preside. For some time prior to the date of the trial Judge Murasky was presiding in department 2 of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco. That was the court in which the action was heard and determined. During the same time Judge Shortall was presiding judge in the city and county of San Francisco. During the same time Judge Seawell was one of the duly elected, qualified, and acting judges of Sonoma county. The foregoing matters are matters of which this court probably will take judicial notice. The bill of exceptions, the judgment, and the findings each and all show that Judge Seawell presided at the trial. In his brief the defendant makes several statements of fact. Statements of fact should properly be contained in the bill of exceptions, and be quoted or cited, if necessary, in the briefs. The bill of exceptions contains, among other things, the affidavit of Robert P. Troy made to be used in support of his motion for a new trial. Except as contained in that affidavit as so embodied in the bill of exceptions, the record is silent as to how Judge Seawell happened to preside at the trial. The statements contained in that affidavit are each and all statements that purport to have been made to the affiant by (1) Judge Murasky, (2) Judge Shortall, (3) Judge Seawell, and (4) perhaps some others. Some of those statements were made by one of the judges speaking to the affiant in the absence of plaintiff's counsel and some of the statements purport to have been made in the presence of the defendant and plaintiff's counsel. The affidavit contains many expressions on information and belief. The affidavit was not answered by any counter affidavit on behalf of the plaintiff, nor any counter affidavit in support of the judicial act of any one of the judges above named. In the absence of any competent legal evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that judicial duty has been regularly performed. As Judge Murasky had the legal power to invite Judge Seawell to come to San Francisco and sit in his department, in support of the judgment it will be presumed that he made the request. As the Governor had the right to request Judge Seawell to attend at any court and hear a case there pending, in the absence of evidence to the contrary it will be presumed in support of the judgment that the Governor made the request. As extra sessions of the superior court may legally be held, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, in support of the judgment it will be presumed that Judge Seawell was regularly called to San Francisco to hold an extra session of said superior court. Finally, as Judge Shortall was a judge of the superior court, he had the power to reassign any of the cases and to take the cases, if necessary, into his own department, and, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed in support of the judgment that he did so, and caused the court to be presided over by Judge Seawell at his request. Moreover, it will not be disputed that the superior court had jurisdiction of the parties, and that the superior court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. Conceding, for the sake of argument, that if any irregularity existed in the authenticity of the request made to have Judge Seawell try the case, then and in that event such irregularity constituted an error; still there is not a word in the record showing, or tending to show, that the error, if it be an error, was in any respect prejudicial.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [19] The point that the trial judge who heard the motion for a new trial had no jurisdiction to hear the motion was not presented in the opening brief of the appellant, and it was therefore waived. Hihn v. Courtis, 31 Cal. 398; Webber v. Clarke, 74 Cal. 11, 13, 15 P. 431; Bacigalupi v. Phœnix Bldg., etc., Co., 14 Cal. App. 632, 112 P. 892.

[20-22] In the opinion heretofore filed a paragraph on pages 6 and 7 is devoted to a consideration of the claim of the appellant that certain misconduct on the part of the plaintiff's attorney occurred during the trial which constituted prejudicial error, and the court adverts to the fact that, if such matters were contained in the bill of exceptions, the location of the objectionable matters was not stated in the appellant's opening brief. We repeat the statement. It was also stated by the court that the acts and conduct of counsel in presenting evidence, the objections thereto, and the rulings thereon, should be contained in the bill of exceptions and not in affidavits, if an appellant would have the same considered by the court. The appellant also questions the correctness of that statement, but we are not inclined to depart therefrom. No misconduct occurring outside of the courtroom, nor occurring at a time when the court was not actually in session, is charged in any form or manner. But, if we concede for the purpose of argument that the record correctly sets forth the point, still the ruling must be the same. The full measure of the appellant's point is that the plaintiff's attorney made an offer to prove that the appellant did, without any authority, sign the plaintiff's name to a mortgage written for the sum of $75,000, and that the offer was made at a time when the defendant was presenting his defense, and when it would have been irregular for the plaintiff to introduce any evidence, and that the offer was repeated several times. But the offer was not accepted. The proof was not made, and the matter then stands thus: Will it be assumed on appeal that the trial judge, sitting without a jury in the trial of a civil action, allowed his mind to be prejudiced by the suggestions of fact contained in questions or offers of proof to which objections were sustained? It is patent that such is not the rule.

The last point made reiterates the contention that the trial court erred in refusing the appellant permission to file a cross-complaint asking that gifts of the alleged value of $25,000 should be canceled on the ground that they were obtained by reason of false representations. Our former opinion fully covered the subject.

A rehearing is denied.

CHERNEY et ux. v. JOHNSON et al.
(Civ. 2755.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 22, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 20, 1925.)

1. Contracts ⟸258—Improvidence not ground for relief from voluntary contracts.

Parties cannot be relieved from their voluntary contracts on mere ground that they are improvident.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟸44—Finding that vendor misrepresented location of boundary line held supported by testimony.

Testimony held sufficient to support finding that vendor misrepresented location of boundary line of land sold.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⟸174—Default in payments no bar to maintenance of action, begun before payments were due, for rebates from price and cancellation of note.

Purchasers in default are not barred from maintaining action, begun before any payments were due, for rebates from price and cancellation of purchase-money note.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⟸168 — Purchaser may withhold payments, pending action for damages, after discovering fraud.

One induced by fraud to make contract to purchase realty may withhold payments after discovering fraud, pending action for damages.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⟸185—Purchasers held not to have forfeited rights under contract by failure to pay installment due after action for rebates from price was begun.

Purchasers held not to have forfeited rights under contract not making time of essence, nor providing for forfeiture on default, by failure to pay installment, which became due after action for rebates from price and cancellation of note was begun; forfeiture of rights under contract being different from rescission thereof, which entitles purchaser to return of purchase money paid, less any damages to vendor because of breach.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⟸341(6) — Vendor, praying for termination of contract, cannot complain of decree giving him alternative of performing on receipt of balance due.

Vendor, praying for termination of contract, in answer to purchaser's suit for rebates from price and cancellation of note, cannot complain of decree giving him alternative of performing contract on receipt of balance due.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⟸341(5)—Vendor, retaining possession of land worth contract price, bound to return purchase price paid on termination of contract under alternative decree.

Vendor, having suffered no detriment by termination of contract under alternative decree on his refusal to perform as authorized thereby, where he retained possession at all times and land was worth agreed price, was obligated to return full amount of purchase money received.

8. Appeal and error ⊂⊃878(1)—Parties not appealing bound by decree.

Parties not appealing are bound by decree.

9. Vendor and purchaser ⊂⊃341(6)—Purchasers held entitled to return of purchase money paid, if vendor elected to abide by part of decree terminating contract if he refused to accept balance due.

By accepting decree terminating contract, if vendor refused to accept payment of balance due, purchasers rescinded contract at vendor's option, after latter repudiated it by attempted termination thereof as alleged in answer, and were entitled to return of purchase money paid, if vendor elected to abide by such part of decree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by Vincent Cherney and wife against W. D. Johnson and another. From a judgment against the named defendant, he appeals. Affirmed.

Meredith & Chester, of Sacramento, for appellant.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for respondents Cherney.

George, Hinsdale & Pigott, of Sacramento, for respondent Natomas Co., of California.

FINCH, P. J. Prior to the transactions herein set forth R. N. Hicks was in possession of the lands involved in this suit under an executory contract of sale thereof to him by the Natomas Company, one of the defendants. The contract, dated December 27, 1917, provides for a payment of $1,873.25 at the time of the execution thereof and annual installments of $499.54 on December 27th of every year thereafter to and including the year 1932, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable annually; the purchaser to have the right to pay any or all installments at any time. Overdue installments are to draw interest at the same rate as the principal. The purchaser is required to pay all taxes, assessments, and water charges on the land, and, upon his failure to make such payments, the vendor is given the option to pay the same; the purchaser to reimburse the vendor, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum thereon. Time is made of the essence of the contract, and the vendor is given the option to declare the purchaser's rights under the contract forfeited upon his default in making any payment when due. Hicks paid all installments and interest which became due up to and including December 27, 1919. No subsequent payments have been made.

The Goodland Company was engaged in selling real estate and maintained offices in Sacramento, Chicago, and Manitowoc, Wis. Defendant Johnson is a lawyer, his office being in Chicago, and he was the fiscal agent of the company. The plaintiffs owned a farm in Wisconsin, which they desired to sell, with the view of locating in California. A. J. Torrison, a representative of the Goodland Company, who was in charge of its Manitowoc office, approached plaintiffs relative to the purchase of lands by them in the Natomas district, near Sacramento. The plaintiffs theretofore had been endeavoring to sell their Wisconsin farm, both personally and through the Goodland Company. Under the circumstances stated, the plaintiffs came to California; Johnson and Torrison coming on the same train with them. They arrived in Sacramento February 11, 1920, and on the 13th Johnson and Torrison took them to see the lands in controversy, as well as other lands. The tract contains 57.51 acres. It is bounded on the south and the west sides by roads and on the east by an irrigation canal. A strip of land containing about 15 acres and lying west of the canal is separated from the main body of the land by a small drainage ditch. The land lying east of the drainage ditch is inferior in quality to the remainder of the tract and several feet higher in elevation. Practically all of the land west of the ditch had a crop of peas growing upon it, but there appears to have been no cultivated crop upon that part lying east of the ditch. The plaintiffs were first taken to the southwest corner of the tract, where they examined the soil, and thence to the northwest corner, where another examination was made.

Plaintiff Vincent Cherney testified that while on the tract Johnson "described it as 57½ acres. It was in peas. I told him it looked to be kind of a small patch for 57 acres. He says I must consider it is level land; it is very deceiving. * * * When he explained that to me, I did believe him. * * * He said the east boundary was as far as the peas were on." The witness further testified that he was not on the land "over half an hour. * * * When we first crossed on the southwest corner, Mr. Johnson says he was in a hurry; that I better come back." On their return to Sacramento, the plaintiffs signed an application, addressed to the Goodland Company, to purchase the land for $18,690.75, and as an initial payment, they gave the company their promissory notes in the aggregate sum of $9,345.40. As a part of the same transaction, Johnson signed an instrument in the form of a letter, addressed to plaintiffs, as follows:

"In case you are unable to sell your Manitowoc county farm on or before April 1, 1920, then it is agreed that, if you notify us by that time, we will agree to resell the 57.51 acres, purchased by you this day, of Natomas land, or take the deal off your hands and cancel sale."

On the following day the plaintiffs left Sacramento, without again inspecting the land, and returned to Wisconsin. On the next day after the foregoing instruments were executed, Johnson learned that the Goodland Company had no authority to sell the land, and he then acquired an option in his own name to purchase the land from Hicks. The plaintiffs finally sold their farm in Wisconsin, and on the 26th day of March, 1920, at Manitowoc, the following agreement between them and Johnson was executed:

"Following is to supersede all former agreements between us in reference to your purchase of lots 101 and 102, 57.51 acres, of Natomas Elkhorn subdivision, Sacramento county, California:

Purchase price of said lots, 6 per cent. interest	$18,690 75
You gave mortgage on account	9,000 00
You gave note, due in 8 months, for	1,000 00
Balance to be paid in 8 or 9 annual payments	8,690 75

"You to receive two-thirds of present pea crop.

"You to pay for cultivating peas at $5 per day, not to exceed $150, however.

"You to pay cost of harvesting peas.

"Above-described note for $1,000 to be paid on or before eight months; but your two-thirds of pea crop is to be applied in liquidation of said note."

On the following day Johnson received $9,000 in payment of the "mortgage on account" mentioned in the agreement, and he thereafter assigned the note for $1,000 referred to therein to third persons, making a total of $10,000 received by him on the purchase price of the land. The plaintiffs again arrived in California June 6, 1920, and on the next day they discovered that the tract includes the 15 acres of land of inferior quality between the irrigation canal and the drainage ditch. They thereafter learned for the first time that the land is within the boundaries of a reclamation district and burdened with a bonded indebtedness of $4,000. They have never taken possession of the land or received any of the proceeds thereof.

The complaint was filed November 12, 1920. It is alleged therein, among other things, in addition to the said false representations, that Johnson informed plaintiffs that he would not pay any of the aforesaid bonded indebtedness, and demanded that plaintiffs pay the same, and that he "has threatened to declare, and will attempt to declare, forfeited plaintiffs' rights and interest under said agreement of March 26, 1920, in the event that plaintiffs shall not pay * * * said bonds, and * * * has refused and will refuse to credit plaintiffs on the purchase price of said real property with any payments which they may make under the provisions of said bonds; * * * that defendant Johnson has refused to credit plaintiffs with more than $1,000 on account of the deficiency in quality of the land hereinbefore set forth." The prayer is for judgment that "plaintiffs are entitled to a rebate of $3,000 upon the purchase price provided in said agreement of March 26, 1920, on account of the deficiency in quality of said land, and are entitled to a further rebate therefrom in the amount now due upon said bonds; that said decree shall direct said defendant Johnson to assign said contract of December 27, 1917, to plaintiffs, and shall adjudge and decree that defendant Johnson shall pay to plaintiffs such sum as this court may find to be due from him to plaintiffs, and shall surrender and cancel said promissory note in the sum of $1,000 executed and delivered by plaintiffs to defendant Johnson on March 26, 1920, or that such other, further, and different relief be granted as may be proper in the premises."

The answer of defendant Johnson was filed August 6, 1921. The answer denies the allegations of the complaint which are material to the determination of this appeal, and alleges that plaintiffs failed to pay the first installment of the purchase price of the land, and interest, which became due March 26, 1921; that on the 28th day of March, 1921, "this defendant served a written notice on plaintiffs, demanding payment of the amounts above referred to," and stating "that unless said sums were paid in accordance with said contract that their interest in the contract and in the lands therein described would be terminated; that on or about the 2d day of August, 1921, this defendant served on plaintiffs a certain notice in writing dated July 25, 1921, terminating, canceling, and ending all the right, title, and interest in said lands and in said contract by reason of the default of plaintiffs." The prayer of the answer is "that plaintiffs take nothing in this action, and that this court make its decree, ordering, adjudging, and decreeing that all the right, title, and interest of plaintiffs in and to said lands has been terminated, and that said contract between this defendant and plaintiffs has been terminated and ended, and that this defendant have judgment for costs of suit, and for such other and further relief as may be proper."

The defendant Natomas Company took the position of a mere stakeholder, its counsel stating "that the contract holder owes the Natomas Company a certain sum of money and is in default, but we do not care to take advantage of the default or terminate the contract."

The court found the facts hereinbefore stated, including those alleged in the complaint, to be true; that at the time of the trial, which commenced January 31, 1922, "there was unpaid from defendant Johnson to said corporation (Natomas Company), on account of the principal of said purchase price, the sum of $6,494.02; that * * * there was due, owing, and unpaid from defendant Johnson to said corporation, * * * on account of installments on principal, on account of interest thereon, and on account of taxes, reclamation assessments, and water charges, the sum of $2,777.08; that all of said sums are secured by said contract, and must be paid in order to enable the defendand Johnson to acquire title from said corporation; * * * that at all times mentioned in said complaint the real property therein described was and is now subject to a reclamation assessment duly and legally assessed against said property, in the sum of $4,000, no part of which has been paid." The court further found that Johnson misrepresented to plaintiffs the location of the east boundary line of the land as hereinbefore stated; that the value of the land is $1,575 less than it would be if it were all of the same quality as that pointed out to plaintiffs; "that at all times herein mentioned the defendant W. D. Johnson has been and is now in possession of said real property; * * * that prior to the commencement of this action, the defendant Johnson informed plaintiffs that he would not be bound by the terms of said contract of March 26, 1920, and that he would not perform the covenants and conditions on his part to be performed as provided by the terms of said contract, nor has defendant Johnson at any time retracted his refusal to perform said contract;" and that Johnson demanded payment of plaintiffs and served notice upon them of termination of the contract as alleged in his answer.

As conclusions of law from the facts found, the court held "that there has been a breach of said contract of March 26, 1920, by the defendant Johnson; that plaintiffs are entitled to a decree of this court directing a specific performance by defendant of said contract; that plaintiffs are entitled to assume said reclamation assessments, and should receive a deduction from the purchase price to be paid by them in the sum of $4,000, on account of the lien of said reclamation assessment, and are entitled to a further deduction from said purchase price in the sum of $1,575 on account of deficiency in quality of said land;" that after making such deductions there remains unpaid on the purchase price of the land the sum of $3,115.75 with interest thereon from March 26, 1920, payable in eight or nine installments, as provided in the contract, at the option of plaintiffs; and that plaintiffs are entitled to a decree terminating and rescinding said contract of March 26, 1920, in the event that defendant shall fail to perform said contract, and are entitled, in such event, to the repayment of all sums paid by them, with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from date of payment.

Judgment was entered, requiring specific performance of the contract by Johnson; directing the plaintiffs to pay to the clerk of the court, within 30 days after entry of the decree, such part of the said sum of $3,115.75 remaining unpaid on the purchase price as might then be due, together with interest, in accordance with the terms of the contract, the same to be paid by the clerk to Johnson upon delivery by the latter of a receipt showing payment of the amount due the Natomas Company under the terms of the Hicks contract, including payments made by that company in Johnson's behalf, as authorized by that contract; and directing Johnson to file with the clerk an undertaking in the sum of $4,000 indemnifying plaintiffs against "any loss they may sustain by reason of the failure of the defendant Johnson to comply with the terms" of the Hicks contract. Omitting parts of the decree not material here, it continues as follows:

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that if plaintiffs, within 30 days from the date hereof shall make the payments herein provided to be made by them, and if defendant shall fail to file said receipt within 60 days from date of notice of entry of this decree, said contract of March 26, 1920, shall be and is hereby declared terminated and rescinded, and said clerk shall thereupon repay to plaintiffs the sums paid to him by plaintiffs under the terms hereof, and shall enter judgment in favor of plaintiffs and against defendant W. D. Johnson in the sum of $10,000, with interest thereon from March 27, 1920, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum to the date of entry of said judgment in the sum of $10,000. * * * It is further decreed that full jurisdiction of this case is retained, to the end that further judgment and decree may be entered herein in accordance with the foregoing, in the event that defendant Johnson shall fail to comply with the terms hereof."

The defendant Johnson has appealed from the judgment. If that part of the decree, which provides for the termination and rescission of the contract in the event of Johnson's failure to comply with the other provisions of the decree, were omitted therefrom, it might be doubtful whether an affirmance would be possible. The decree is in harmony with natural justice, but, unfortunately, natural justice and legal justice do not always coincide. Appellant concedes that he is under legal obligation to pay the assessment of $4,000, which is a lien on the land, as well as all sums due and to become due under the Hicks contract, before he will be in a position to give plaintiffs the title he agreed to convey to them, although he contends that he is not under obligation to them to make these payments until the time arrives at which they become entitled to a deed. Under appellant's theory of the case, plaintiffs must continue to pay the installments of the purchase price as they fall due and take their chances of his ability and willingness to clear the land when they become entitled to a deed. At the time the contract between the parties was executed, the amount of money necessary to clear the land under the Hicks contract, including the assessment of $4,000, greatly exceeded the unpaid installments under the contract between the parties, and this excess has been increased subsequently by payments made by the Natomas Company in Johnson's behalf and which remain a charge upon the land.

[1] Johnson is a lawyer. He has "been in the land business about five or six years in California, * * * and before that in Texas." From his position with the Goodland Company it may be inferred that he is a shrewd business man. He drafted the contract between the parties. The plaintiffs had never been in California prior to February 11, 1920, and were not familiar with California lands, and did not know that the lands in question were within a reclamation district, or subject to an assessment for the reclamation thereof. Their transactions with Johnson were improvident in the highest degree. Parties cannot be relieved from their voluntary contracts, however, on the mere ground that they are improvident.

[2] Appellant contends that the evidence does not support the finding to the effect that Johnson misrepresented the location of the east boundary line of the land. The testimony of plaintiff Vincent Cherney, hereinbefore set out, is clearly sufficient to support such finding. It is urged that other findings are not supported by the evidence, but in view of the conclusion reached on another feature of the case it is unnecessary to discuss them.

[3, 4] It is contended that respondents were not in a position to maintain the action because, as asserted, they were in default in their payments under the contract. No payments, however, were due when the action was commenced. Further, it has been held that "one induced by fraud to enter into a contract for the purchase of real estate may withhold payments after the discovery of the fraud and pending the action for damages." Palladine v. Imperial Valley Farm Lands, 65 Cal. App. 727, 749, 225 P. 291, 300.

[5] Neither is there any merit in the contention that the plaintiffs have forfeited their rights under the contract by their failure to pay the installment which became due after the commencement of the action. Time is not made of the essence of the contract, and it contains no provision for a forfeiture of plaintiffs' rights thereunder in case of their default. In support of his contention that plaintiffs have forfeited their rights under the contract, appellant cites 39 Cyc. 1370, where it is stated that, although time is not made of the essence of a contract to sell land, "if the purchaser, without excuse, fails to pay at the stipulated time, the vendor, being in no default, and able and ready to perform all then required of him by the contract, may notify the purchaser to pay within a reasonable time, or he (the vendor) will treat the contract as rescinded." The rescission of a contract is very different from the forfeiture of a party's rights thereunder. In case of a rescission of an executory contract of sale of land on account of the purchaser's default, in the absence of anything in the contract to the contrary, the purchaser is entitled to the return of the purchase money theretofore paid by him, less any damages suffered by the vendor by reason of the breach.

[6-9] In this case the appellant notified the respondents that he had elected to terminate the contract, and in his answer prayed the court for a decree adjudging the contract terminated. The court has entered an alternative decree to that effect. The appellant is in no position to complain that the court gave him the alternative of doing something else in lieu of the decree for which he prayed. He is at liberty to choose between the decree for which he prayed in his answer and the doing of the alternative things required of him. The appellant has at all times retained possession of the land. He alleged in his answer and testified at the trial that the land is worth the amount which the respondents agreed to pay therefor. Having suffered no detriment by the termination of the contract, the appellant is under obligation to return to respondents the full amount of the purchase money which he has received from them. It may be that the respondents have just cause of complaint against that part of the decree which, in effect, gives appellant the right to terminate the contract, but they have not appealed, and are therefore bound by the decree. By accepting the decree they have, in effect, rescinded the contract, at the option of appellant, after the latter had repudiated it by his attempted termination thereof as alleged in his answer. Under such circumstances the respondents are entitled to a return of the purchase money paid by them, in the event that the appellant shall elect to abide by that part of the decree which terminates the contract. 27 R. App. 116, 201 P. 344.

The other contentions made by appellant have no bearing upon the ground upon which this decision is based, and need not be discussed.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARRIOS & Co., Inc., v. J. R. GARRETT CO. (Civ. 2883.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 28, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 27, 1925.)

1. Brokers ⟸94—Letter construed as not conferring authority on fruit broker to conclude contract for sale of raisins.

Letter construed as not conferring authority on fruit broker to conclude contract for sale of raisins, but as conferring authority to offer any person desiring to purchase the raisins an option to make the purchase, the option being subject to the right of the principal or its president to accept or reject it.

2. Frauds, statute of ⟸116(1, 2)—Subscription by third party to written memoranda of sale as agent of defendant did not bind latter in absence of authority to so act for defendant.

Subscription by third party to written memoranda of sale as agent of defendant did not bind latter, under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 4, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 4, in absence of authority to so act for defendant.

3. Frauds, statute of ⟸85—When contract for sale of goods or chattels at price not less than $200 is valid stated.

To render valid a contract for sale of goods or chattels at a price not less than $200, the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, must be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent, unless the buyer accepts or receives part of the goods, or pays at the time some part of the purchase money, in view of Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 4, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 4.

4. Corporations ⟸432(12)—Evidence held not to show acts of defendant or its president creating implication it dealt with and held out third party as its agent to sell its raisins.

Evidence held not to show acts or conduct of defendant or its president creating implication it dealt with and held out third party as its agent to sell its raisins.

5. Frauds, statute of ⟸158(2)—Telephonic conversation held inadmissible to show ratification of agent's unauthorized agreement to sell raisins.

In view of Civ. Code, § 2310, section 1624, subd. 4, and section 2309, telephonic conversation of defendant principal held inadmissible to show ratification of its agent's unauthorized agreement with plaintiff to sell raisins for price exceeding $200.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Barrios & Co., Inc., against the J. R. Garrett Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Richard Belcher, of Marysville, for appellant.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is for damages for the alleged breach of two several contracts alleged to have been entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant, whereby, so it is alleged, the latter sold and agreed to deliver to the former two several lots of "Thompson's Seedless Raisins, soda dipped," at a certain specified price.

The complaint is in two counts. The first is founded upon an agreement alleged to have been made by the parties on or about the 15th day of September, 1922, whereby the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff, and the latter agreed to purchase from defendant, 2,400 cases of raisins, of the variety above described, "of the 1922 pack, delivery to be made immediately when said pack of 1922 was ready for shipment," the total amount to be paid by plaintiff to defendant therefor being the sum of $5,500, "f. o. b. cars, at Marysville." The second count or cause of action is upon a contract alleged to have been made the same day, between the parties for 500 boxes of raisins of the same variety and pack as those above mentioned, for the sum of $1,156.25, "f. o. b. on cars at Marysville," to be shipped to plaintiff "immediately when said pack of 1922 was ready for shipment." The complaint, in appropriate language, alleges these facts, and, further, that the defendant refused and has always refused to perform the terms of said alleged contracts or any part thereof, while the plaintiff is and at all times has been ready, willing, and able to perform said contracts on its part; that by reason of the alleged breach by defendant of the contract declared upon in the first count of the complaint, the plaintiff has suffered damage in the sum of $2,850, and for the like breach of the contract forming the basis of the second cause of action stated in the complaint, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $593.75. The aggregate amount of damages prayed for as in compensation for the loss alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the alleged breach of the two contracts counted on is the sum of $3,443.75.

The answer consists of specific denials of the averments of both counts of the complaint.

Upon the issues thus framed a trial was had before a jury, who awarded the plaintiff a verdict for the sum of $2,356.25, in consonance to which judgment was entered. A motion for a new trial by defendant was denied, and the latter appeals from the judgment upon a record prepared according to the method prescribed by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It is expressly conceded in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff that the facts as to the alleged making of both contracts sued on are identical, except as to the amount of the raisins and time for delivery, which, it is further likewise conceded, are not of importance on this appeal; hence, as counsel on both sides have so considered and discussed the points raised, so the appeal will be considered and disposed of upon the theory that the two contracts are one.

The primary and all-important question submitted for decision is whether the alleged agreements for the alleged breach of which plaintiff claims to have been damaged to the extent of the aggregate sum stated in the ad damnum clauses of the complaint are invalid or nonenforceable because they do not comply with the mandates of the statute of frauds. There are numerous other matters which are discussed in the briefs. One involves the contention by the defendant that whatever transactions the plaintiff, through one Greene, had concerning the purchase of raisins were between the former and E. B. Wilcox, individually, or not as a representative or an officer or agent of the defendant. But, as to this and all other points, some of which are directly connected with and subsidiary to the points first above stated, it is to be said that, if we find ourselves required to hold that the agreements sued on are nonenforceable because they offend the statute of frauds, then, obviously, the case would come to an end, and the consideration of the other points referred to would be purely academic and superfluous.

The plaintiff, prior to and at the time of the institution and the trial of this action, was engaged in the business of importing and exporting merchandise, including fruit, in the city of San Francisco, its principal place of business. The defendant at the same time, at the city of Marysville, its principal place of business, was engaged in the business of purchasing raisins from growers and packing the same for the general trade. Warmington-Duff Company, connected with the transactions herein involved, was, at all the times mentioned, engaged in San Francisco in the business of wholesale distributor of fruit products, or the business of fruit broker.

At all the times mentioned Alberto Barrios was president of plaintiff corporation, E. B. Wilcox was vice president and the secretary of defendant corporation, and L. C. Greene, Jr., sales manager of the Warmington-Duff Company. On the 11th day of September, 1922, Greene, representing the Warmington-Duff Company, addressed the following letter to defendant:

"Gentlemen: Mr. Herbert Hynes of the Hynes Packing Company of Sacramento was kind enough to inform the writer that you purchased raisins from the growers and packed them for your trade. If you have any packed raisins to offer, please quote us, making your price read regular terms and 2½ per cent. brokerage to us. At the present time, we are interested in Thompsons seedless raisins, soda dipped, and would be glad to have you quote us on a car or less than car of same. Any attention you may give our request will prove to our mutual advantage.

"Yours very truly, Warmington-Duff Co.,
"By Greene."

On the following day (September 12, 1922), defendant replied to the above letter. Said reply was written on a printed letterhead of defendant. On the left-hand corner thereof was printed the name of A. W. Lewis, as president, and on the right-hand corner thereof the name of E. B. Wilcox, as vice president. Said letter reads:

"Warmington-Duff Co. San Francisco, California.—Gentlemen: We acknowledge yours 11th. Replying thereto, would state that we are hoping to have three or four cars Thompson seedless, soda dipped, a part of which you are at liberty to sell for delivery just as soon as the raisins can be stemmed and boxed on the basis 9½c, usual terms, f. o. b. cars Marysville. Any sales made would be subject to our confirmation.

"Yours truly, J. R. Garrett Co."

The above letters—the one from Warmington-Duff Company, by L. C. Greene, Jr., to defendant, and the last from the latter to Warmington-Duff Company—constituted all the writings directly bearing on the transactions involved herein between Warmington-Duff Company and the defendant. In other words, there was no other letter or writing, save and except the defendant's letter to Warmington-Duff Company dated September 12, 1922, from which any implication could possibly arise or be drawn that the latter was ever authorized in writing to sell the raisins to the plaintiff or any other person. This is testified to by said L. C. Greene, who, as seen, was acting, and did at all times act, for Warmington-Duff Company in the transactions upon which this action is founded. Greene testified that, a day or two subsequent to the receipt by him of the letter purporting to be from the defendant and dated September 12, 1922, he called at the office of the plaintiff corporation and saw and communicated to the president thereof the proposition contained in the said letter from defendant. After some conversation with Barrios, Greene wired Wilcox, from San Francisco, and under date of September 14, 1922, as follows:

"On receipt this wire please wire us option one car preferably two Thompson seedless soda bleached packed twenty fives at nine half cents cars Marysville less two and two and half brokerage first half October shipment for cable reply Saturday noon coast payment thanks Warmington Duff Co."

Greene testified that the Warmington-Duff Company received a reply to the above wire in the form of a letter written on the stationery of the defendant. The letter reads:

"Owing to more favorable offering made us, cannot now offer at less than nine three quarters less discounts mentioned or nine one quarter net Marysville. This for one or two cars subject acceptance by ten a. m. Saturday sixteenth and subject to satisfactory assurance regarding payment. While think early October delivery can be made owing to existing conditions this cannot be guaranteed."

The original of the said letter was not produced, but a copy thereof, which did not show the date of the letter nor by whom it was signed, was introduced in evidence. Greene, however, testified that he believed that the letter was received either on the 15th or 16th of September; that, at any rate, it related to the negotiations relative to the sale of the raisins referred to in the complaint, and that upon receipt thereof he again interviewed Barrios, president of plaintiff, and further proceeded with negotiations looking to the sale of the raisins to the plaintiff; and that Barrios, acting for plaintiff, agreed to purchase the raisins. Thereupon, Greene, so he testified, called Wilcox on the phone, and thus getting in conversation with Wilcox, stated to the latter that "he had a buyer for the raisins, told him the amount Mr. Barrios was willing to pay, and asked him to enter the order for the raisins in question at 9½c, to which Mr. Wilcox replied that he would take the order as submitted as Mr. Greene." Immediately following this conversation, Greene prepared in triplicate a sales memorandum containing the terms of the agreement of sale as the same was finally completed by the conversation with Wilcox over the telephone. These several memoranda were designated, respectively, as the "buyer's copy," the second as the "seller's copy," and the third as the "broker's copy." The seller's copy was forwarded to defendant, the buyer's delivered to the plaintiff, and the broker's retained by Greene for the Warmington-Duff Company. The memorandum of the transaction involving the sale of the 2,400 cases and that of the transaction relative to the sale of the 500 cases were identical in form. Each of the memoranda, or the original and the copies thereof contained the statement, "all orders are subject to confirmation," and signed "Warmington-Duff Co., per L. C. Greene, Jr.," initialed "LCG/J." Except in so far as might be inferred from the words "for account of J. R. Garrett Co., Marysville, California," contained in the memoranda, the instuments do not show that the Warmington-Duff Company was acting as agent for the Garrett Company. No reply was ever made to said memoranda or anything done with reference thereto by the defendant or Wilcox, although it was admitted by the latter that the memoranda covering the two contracts were received by him. Greene testified that agreements in writing, subscribed by plaintiff, and embracing the terms of the sale, as indicated by the memoranda, were to be and were in fact sent to defendant for its signature thereto immediately following the forwarding of the memoranda to the latter. Wilcox admitted the receipt of these writings or proposed written agreements.

It appears that, prior to the 18th day of October, 1922, the plaintiff, through the Warmington-Duff Company, forwarded to defendant instructions for the shipment of the raisins. Said instructions, so Wilcox stated, were received by him or the defendant. Defendant, up to said 18th day of October, made no reply to said instructions either by delivering raisins to plaintiff or by letter or other means of communication, and on that day Barrios went to Marysville to interview the defendant or Wilcox and ascertain the reason for the delay on the part of the latter in complying with the instructions theretofore given by plaintiff to defendant for the shipment of the raisins. Barrios testified that it was on the occasion of this visit to Marysville that he, for the first time, learned from Wilcox that it was claimed by the latter that the negotiations between him and Greene, representing the Warmington-Duff Company relative to the sale and purchase of raisins, were carried on by him (Wilcox) in his own individual right or personal capacity and with reference to raisins belonging to him individually, and not to defendant. Barrios, at that time, so he stated, insisted that his dealings looking to the purchase of the raisins were with defendant and not with Wilcox, as an individual, or in his own right, and that plaintiff would wholly depend upon and expect Garrett & Co. to carry out the terms of the agreements made by and between Wilcox, acting for defendant, and Greene, acting for the Warmington-Duff Company. Upon his return to San Francisco, Barrios, so he continued to testify, addressed to the defendant a letter (dated October 20, 1922), in which he requested definite information as to the time at which the raisins would be ready for shipment. "The only reply which he (Barrios) received to this communication was a telegram dated October 24, 1922, signed by E. B. Wilcox," in which he stated: "Have received no money; therefore call all negotiations off." See respondent's brief, page 9.

On cross-examination, Greene testified that it was not clear in his mind whether, in the conversation with Wilcox over the telephone, on the 14th day of September, 1922, the day on which the memoranda above spoken of were prepared, the latter stated to him (Greene) that the raisins to which their negotiations related were not the property of defendant but that of Wilcox. Greene further testified that he understood the words, "All orders subject to confirmation," substantially the language of the defendant's letter of September 12, 1922, to the Warmington-Duff Company, meant, and were intended to mean, that the seller "takes or accepts the order, and, in so doing confirming the order"; that the Warmington-Duff Company never secured in writing an acceptance or confirmation of the order, or any reply to the written contracts expressing the terms of the agreements which he forwarded to the defendant. He stated that all his dealings regarding the raisins in question were with Wilcox. One of his communications by wire was addressed to Wilcox "in care of Garrett Co."; another, a letter, was addressed to the Garrett Company, and contained the words, "Attention, Mr. Wilcox." Greene said that the "sales memoranda," above mentioned, contained no statement or made no reference to the execution of written agreements by the parties as in confirmation of the terms of said memoranda, but that such agreements were prepared, signed by plaintiff, and, at the request of the latter, forwarded to defendant to be signed. Greene said that there was no acceptance or confirmation of his proposition to sell the raisins to the plaintiff other than that which was orally obtained from defendant through Wilcox in his conversation with Greene over the telephone immediately following the submission of the proposition to sell to plaintiff. In brief, Greene testified that, from the 15th day of September, 1922, the time he sent the sales memoranda to defendant, until the 1st day of December, 1922, he never received any written communication from the J. R. Garrett Company or Wilcox concerning the raisins in question.

It is clear from the evidence as shown by the foregoing statement that the plaintiff's claim that a contract whereby the raisins were sold to it is wholly predicated upon the letter from defendant under date of September 12, 1922, to the Warmington-Duff Company and the purported oral ratification by Wilcox over the telephone of the proposition by Greene to sell to plaintiff, according to the terms of said letter. Indeed, there is no other evidence than that afforded by said letter and that of the telephone conversation showing or tending to show that a contract whereby defendant, through the Warmington-Duff Company, or any other person, sold or agreed to sell the raisins to plaintiff.

[1] It is too plain to afford ground for legitimate discussion that the defendant did not intend by its letter of September 12, 1922, to invest the Warmington-Duff Company with authority to consummate a sale of the raisins. The concluding language of the letter unquestionably supports this conclusion. The insertion in the letter of the words, "Any sales made would be subject to our confirmation," clearly indicates that the intention of the defendant, if, indeed, as a matter of fact it authorized said letter to be written or its name subscribed thereto, was was to limit the authority of the Warmington-Duff Company in the matter of negotiating a sale of the raisins entirely to the act of procuring a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase the fruit according to the terms stated in the letter. Indeed the real effect of the letter was merely to confer on the Warmington-Duff Company the authority to offer any person desiring to purchase the raisins referred to therein an option to make such purchase, which option was subject to the right of the defendant or Wilcox to accept or reject. Normart v. Safer et al. (Cal. App.) 227 P. 943, 946, et seq.; Norton v. Overholtzer, 63 Cal. App. 388, 218 P. 637.

[2] But the plaintiff does not seriously, if at all, undertake to combat the soundness of the construction thus given said letter. Indeed, the very fact that, through the Warmington-Duff Company, it besought the execution by defendant of memoranda and written agreements whereby a sale of the fruit according to the proposition contained in the letter would be completed, is plainly pregnant with the admission on the part of both plaintiff and the Warmington-Duff Company that they fully understood that the authority conferred upon the latter by the letter was expressly restricted to the procurement of a satisfactory purchaser of the raisins, the proposal to buy, if any was received, being subject to ratification or confirmation by the defendant. It follows that the memoranda of the alleged sale, signed by the Warmington-Duff Company as agent of the defendant, were wholly without legal force. In other words, the Warmington-Duff Company being without authority to consummate a sale of the raisins, its subscription to the written memoranda of the two agreements of sale as agent of defendant was entirely gratuitous, and the writings not binding upon the defendant or Wilcox.

[3] To render valid a contract for the sale of goods or chattels at a price not less than $200, the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, must be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent, unless the buyer accepts or receives part of the goods, etc., which are the subject of the sale, or pays at the time some part of the purchase money. Civ. Code § 1624, subd. 4; Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 4. There is no claim that the plaintiff paid any part of the purchase price or received any part of the raisins; and it is obvious that the alleged agreements did not satisfy the requirements of the Code section just cited. In fact it is plainly manifest that, since the memoranda contained a statement clearly indicating that the terms thereof were to be subject to confirmation by defendant, neither the plaintiff nor the Warmington-Duff Company regarded them as binding unless so confirmed, or, in other words, that they regarded the act of the Warming-ton-Duff Company, in subscribing to the writings as agent of defendant, as not imparting to the memoranda any binding force, so far as defendant was concerned.

[4] It is contended that defendant is estopped from denying the validity of the agreements by reason of certain acts and conduct of the defendant from which authority in the Warmington-Duff Company to close a bargain for the sale of the raisins was implied, and that plaintiff was controlled by such acts and conduct in dealing with the Warmington-Duff Company. This position finds no support in the record. The evidence discloses no acts or conduct on the part of defendant or Wilcox from which it could be implied by third parties that it (defendant) was dealing with or holding out the Warmington-Duff Company as its agent in the sale of its raisins. On the contrary, the acts and conduct of the plaintiff, as revealed by the evidence, were clearly evincive of the fact that it and its president knew or realized at all times that the Warmington-Duff Company was without authority to conclude a contract for the sale of raisins. The written memoranda and the proposed written agreements, and the circumstances attending their preparation and transmission to defendant by the Warmington-Duff Company, conclusively show this to be true. A similar question as to the scope of the authority of an agent in a real estate transaction arose in Norton v. Overholtzer et al., 63 Cal. App. 388, 395, 218 P. 637, 640, supra, where Shenk, J., pro tem. (now a Supreme Justice) said:

"The appellants contend that by the authorization given to Davis he was the ostensible agent of the respondent in the transaction, and sections 2316, 2317, and 2330 of the Civil Code are referred to in support of the contention. But no such question is involved here. It was in evidence without contradiction that when the contract of September 19th was signed Mr. Davis disclosed to the appellants that he was acting for respondent as her agent and had authority to sign for her, and that no request was made by the appellants to ascertain the scope of his authority or to exhibit to them his written authorization. Under such circumstances Davis could bind his principal only when acting within the scope of his authority, and it was incumbent upon appellants to ascertain the scope of that authority. Mudgett v. Day, 12 Cal. 139; Davis v. Trachsler, 3 Cal. App. 559, 86 P. 610."

The instant case in this particular, if anything, is even stronger against the plaintiff than the same situation was against the appellants in the case from which the above excerpt is taken, for here it is clear that no inquiry by plaintiff as to the extent of the authority of the Warmington-Duff Company in the premises was necessary, since all the authority vested in the latter was clearly expressed in writing, which was in its possession, and the written agreements were prepared by Greene and signed by plaintiff, and thereupon, at the request of the latter, forwarded to defendant for its approval and signature. These circumstances require no analysis to perceive and properly appreciate their effect. They plainly speak for themselves as to the question in hand.

[5] The claim that there was a ratification of the proposed sale is virtually answered above. The contention is, of course, based upon the testimony of the conversation over the telephone between Wilcox and Greene, in which, so the last-named testified, the former, in effect, stated that any proposition submitted for the sale of the raisins would be approved or confirmed or accepted by him or the defendant. But that testimony was obviously incompetent as proof of that fact, if it was a fact. Civ. Code, § 2310. That section declares, inter alia, that "a ratification can be made only in the manner that would have been necessary to confer an original authority for the act ratified." See, also, Norton v. Overholtzer, 63 Cal. App. 388, 393, 218 P. 637; Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 227, 41 P. 1017, 45 P. 252. As has been shown, such agreements as those in the instant case, being for the sale of goods at a price not less than but exceeding $200, are required to be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged or by his agent. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 4; see, also, Civ. Code, § 2309; Church v. Collins, 18 Cal. App. 745, 748, 124 P. 552.

There are, as above stated, other points presented here, but these, in view of the conclusion at which we have arrived, as indicated by the foregoing discussion, need not be considered.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment is reversed.

73 Cal. App. 83

LEACH v. DAUGHERTY, State Commissioner of Corporations. (Civ. 5025.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California, Division 1. June 1, 1925.)

1. Licenses ⟸21—Legislature may provide a commission or board empowered to ascertain existence of facts on the findings of which may depend the right to continue a profession or business.

By legislative act, commission or board may be empowered to ascertain existence of facts on the findings of which may depend the right to continue in the practice of a profession or a regulated business, and this applies where the inquiry is to be made by such commission or board preliminary to issuance of a license to transact a regulated vocation in the first instance.

2. Constitutional law ⟸62—Licenses ⟸7(1)—Statute providing for investigation of business reputation of applicants for broker's certificate held not unconstitutional.

Provisions of Corporate Securities Act, § 6, providing that the corporation commissioner may make whatever investigation deemed advisable as to an applicant's business reputation before issuing a broker's certificate, held not unconstitutional "in that no rules, regulations, or specifications are set forth in the said corporate Securities Act defining what shall constitute good business reputation, and an unauthorized delegation of legislative authority.

3. Brokers ⟸3—Citation to a broker to attend before corporation commissioner for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a broker's certificate should be issued need not state any direct charge or complaint against him.

Where broker applied to corporation commissioner for renewal of license which was subsequently refused under Corporate Securities Act, § 6, an allegation that the commissioner was without jurisdiction to determine question of petitioner's good reputation, since the citation contained no direct charge or complaint against him, was without merit, since his right to engage in business as a broker for the succeeding year was not vested, but wholly contingent on the quasi judicial determination of the commissioner, and any application for license would be controlled by statute, which would be ample to direct petitioner's attention to scope of inquiry to be held.

4. Licenses ⟸22—Statute does not require written notice to applicant for license that commissioner will make investigation regarding his reputation.

Corporate Securities Act, § 6, does not provide for nor contemplate any written notice to an applicant that a commissioner will make investigation regarding his reputation, but permits such further investigation by commissioner as he shall deem advisable.

5. Licenses ⟸22—Findings of fact of corporation commissioner in applications for brokers' licenses conclusive on appeal.

The exercise of the power given to a corporation commissioner under the Corporate Securities Act, § 6, to investigate an applicant for a broker's license, being judicial, or at least quasi judicial, his finding of fact, based upon the evidence, is conclusive upon appeal.

Application by M. A. Leach for a writ of certiorari to review an order of Edwin M. Daugherty, Commissioner of Corporations of the State of California, denying an application for a broker's certificate. Order affirmed.

Bailie, Turner & Lake and Henry P. Goodwin, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Certiorari. During the years 1922 to 1924, inclusive, petitioner was duly licensed in this state in the business of "acting as a broker for corporate securities." On December 6, 1924, he filed with the corporation commissioner his application for a renewal of his state license to continue in such business. Thereupon the corporation commissioner caused to be served on petitioner a "citation" requiring him to attend before the corporation commissioner at a specified time and place "in the matter of an investigation and examination of" petitioner's "affairs," for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a broker's certificate should be issued to him. Pursuant thereto, and in accordance with the requirements of the "citation," an "investigation and examination" was had, with the result that, on "findings of fact" to the effect that petitioner was of "bad business repute," and on "conclusions of law" therefrom "that the application of M. A. Leach for a broker's certificate should be denied," it was ordered by said corporation commissioner that petitioner's said application be denied, and the issuance of the certificate applied for was accordingly refused.

The proceedings upon which such order was based are alleged by petitioner to have been in excess of the jurisdiction of respondent as such corporation commissioner, and by a writ of review an adjudication is sought from this court that the order issued by such corporation commissioner denying petitioner's application for a broker's certificate, is illegal and void.

Section 6 of the Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, p. 673, as amended by Stats. 1919, p. 231, Stats. 1921, pp. 1008, 1114, and Stats. 1923, p. 87) provides that—

"The commissioner shall examine such application, and shall make such further investigation of the applicant * * * as he shall deem advisable. If, from such examination, the commissioner shall be satisfied of the good business reputation of the applicant * * * he shall issue such certificate. Otherwise, he shall refuse the same and deny the application and notify the applicant of his decision. * * *"

The principal point made by petitioner, as to which there is any controversy by the parties hereto, in substance, is that the provisions of said section 6 of the Corporate Securities Act, which authorized the corporation commissioner to refuse to grant a broker's certificate, on the ground that the corporation commissioner may not be satisfied of the good business reputation of the applicant, are unconstitutional, "in that no rules, regulations, or specifications are set forth in the said Corporate Securities Act defining what shall constitute good business reputation," and that such power, attempted to be conferred upon the corporation commissioner is an unauthorized delegation of legislative authority.

Considering such objection, it would appear that the leading case of Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., 242 U. S. 539, 37 S. Ct. 217, 61 L. Ed. 480, L. R. A. 1917F, 514, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 643, is so conclusively against petitioner's contention that little room is left for argument. That case, like the one at bar, involved the issuance of a broker's license to operate and to transact business in corporate securities under a statute in the state of Ohio, which was similar to the statute here in question. One of the provision of the Ohio statute was to the effect that, if the commissioner having charge of the issuing of licenses was satisfied that the applicant for the license was of "good repute," upon the payment to the commissioner of certain fees, the applicant would thereupon become entitled to be registered as a licensed dealer in securities. Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court, which, in part, was as follows:

"We turn back, therefore, to consider the more specific objections to the law. The basis of them is, as we have seen, the power conferred upon the commissioner, which is asserted to be arbitrary. The objection is somewhat difficult to handle. It centers in the provision that requires the commissioner, as a condition of a license, 'to be satisfied of the good repute in business of such applicant and named agents,' and in the power given him to revoke the license or refuse to renew it upon ascertaining that the licensee 'is of bad business repute, has violated any provision of the act, or has engaged or is about to engage, under favor of such license, in illegitimate business or fraudulent transactions.' It is especially objected that, as to these requirements, no standard is given to guide or determine the decision of the commissioner. Therefore, it is contended that the discretion thus vested in the commissioner leaves 'room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power.' We are a little surprised that it should be implied that there is anything recondite in a business reputation or its existence as a fact which should require much investigation. * * * Besides, it is certainly apparent that, if the conditions are within the power of the state to impose, they can only be ascertained by an executive officer. Reputation and character are quite tangible attributes, but there can be no legislative definition of them that can automatically attach to or identify individuals possessing them, and necessarily the aid of some executive agency must be invoked. The contention of appellees would take from government one of its most essential instrumentalities, of which the various national and state commissions are instances. But the contention may be answered by authority. In Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. Ed. 725, 20 S. Ct. 633, an ordinance of the city of Chicago was passed on which required a license of dealers in cigarettes, and, as a condition of the license, that the applicant, if a single individual, all of the members of the firm, if a copartnership, and any person or persons in charge of the business, if a corporation, should be of good character and reputation, and the duty was delegated to the mayor of the city to determine the existence of the conditions. The ordinance was sustained. To this case may be added Red 'C' Oil Mfg. Co. v. Board of Agriculture, 222 U. S. 380, 394, 56 L. Ed. 240, 245, 32 S. Ct. 152, and cases cited; Mutual Film Corp. v. Industrial Commission, 236 U. S. 230, 59 L. Ed. 552, 35 S. Ct. 387, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 296; Brazee v. Michigan, 241 U. S. 340, 341, 60 L. Ed. 1034, 1035, 36 S. Ct. 561 [Ann. Cas. 1917C, 522]. See, also, Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U. S. 505, 47 L. Ed. 563, 23 S. Ct. 390; New York ex rel. Lieberman v. Van De Carr, 199 U. S. 552, 50 L. Ed. 305, 26 S. Ct. 144."

[1, 2] It is well-settled principle of law in this state that by legislative act a commission or board may be empowered to ascertain the existence of facts, upon the finding of which may depend the right to continue in the practice of a profession or a regulated business. Ex parte Whitley, 144 Cal. 167, 77 P. 879, 1 Ann. Cas. 13; Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 247, 187 P. 965; Hewitt v. Board, 148 Cal. 592, 84 P. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750; Riley v. Chambers, 181 Cal. 589, 185 P. 855, 8 A. L. R. 418. And, as is pointed out in the case of Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., 242 U. S. 539, 37 S. Ct. 217, 61 L. Ed. 480, L. R. A. 1917F, 514, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 643, supra, and authorities there cited, the same rule obtains where the inquiry is to be made by such commission or board preliminarily to the issuance of a license to transact a regulated vocation in the first instance.

The so-called Real Estate Brokers' Act (Stats. 1919, p. 1272) is analogous to the statute here under consideration, in that one of the provisions of the former act, in substance, requires that any person desiring to engage in business as a real estate broker shall make application for a license so to do, and which application shall be accompanied by the recommendation of two real estate owners, certifying to the moral character of the applicant. The act further empowers the real estate commissioner to require "such other proof as he may deem advisable of the honesty, truthfulness, and good reputation of any applicant for a license."

ers' Act, the court said, in part, that the point under discussion was definitely settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., supra, and that while "the act does not in so many words authorize the commissioner to refuse a license if he is not satisfied as to the honesty, truthfulness, and good reputation of the applicant, * * * such authority is necessarily implied." It was therein held that the act was not invalid because of the requirement that persons desiring to engage in the occupation of real estate broker should furnish evidence of good moral character to the satisfaction of the commissioner.

The case of Brecheen v. Riley, 187 Cal. 121, 200 P. 1042, also involved the Real Estate Brokers' Act, but had to do with the power of the commissioner to revoke the license. The court in that case referred to many California authorities on the subject, and held that such power conferred upon the commissioner was valid and in harmony with constitutional rights.

Petitioner cites several cases in support of his contention, including: Abrams v. Daugherty, 60 Cal. App. 297, 212 P. 942; Harbor Commissioners v. Excelsior Redwood Co., 88 Cal. 491, 26 P. 375, 22 Am. St. Rep. 321; Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279, 313, 17 Am. Rep. 425; Schaezlein v. Cabaniss, 135 Cal. 466, 67 P. 755, 56 L. R. A. 733, 87 Am. St. Rep. 122; Ex parte Cox, 63 Cal. 21; People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 6 S. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220; City of Sonora v. Curtin, 137 Cal. 583, 70 P. 674; In re Peppers, 189 Cal. 682, 209 P. 896; Jacobs v. Dental Board, 189 Cal. 709, 209 P. 1006; Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., 242 U. S. 539, 37 S. Ct. 217, 61 L. Ed. 480, L. R. A. 1917F, 514, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 643. But none of such authorities appears to be inconsistent with the doctrine as heretofore announced.

[3, 4] Incidentally, it is urged that, because of the fact that the "citation" which was served upon petitioner contained no direct charge or complaint against him, the corporation commissioner was without jurisdiction to hear and determine the question of petitioner's "good reputation"; and the case of Abrams v. Daugherty, 60 Cal. App. 297, 212 P. 942, is cited as an authority to support the contention that, before the corporation commissioner may be authorized to proceed with a hearing of the nature of that here under consideration, the accused must be duly notified of the express charge perferred against him. It will be noted, however, that the case to which petitioner has referred dealt, not with an application for a license, but with a situation involving the revocation of a license. In that case a property right in the licensee had already accrued, of which he could be devested only by "due process of law." In the instant case, while petitioner at the time his application was filed was a licensee for the current year, his succeeding right to engage in the business as a broker was not vested, but was wholly contingent upon the quasi judicial determination by the commissioner of the moral fitness of petitioner to engage in his chosen vocation. The proceedings looking to the issuance of a license were initiated by petitioner when he filed his application therefor. From that point onward he was obliged to be governed and controlled by the provisions of the statute covering an application for a license, rather than by any procedure applicable to a situation arising after a license had been issued. The statute does not expressly provide for, nor apparently contemplate, any written notice to the applicant that the commissioner will make any investigation or examination regarding the good reputation of the applicant, but permits "such further investigation of the applicant (by the commissioner) as he shall deem advisable." Not only the question of whether or not any "further investigation or examination" shall be had, but as well, in the event that any such investigation or examination should be instituted, its nature and extent are apparently left to the determination of the corporation commissioner. In view of the terms of the statute, the "citation" to petitioner, notifying him of the intention of the corporation commissioner to make such investigation and examination, was ample to direct his attention to the scope of the inquiry to be made. The return to the writ herein, which contains the transcript of the testimony of the numerous witnesses called by petitioner, evidences the fact that no misunderstanding of the purport of the notice was present in the mind of petitioner so as to prevent a full and complete presentation by him of the evidence in his behalf bearing upon the issue of his good reputation.

[5] It is also suggested by petitioner that the findings are not supported by the evidence; but an examination of the reporter's transcript of the proceedings had at the hearing discloses the fact that several witnesses testified, in substance, that petitioner's business reputation was bad. To quote from petitioner's brief herein, the authorities are harmonious to the effect that "the exercise of the power given to the corporation commissioner under the Corporate Securities Act to investigate an applicant for a broker's license is judicial or at least quasi judicial." So much being conceded, the commissioner's finding of fact, based upon the evidence, is conclusive upon this court.

It follows that the order of the commissioner should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

GREENEICH v. KNOLL. (Civ. 2861.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 28, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 27, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸706(5)—Evidence of truck driver's negligence sufficient.

In action for death of 13 year old boy, struck by a truck at night on slippery pavement while riding a bicycle, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding of driver's negligence.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸705(4)—Violation of statute requiring certain lights on vehicles is negligence per se.

Violation of Vehicle Act, § 13, subd. (d), as amended by St. 1919, p. 207, § 10, requiring a truck to carry at the front at least two lighted lamps, sufficient to reveal an object in the road for distance of 75 feet or over, is negligence per se.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸706(5)—Failure to maintain proper lights on truck proximate cause of death of boy on bicycle.

In action for death of 13 year old boy, riding bicycle at night on slippery pavement when struck by truck, failure of truck to maintain lights required by Vehicle Act, § 13, subd. (b), as amended by St. 1919, p. 207, § 10, held a proximate cause of accident under evidence.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸706(7)—Failure of bicycle to carry headlight held not proximate cause of accident as matter of law.

In action for death of boy riding bicycle on dark night, when struck by a truck with insufficient headlights, absence of headlight on bicycle, as required by Vehicle Act, § 13, subd. (b), as amended by St. 1919, p. 207, § 10, which merely requires sufficient light for bicycle to be seen at certain distance, held not proximate cause of accident as matter of law; there being no requirement that light be strong enough to disclose objects in road.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸706(7)—Absence of reflex mirror at rear of bicycle not proximate cause of injury from truck traveling without lights, as matter of law.

In action for death of boy riding bicycle at night, when struck by truck traveling with inadequate lights, absence of reflex mirror at rear of bicycle, as required by Vehicle Act, § 13, subd. b, as amended by St. 1919, p. 207, § 10, held not proximate cause of accident, as matter of law; it being improbable that reflex mirror would have reflected the dim lights of the truck.

6. Negligence ⟸85(1)—Age and mental capacity may be considered by jury in determining infant's negligence.

Age and mental capacity may be considered by jury in determining infant's negligence.

7. Municipal corporations ⟸706(7)—Contributory negligence of deceased boy riding bicycle at night not conclusive.

In action for death of boy riding bicycle at night, when struck by truck traveling with inadequate lights, contributory negligence of deceased held not conclusively shown under evidence.

8. Appeal and error ⟸1001(1)—Jury verdict on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Verdict of jury on issue of fact, based upon sufficient evidence to sustain it, is conclusive on appeal.

9. Trial ⟸260(1) — Refusal of instruction otherwise covered not error.

Refusal of requested instruction, contents of which had been fully covered by other instructions given, held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Caroline Greeneich against Jacob Knoll. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jacobs & Jacobs, of Stockton, and Frank Henning, of Lodi, for appellant.

Steele & Gannon, of Lodi, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff, a widow, sued to recover damages for the death of her minor son, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. She was given judgment, and the defendant has appealed.

Respondent objects to the consideration of the evidence, on the ground that appellant's request for a transcript thereof was not filed in time. To uphold the contention would be to affirm the judgment; no error appearing upon the face of the judgment roll. A decision of the question, however, is unnecessary, as the judgment must be affirmed on the merits.

Plaintiff's son was of the age of 13 years and 11 months, and was in the eighth grade of the elementary schools. He was in charge of a newspaper route, and during the evening of December 9, 1922, he was engaged in delivering papers to residents along Cherokee lane, a paved highway running in a southerly direction from the town of Lodi. He was riding a bicycle without a light or reflex mirror; the light which he had been accustomed to use being then in a repair shop. The evening was rainy, and the pavement was wet and slippery.

Shortly before 6 o'clock of the same evening the defendant's son, of the age of 20 years, was driving one of defendant's trucks in a northerly direction along Cherokee lane. The truck, which was of 2½ tons carrying capacity, was loaded with about 130 empty grape boxes, the weight of the truck and boxes being 7,000 pounds. It was equipped with presto headlights and kerosene dashlights. The gas supply of the headlights became exhausted during the trip and only the dashlights were burning at the time of the accident. The driver of the truck and a boy of the age of 11 years were seated in the cab, which was entirely inclosed, except that the windshield was open to give a better view of the road ahead. An automobile was following the truck at a distance estimated by the witnesses to be from 50 to 100 feet therefrom. Another automobile was traveling south along the same road. When these two automobiles were about opposite each other a loud crash was heard, and two of the empty boxes fell off the truck. The truck continued along the road to the north, but the two automobiles at once came to a stop. The body of plaintiff's son was found lying on the east half of the pavement, the skull and face so crushed as to cause instant death, several teeth lying on the pavement, and blood flowing from the crushed head. The broken bicycle, which evidently the boy had been riding, was lying near the body. "The body was lying just a trifle further north than the bicycle, and the boxes were on further than that, about * * * 3 or 4 feet." A witness who was sitting in his house 237 feet distant from the scene of the accident, with the doors and windows closed, testified that he heard the crash, that "it was a quick crash." None of the occupants of the two automobiles saw the boy prior to the accident. Defendant's son and the boy with him testified that they did not see the boy or his bicycle at any time. The driver of the automobile which had been going south followed and passed the truck after the accident, alighted from his machine, and signaled the driver of the truck to stop, but the latter continued to go north. The driver of the machine again followed and passed the truck and succeeded in halting it near the edge of the town of Lodi. He testified that he asked defendant's son "if he realized * * * he had run over a boy and killed him"; that defendant's son replied, "No; if anybody run over a boy and killed him, you did, * * * ask the little boy if we run over anybody"; and that the little boy said, "No; we didn't run over anybody." C. R. Fisher, a deputy sheriff and traffic officer of San Joaquin county, testified that he tested the dashlights on the truck two days after the accident; that at the time the test was made it was a very dark night and not raining; that the lights were so dim that, sitting in the driver's seat, with the windshield open, he could not see a man standing in front of the machine at a greater distance than about 10 feet. The defendant's son testified that at the time the test was made the lights were in the same condition as they were at the time of the accident. The driver of the automobile which was following the truck immediately before the accident testified that he had been traveling between 20 and 25 miles an hour, that when he saw the truck he slowed down to between 16 and 20 miles an hour, and that the truck "got ahead of me—that is, further than it was." He also testified that his lights were good, that they showed "the truck up plainly," that he saw the sides of the truck and underneath it, and that he did not "see any object along the side of the truck or underneath it or anywhere around it." The driver of the truck, the defendant's son, testified that he could see the road clearly for 40 or 50 feet ahead of the truck, that he watched the road "all the time," that he did not see a boy "on a bicycle or otherwise," that he was not traveling over 15 miles an hour, and that the truck did not run over anything. A witness for the defendant testified that the speed limit of the truck is 18½ miles an hour.

[1-3] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the implied finding of the jury that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the death of plaintiff's son; that if the "boy was killed by the motor truck of defendant at all there were only two possible ways in which it could have been done: One is on the theory that he was towing at the side of the truck, and his bicycle slipped on the wet and slippery pavement and threw him under the truck, and the right-hand wheel ran over his head. * * * The other would be on the theory that the Greeneich boy, just before the accident, was riding in front of the truck." In support of the verdict it must be presumed that the jury found that the boy was not towing at the side of the machine. The driver of the automobile which was following the truck testified that his lights showed "the truck up plainly," that he saw the sides of the truck, but did not see "any object along the side of the truck * * * or any where around it." Adopting the only other theory suggested by appellant, the negligence of the driver of the truck is clearly proved. It was within the province of the jury to accept the evidence which was most favorable to the plaintiff. From such evidence it appears that the heavy truck was being driven at a high rate of speed, over a slippery road, on a dark and rainy night, with front lights so dim that they would not reveal objects more than 10 feet ahead. If such were the facts, then the driver of the truck was grossly negligent. If it be inferred, contrary to the evidence, that the motor truck was "so governed or mechanically constructed or controlled that it cannot exceed a speed of fifteen miles per hour," the Vehicle Act in force at the time of the accident required the truck to "carry at the front at least two lighted lamps which * * * shall be sufficient to reveal any person, vehicle or substantial object on the road straight ahead for a distance of seventy-five feet or over." Stats. 1919, p. 207. The violation of the statute was negligence per se. It cannot be successfully maintained that such negligence was not a proximate cause of the accident.

[4, 5] It is urged that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence "in not having a light or reflex mirror on his bicycle." During the period from a half hour after sunset to a half hour before sunrise, "every bicycle while on the public highway shall carry a lighted lamp visible under normal atmospheric conditions at least three hundred feet in the direction toward which such bicycle is faced, and shall also carry at the rear of such bicycle a reflex mirror or a lighted lamp exhibiting a red light plainly visible under normal atmospheric conditions for a distance of at least two hundred feet toward the rear." Stats. 1919, p. 207. The foregoing provisions do not require that the front light of a bicycle shall be sufficient to reveal persons or objects on the road ahead, as in the case of motor vehicles. If the front light of a bicycle is itself visible from a point 300 feet ahead, it complies with the law, even though it may reveal no part of the road or objects thereon or be visible from the rear. It cannot be said, therefore, as a matter of law, that the absence of a front light on the bicycle in any manner contributed to the accident. It would have been a sufficient compliance with the law to carry a reflex mirror at the rear of the bicycle, its evident purpose being to reflect the light from motor vehicles approaching from the rear and thereby give the drivers of such vehicles warning of the presence of the bicycle on the road. If the lights on the motor truck were insufficient to reveal an object on the road more than 10 feet ahead, it is not probable that a reflex mirror at the rear of the bicycle would have served to prevent the accident. Granting that the reflection of the light from the motor truck upon a reflex mirror could be seen at a greater distance ahead than a person or other object on the road, it cannot be held that the jurors were not warranted, in view of the dim lights on the truck, in drawing the inference that such reflected light would not have been visible to the driver of the truck in time to avoid the accident. If it would not have been so visible, then the absence of a reflex mirror was not a contributing cause of the accident. The court, at defendant's request, instructed the jury that, if the deceased did not carry lights or a reflex mirror, in accordance with the law as herein stated, he was guilty of negligence, and that, "if you believe from the evidence in this case that the death of the said Alvin F. Greeneich was proximately caused by or resulted from such negligence, then you must render a verdict in favor of the defendant."

[6-8] This discussion has proceeded upon the theory that the deceased was of such age as to be held accountable for his conduct to the same extent as one of full age. In determining whether the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, the jury had the right to take into consideration his age and mental capacity. "There is no precise age at which, as a matter of law, a child is to be held accountable for all his actions to the same extent as one of full age. Consolidated, etc., Ry. Co. v. Carlson, 58 Kan. 66, 48 P. 635. In that case it is said: 'The question as to the capacity of a particular child at a particular time to exercise care in avoiding a particular danger, is one of fact, falling within the province of a jury to determine.'" Cahill v. Stone & Co., 153 Cal. 571, 577, 96 P. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094; Mayne v. San Diego Electric Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 177, 175 P. 690. At defendant's request, the court instructed the jury as follows:

"It is the law that such a boy is required to exercise such an amount of care as is in accord with his maturity, experience, and capacity as he travels on a public highway, and that amount of care so to be exercised by him is to be determined by the jury upon the proof of all the facts and circumstances in the testimony; but there is no presumption that such a boy has not the ability to exercise some amount of care as he travels on or uses a public highway. It was therefore incumbent upon said Alvin F. Greeneich * * * to use such care and caution as a reasonably prudent person of the age, capacity, and experience of said Alvin F. Greeneich would reasonably be expected to exercise and use under the circumstances at the time he met his death, considering the amount of traffic on said highway and the condition of the weather and highway at such time. A failure to exercise such a degree of care will be deemed negligence, and if you find from the evidence in this case that the said Alvin F. Greeneich was guilty of negligence, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of his death, then I instruct you that plaintiff cannot recover."

It thus appears that the question of contributory negligence was submitted to the jury in accordance with defendant's theory of the case, and upon instructions framed by his counsel. The evidence is sufficient to support the implied finding of the jury upon that issue, and the verdict is conclusive on appeal.

[9] Appellant complains of the court's refusal to give the following instruction:

"Before you would be justified in rendering a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in this case, you must be convinced by a preponderance of the evidence, first, that the defendant's employee was guilty of negligence in the equipment or operation of the truck in question at the time and place mentioned in the complaint, and, second, that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries complained of."

In other instructions the court told the jury that the plaintiff must prove her case by a preponderance of the evidence, defining that term; that to "constitute actionable negligence there must be causal connection between the negligence complained of and the injury suffered, and for the negligence to be the proximate cause of the injuries there must first appear that it was a duty owing from the defendant to the plaintiff, second, that it was a negligent breach, third, that the injuries resulted as a direct consequence of such breach," and that negligence, "however illegal, in the absence of evidence showing it to have been a proximate cause of the injury complained of, furnishes no legal ground for complaint." Other instructions of similar import were given. It thus appears that every proposition of law contained in the refused instruction was repeatedly stated in other instructions, and it was not necessary to further repeat the same.

The judgment is affirmed.

BURG BROS. v. BERCUT et al. (two cases). (Civ. 5107.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 3, 1925. Rehearing Denied, with Modification, July 3, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 30, 1925.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟸84 — Forfeiture clause held not to affect election of remedies.

In suit by vendor for purchase price of land, additional provisions in forfeiture clause held not to vary rule that vendor of land, who has received part of purchase price, is not restricted to retention of money paid, and is not deprived of right to sue for purchase price, by provisions of such clause.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟸84—Vendor held not deprived of right to sue for purchase price by forfeiture clause.

In contract for purchase of land, provision in forfeiture clause that, in event of default by buyer, moneys already paid shall be applied as liquidated damages, does not restrict vendor's election to sue for balance of purchase price.

3. Frauds, statute of ⟸131(2)—Whether oral renewal contract within statute immaterial where original written contract not superseded or canceled.

In suit by vendor for purchase price of land sold on installment contract, wherein it was alleged that after interval in which no payments were made parties orally agreed that payments should be resumed on consideration of waiver of accrued interest, question whether there was part performance of oral agreements so as to avoid effect of statute held immaterial, where pleadings and proof were sufficient to establish prima facie that original written contract was in force at time of suit, and had not been canceled or superseded.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⟸301, 314(1)—Vendor has action at law to recover debt in which he need not allege and prove contract just and reasonable.

Conceding that when vendor sues in equity for specific performance of contract of purchase of land he must allege and prove that consideration is adequate and contract just and reasonable, vendor need not adopt that remedy, but may bring action at law to recover debt, and in so doing he waives his security, and it becomes unnecessary to allege or prove fairness and adequacy of consideration.

5. Trial ⟸165—On motion for nonsuit, inferences and presumptions considered in plaintiff's favor.

On motion for nonsuit, all inferences fairly deducible and all presumptions fairly arising from evidence are considered as facts proved in favor of plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Francisco County; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Suits by Burg Bros. against Henri Bercut and others and against Peter Bercut and others. Judgment for defendants in each case, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed as to certain defendants, and affirmed as to others.

Wm. T. Kearney, of Richmond, for appellant.

Samuel T. Bush, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. These two actions were tried together, and resulted in judgments of nonsuit, from which judgments plaintiff appeals.

The principal question presented is whether the defendants, as vendees, under installment contracts to purchase land, after having made part payment of the purchase price, may, under the forfeiture clause of said contracts, terminate the same, and, other than forfeiting the money previously paid, avoid further liability thereunder. The forfeiture clause of the contracts reads:

"* * * In the event of a failure of the buyer to comply with any of the terms or conditions of this agreement, and the continuance of such failure for a period of 60 days after performance due, the seller shall be released from all obligations in law or in equity to transfer and convey said property, or any part thereof, and the buyer shall forfeit all rights under this agreement, and all rights to any and all moneys which he shall theretofore have paid hereunder, and said moneys shall be applied as rent for the use of said premises, and as liquidated damages and expenses occasioned by such default, and not as a penalty." (Italics ours.)

Respondents contend in support of the judgments of nonsuit that, on account of the language employed in said forfeiture clause, said contracts were, in legal effect, options to purchase, and not agreements for the purchase and sale of the property (California Land Security Co. v. Ritchie, 40 Cal. App. 254, 185 P. 625; Beckwith-Anderson Land Co. v. Allison, 26 Cal. App. 475, 147 P. 482); that by reason of said clause the vendees were given the right, at any time, to abandon the purchase of said property by forfeiting the moneys previously paid, and that said forfeiture constituted the exclusive remedy of the vendor in case of abandonment; that respondents having in fact abandoned the purchase of said property, said contracts became null and void, and gave to the vendor the right to retain the money already paid, but deprived him of any other remedy (Armstrong v. Irwin [Ariz.] 221 P. 222, 32 A. L. R. 609).

It has been uniformly held in several cases in this state, however, that forfeiture clauses similar in substance and effect to the one now under consideration—except for the portions herein above italicized—are intended for the benefit of the vendor by which, at his option, in case of the vendee's default, he is relieved of his obligation to convey the property contracted to be sold, and may regard as forfeited all payments theretofore made by the vendee, or, waiving the forfeiture, he may require the vendee to complete his contract. The vendee is given no option, but must abide by the election of the vendor (New Richmond Land Co. v. Ivanovich, 52 Cal. App. 222, 198 P. 221; Wilcoxson v. Stitt, 65 Cal. 596, 4 P. 629, 52 Am. Rep. 310; Smith v. Mohn, 87 Cal. 489, 25 P. 696), and that the vendee may not work a rescission of the contract by mere default on his part in the payment of the purchase price (Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 487, 27 P. 429). The rule announced appears to be grounded upon the proposition that the remedy provided for in said clause is but a declaration in express terms of what would have been the legal rights of the parties without such provision. Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 P. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17.

[1, 2] We are unable to agree with respondents' contention that the presence of those additional provisions, hereinabove italicized, changed the meaning of the entire forfeiture clause, so as to remove the case from the operation of the universal rule established in this state by the cases above cited, and thus deprived the vendor of the right, granted him by law, to stand upon the contract and sue to enforce its performance when the vendee defaulted in making payments. An analysis of those additional provisions, in the light of the entire forfeiture clause, shows plainly, we think, that they do not constitute an abridgment of the vendor's right to exercise the option afforded him by law, in the matter of election of remedies, but pertain only to the application of the forfeited payments as a part of the measure of damages that shall be allowed in the event that the vendor elected to terminate the contract; and even in that regard said additional provisions would appear to be of little value, because without them the measure of damages would be the same, and would necessarily include the rental value for the use of the premises during the vendee's occupation thereof under the contract, and also the expenses occasioned by the vendor's default in the performance of the contract.

The case of Armstrong v. Irwin (Ariz.) supra, cited and relied on by respondents, cannot be accepted as controlling the situation here for the reasons, first, that the court there took into consideration, in determining the question of the intention of the parties, other clauses of the contract, and the evidence offered in support thereof, relating to the occupation and cultivation of the farming land which was the subject of the contract, and from which the court was able to find, as a fact, that the payments were required to be made in such sums and at such times as indicated that, in case of default, it was the intention that a relation in the nature of landlord and tenant should arise. That element does not appear in the instant case. The contracts here pertain to unimproved city lots, which, so far as the evidence shows, were not utilized for any useful or profitable purpose during the life of the contracts; secondly, the court's conclusion there in holding that the vendor was restricted to the sole remedy provided for in the contract is partly based upon the use in the forfeiture clause of the term "liquidated damages." In that respect the decision apparently is not in accord with the conclusions reached in the case of New Richmond Land Co. v. Ivanovich, supra (which was not cited in the Arizona case), wherein the forfeiture clause of the contract likewise provided that the forfeited payments should be applied as "liquidated damages," and even went farther and declared that, upon the vendee's default in payment, "the agreement should become void"; nevertheless, the court adhered to the principle established in the earlier California cases, and held that the vendor's right of election of remedies was not thereby restricted, but that upon the vendee's default he might still treat the contract as being in force, and sue for and recover the balance of the purchase price.

For the reasons stated, we are of the opinion that the forfeiture clause of the contracts involved in these cases falls within the scope of the rule stated in New Richmond Land Co. v. Ivanovich, supra, and in the other cases therein cited, and that the vendor, in the instant case, was not deprived, by the terms of said forfeiture clause, of the right to treat the contracts as being in force, and to sue for the unpaid balance of the purchase price.

The other cases cited by respondent, California Land Security Co. v. Ritchie, supra, and Beckwith-Anderson Co. v. Allison, supra, are not in point for the reason that they were cases involving brokers' commissions, wherein the brokers secured from prospective buyers contracts providing, unconditionally, for the forfeiture of a deposit upon failure of the buyer to make the purchase, which clearly showed those contracts to be options to purchase without obligation beyond the forfeiture of the deposit.

[3] The complaints in the present actions set forth the execution, on January 8, 1913, of written contracts for the sale and purchase of the land, fixing a purchase price for each of two parcels of land contracted to be sold in the sum of $2,250, of which amount $225 was paid at the time the contract was signed and the balance was made payable in monthly installments of $40 each, with interest on deferred payments; that between January, 1913, and April, 1916, approximately $928.01, principal and interest, was paid on one contract, and $1,009.40, or thereabouts, was paid on the other contract; that no further payments were made on either contract until the year 1919. It is then alleged that in 1919 it was mutually agreed, in consideration of the waiver of accrued interest, that said contracts "should be renewed and extended," and that the vendees should "thereupon pay in part performance of said agreement of renewal" the sum of $40, and thereafter pay the monthly sum of $40, together with interest and taxes, until the full amount of said purchase price specified in said contracts was paid. The evidence in this regard shows that these so-called renewed agreements were oral, and that thereafter two payments of $40 each were made on both contracts between the months of March and July, 1919, after which all payments ceased.

Respondents contend that proof of part performance of these oral agreements was not sufficient to avoid the effect of the statute of frauds, in that respondents did not take possession of the property contracted to be sold. If, in order to maintain these actions, appellant is compelled to rely upon the oral agreements of 1919, there is much force in respondents' contention, for the evidence shows that neither at the time said oral agreements were made nor thereafter did respondents take possession of the land, in the manner required by the rule stated in the cases of Hambey v. Wise, 181 Cal. 286, 184 P. 9, and Harper v. Goldsmith, 156 Cal. 245, 104 P. 451, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 689, 134 Am. St. Rep. 124; consequently part performance of the oral agreements such as was essential to meet the demands of the statute of frauds was not established. But before appellant may be obliged to rely upon the oral agreements of 1919, the evidence must be such that the court is able to declare as a matter of law that the original written agreements of 1913 were canceled and superseded by the so-called renewed agreements of 1919. The evidence adduced in support of appellant's case fails to establish that fact. On the contrary, a prima facie showing was made that said written agreements of 1913 were not canceled or superseded by the oral agreements of 1919, but thereafter continued to be, and up to the time of the commencement of these actions were, in force. On this point the witness Burg testified that in 1919, after a number of unsuccessful attempts were made to collect the installments past due, he agreed that if respondent would resume and continue to make payments until the full purchase price was paid he would waive accrued interest; that the proposition was acted upon by respondents by making two payments on each contract, after which the payments stopped; that he then considered the oral agreement at an end, and the obligation to pay the accrued interest revived. Burg further testified that the transactions of 1919 in fact resulted in an agreement for "renewal of payment," as distinguished from a "renewal of contract." Upon this same point the witness Bercut testified that in 1919, on the occasion mentioned, Burg offered to cancel all interest up to that time if he would resume payments; that he asked for some time to think it over, and afterwards made two payments; but that he stopped making further payments because he "did not get anything to confirm" what Burg had said in reference to the accrued interest. True, there was some uncertainty on the part of counsel for appellant, during the discussion before the trial court, as to whether the actions were founded upon the written contracts of 1913 or upon the oral contracts of 1919, or both. But inasmuch as the pleadings and proofs were sufficient to establish, prima facie, that the written contracts of 1913 were in force at the time of the commencement of suit, we are of the opinion that relief under those contracts should not have been denied. The question, therefore, of whether or not there was part performance of the oral agreements of 1919 becomes immaterial.

[4] Finally, respondents make the contention that the allegations of the amendments to the complaints, and the proofs by which it was sought to establish the fact that the contracts were just and reasonable, were legally insufficient for that purpose. It may be conceded to be the law, as respondents contend, that where the vendor files his bill in equity asking for the specific performance of the contract he must allege and prove that the consideration provided for in the contract sought to be enforced is adequate, and that the contract is just and reasonable to the defendant (Joyce v. Tomasini, 168 Cal. 235, 142 P. 67), but it is also the law that the vendor is not compelled to adopt that form of remedy. Instead of doing so he may, even where he has retained legal title to the land, bring an action at law merely for the recovery of the debt; in doing so he thereby waives his security, and it becomes unnecessary for him to allege or prove that the consideration for the contract was fair and adequate (Amaranth Land Co. v. Cory, 182 Cal. 66, 186 P. 786).

The form of complaints originally filed here contained no allegations that the contracts sued upon were fair, just, and reasonable, and from which it might be reasonably concluded that appellant had adopted the latter form of action; but after the motions for nonsuit were made, and evidently for the purpose of meeting the objections made by respondents in support thereof, appellant amended its complaints so as to allege that the contracts were fair and equitable, and thereafter reopened its case to offer proof in support of those allegations. Counsel for appellant nevertheless insists that he has never sought and does not now seek relief in equity through specific performance, but that he is suing in law merely for the recovery of the debt. Assuming, however, as respondents assert, that the final position taken by counsel for appellant before the trial court in reference to this matter was equivocal, and assuming further that said amendments and proof upon the issue of the adequacy of consideration were wholly insufficient, it is obvious, we think, that those matters did not operate to destroy the entire cause of action, but merely served to deny to appellant additional equitable relief which he might have obtained through a suit for specific performance, and that such allegations and proof might be eliminated entirely and appellant still be entitled, under the allegations of the original complaints, and in the absence of any proof whatever of an adequate consideration, to relief in law—namely, a judgment for the purchase money. In other words, the matter of the allegations and proof upon the issue of a fair contract was vital only after the court reached the point of granting the relief; and, although equitable relief might then have been denied, the right of the vendor to recover upon the debt would still remain. The trial court therefore was not justified in dismissing the actions upon the ground urged.

[5] Summarizing, it appears that the complaints filed herein were susceptible of being construed as actions at law, instituted by appellant as a vendor, who had retained legal title to the land, to recover the debts represented by the unpaid portions of the purchase money due under written contracts of sale, and for that purpose and upon that theory said complaints were legally sufficient to constitute causes of action. Evidence was adduced in support of those allegations sufficient to maintain the actions, as actions at law, against Henri Bercut, Peter Bercut, and Celine Bercut, who were the original vendees under said agreements of 1913, but not as against their assignee Jean Bercut and Grant Meat Market. Wilson v. Beazley, 186 Cal. 437, 199 P. 772; Tarpey v. Curran (Cal. App.) 228 P. 62. And although it appeared that part of the demand sued upon was barred by the statute of limitations, the statute had not run against the balance; in that state of the record—all inferences fairly deducible and every presumption fairly arising from the evidence being considered as facts proved in favor of appellant (Gregg v. Western Pac. R. R. Co., 193 Cal. 212, 223 P. 553)—the motion for nonsuit, as to the original vendees, in our opinion, should have been denied.

The judgments are reversed as to respondents Henri Bercut, Peter Bercut, and Celine Bercut, and are affirmed as to respondents Jean Bercut and Grant Meat Market.

ALLEN'S COLLECTION AGENCY v. LEE.
(Civ. 4390.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 29, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 27, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜1010(1)—Finding of trial court, supported by substantial evidence, not reviewable.

Findings of fact of trial court, which are supported by substantial evidence, are not reviewable on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⊜931(1)—All favorable inferences will be accorded finding of trial court on appeal.

In determining whether conclusion of trial court is without substantial support in the record, all favorable inferences in support of conclusion will be accorded it.

3. Contracts ⊜88—Presumption of consideration for written contract not conclusive.

Presumption that contract which is in writing is supported by consideration is not conclusive, and evidence may be introduced to rebut it.

4. Evidence ⊜462—Qualified purpose in delivery of promissory note may be shown by parol.

In action on promissory note, parol evidence that it was delivered merely as one of series of memoranda, evidencing steps taken by maker in performance of partnership duties, and did not represent a personal obligation of maker, held admissible in view of Civ. Code, § 3097.

5. Bills and notes ⊜519—Evidence held to support finding that promissory note was not personal obligation of maker.

In action on promissory note, finding that it did not represent personal obligation of maker, but was merely one of series of memoranda evidencing steps taken by maker in performance of partnership duties, held sustained under evidence.

Emmons & Aldrich and T. F. Allen, all of Bakersfield, for appellant.

F. E. Borton and James Petrini, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. A partnership agreement was executed in writing on October 7, 1918, by W. K. Lee, Louis Zimmer, and William Lingg, for the purpose of cultivating, seeding, harvesting, and marketing the products of certain agricultural lands in Kern county. The contract provided that Lee should furnish the lands, which he held under a lease from the Lerdo Land Company, and all stock, teams, and implements necessary for conducting the farming operations; Zimmer agreed to furnish all necessary seed, food for labor, and the feed and forage for live stock; and Lingg agreed to furnish his services. It was further covenanted that from the proceeds Lee should receive $25 per month per team for use of his stock; Zimmer to be reimbursed for moneys invested in the supplies mentioned; and Lingg should receive $3 per day; and after the payment of rent and payment of said allowances, it was agreed that any balance should be divided and paid, one-half to Lee, three-tenths to Zimmer, and two-tenths to Lingg.

All three of the parties entered upon the performance of their duties under the contract, but Lingg withdrew soon after the commencement of operations, and Lee and Zimmer continued to operate together during the years 1918, 1919, and 1920, under the original contract, with the single modification that Zimmer should receive one-half of the proceeds upon distribution, instead of three-tenths. Lee called upon Zimmer from time to time to advance the money with which to purchase the supplies which the latter had agreed to furnish, and each time received a memorandum in the form of a promissory note, which he signed and delivered to Zimmer, as evidence of such advance. It was testified by Zimmer that said notes were the only evidence or account that he had of moneys advanced under the terms of the partnership agreement. During the last three months of the year 1918, there was advanced, as evidenced by four notes introduced in evidence, a total of $1,250; and from January 16, 1919, to and including July 29, 1919, an aggregate of $6,000 was advanced by Zimmer, as appears from ten such notes, also introduced upon the trial of this case. Each of said notes was signed "W. K. Lee." In the month of September, 1919, two promissory notes for $1,000 each, payable to the First Bank of Kern, were signed by Zimmer and Lee.

On the 9th day of January, 1920, a promissory note for the sum of $8,000, payable to L. H. Zimmer, one year from date thereof—with 1 per cent. interest, which Zimmer testified was inserted at the suggestion of Lee, "just to make it legal"—was signed by W. K. Lee, and each of the old notes above mentioned was indorsed, "Paid Jan. 9th, 1920." Zimmer testified that this constituted a settlement of the 1919 business. There were many other transactions, consisting of sales of grain, a mortgage to Zimmer of Lee's half of the product, a bill of sale from Lee to Zimmer of a half interest in growing cotton, and some cash items, the materiality of which is incidental to the principal question presented upon this appeal.

Zimmer assigned the $8,000 note to appellant, for collection purposes only, and suit was brought thereon in 1921. Lee thereafter answered the complaint in said action, denying any indebtedness to Zimmer, and alleging that the instrument sued upon was but one of a series of promissory notes evidencing advances to the partnership by Zimmer; that on or about November 9, 1920, an agreement was made and executed between the parties "under which the affairs of said partnership were settled, and it was understood, stipulated and agreed, among other things, that the said Zimmer should have the interest of this defendant in the crop raised by said partnership, which said interest the defendant thereupon conveyed to the said Zimmer, and that this defendant should pay the rent to the Lerdo Land Company for lease on pasture, for hay on hand, and that said agreement was fully carried out and there were no other, further or different obligations to be paid or assumed by this defendant, and that all advances made by the said Zimmer, under said partnership, including the said advances evidenced by the said promissory note, were settled and discharged as to this defendant, by said agreement." It was further alleged that, "other than said agreement, no accounting of the said partnership has ever been had and no balance ever struck."

The trial court, after hearing the evidence, which consisted principally of the testimony of Zimmer and Lee, and the various documents heretofore mentioned, rendered judgment for the defendant, finding as true the allegations of defendant's answer, and that "said promissory note was not intended to evidence and did not evidence any personal obligation from the said W. K. Lee to the said L. H. Zimmer."

It is strenuously asserted by appellant that the defense that said note was given solely for the purpose of accounting and making a record of advances should not have been allowed by the lower court, for the reason that the same could be maintained only by the introduction of parol testimony tending to change or vary the terms and provisions of an instrument in writing.

There is much conflict as to whether or not the note for $8,000 represented an indebtedness of Lee to Zimmer, or whether it embodied the aggregate amount advanced by the latter to the partnership, under the provisions of the original agreement, following the settlement and accounting of November 9, 1920. However, it appears that Lee used all surplus proceeds of the 1919 crop in putting in the crop for 1920, and that he later turned over to Zimmer everything of value except some small shacks; the parties met at the bank and arrived at an adjustment of their partnership affairs, and the contract of October 7, 1918, was terminated. It also appears, as we have indicated above, that the exact amount of advances in 1919 was $8,000, which was also the amount of the note in suit. It was testified by each of the parties that at the time of said settlement there was a small difference of about $214, for which Lee gave a check, and they signed a written contract declaring that the partnership was dissolved.

[1, 2] The sufficiency of evidence to establish a given fact is primarily a question for the trial court, and if there is substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached below, the finding is not open to review upon appeal. Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 P. 432. And so, the finding in question is conclusive on appeal unless this court is convinced that the conclusion reached is without substantial support in the record, bearing in mind that all inferences favorable to its support are to be accorded to it. Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 139 P. 800; Hind v. Oriental Products Co. (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 438. Hence, here, where a clear conflict of evidence exists, this court is not justified in disturbing the finding below.

[3] Therefore, accepting as we must the conclusion of the trial court that the note for $8,000 did not represent an obligation of Lee to his copartner, but that it was one of a series of memoranda merely evidencing the steps taken by Zimmer in the performance of his partnership duties, under the original contract, it is apparent that the case does not fall under the inhibitions of the rule including parol evidence. The evidence offered was not in conflict with the terms of the instrument, nor intended to contradict, vary, or add thereto. The question was not whether the date, amount, maturity, or other elements of the note were correctly stated therein, but whether it was given by Lee as evidence of a personal obligation, or merely as an acknowledgment of having received certain amounts of money in transacting the business of the joint enterprise. If it be shown that Lee owed Zimmer nothing when the note was given, one of the essentials of the instrument itself would disappear. Consideration will be presumed from the fact that a contract is in writing, but such presumption is not conclusive, and evidence may be introduced to rebut it. Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 307, 13 P. 866.

[4] Section 3097 of the Civil Code expressly provides that "the delivery may be shown to have been conditional, or for a special purpose only"; and in Sayre v. Leonard, 57 Colo. 116, 140 P. 196, cited with approval by this court in Silva v. Gordo, 65 Cal. App. 486, 224 P. 759, it was held that the purposes for which an instrument was executed may be shown by parol testimony. As was held in Muir v. Hamilton, 152 Cal. 634, 93 P. 857:

"However closely the lips of the plaintiff might have been sealed under the law governing negotiable paper if his notes had passed into the hands of an innocent purchaser for value before maturity, as between the original parties to an instrument nothing is better settled than that the maker may show an original lack of consideration, or subsequent failure of consideration. * * * And it is equally well settled that such lack or failure of consideration may be shown by parol."

[5] Differences of opinion as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence are expressed in the briefs, but as we have said, these were questions lying within the province of the trial court. We think the evidence offered was clearly admissible, and upon a careful review of the record upon appeal it appears that the judgment rendered was warranted thereby.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROLLINS v. SMITH et al. (Civ. 4445.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 28, 1925. Rehearing Denied June 15, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 27, 1925.)

1. Assignments ⟸137—Evidence held insufficient to show unsoundness of mind on dates when assignments executed.

Evidence held insufficient to show that deceased was of unsound mind at any of several dates when assignments were executed, or that the delusion or hallucination from which he suffered at times effected such disposition of his property.

2. Assignments ⟸137—Proof of temporary delusions not evidence of mental incompetency to make assignments, where no contention assignments were directly influenced thereby.

Proof that the deceased was suffering from hallucination or delusions at times held not evidence of his mental incompetency to make assignments, where no ground for contending that such assignments were the direct result of or influenced by such delusions.

3. Insane persons ⟸2—Evidence showing weakness of mind and body insufficient to prove insanity establishing mental incompetency.

Evidence, showing that deceased was for some months prior to his death weak in mind and body, is wholly insufficient to prove insanity of such broad character as to establish mental incompetency generally.

⟸For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

4. Assignments ⊂137—Wills ⊂55(7)—Proof that deceased's mind was weak and failing insufficient to establish mental incompetency for making assignments of shares of stock and mortgages.

Proof that person, old and infirm, was at times unable to recognize his friends or transact his regular business, was irritable and ill-tempered, and that his mind was weak and failing, did not establish as a fact that his mental incompetency was such that he could not make a will or dispose of property by assignments, especially where normal habits were shown to have been indulged in as well.

5. Assignments ⊂62—That deceased was suffering from senile dementia did not thereby render him incapable of executing assignments.

That deceased was suffering from senile dementia for some months prior to his death and during a period when the assignments were executed did not render him incapable of making such assignments.

6. Assignments ⊂137—Evidence held not to show undue influence.

Evidence held not to show undue influence by daughter or her husband upon the deceased in making assignments of shares of stock and mortgages, where the only evidence was to the effect that the husband brought deceased an assignment of mortgage for his signature, saying, "Now, Grandpa, I want you to sign this," but signature was not obtained at that time, and only about one-half deceased's property was assigned.

7. Assignments ⊂64—Pressure insufficient to overpower the mind and will of assignor held not undue influence.

Where proof of pressure brought to bear upon one making assignments is insufficient to show that his mind was overpowered and his will overcome at the time he executed the assignments or any of them, there was no undue influence exercised.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Warren K. Rollins, special administrator of the estate of Henry S. Rollins, deceased, against Austin Smith and Florence Rollins Smith. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; MYERS, C. J., and RICHARDS, J., dissenting.

See, also, 189 Cal. 392, 208 P. 280.

Clyde R. Burr and W. W. Hyams, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

James S. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Henry S. Rollins was for a number of years a practicing attorney in the city of Los Angeles. Some years prior to his death he became estranged from his wife, and this estrangement resulted in a legal separation of the parties. They had four children, one son and three daughters. These children were all living at the time of his death. Probably as a result of the differences between himself and wife, the relations between him and three of his children were not of the most cordial character during the latter years of his lifetime. His daughter Florence Rollins Smith, one of the defendants, remained friendly to him during the domestic disturbances in his family, and these friendly relations continued up to the time of his death. He visited her and her family frequently, and in turn she called to see him regularly at his office. After his separation from his wife, he did not live with any member of his family. For about four years immediately prior to his death, with the exception of the last month of his life, he had his lodgings in the rooming house of Mr. and Mrs. Odell, in the city of Los Angeles. He also took some of his meals with the Odells. On March 21, 1921, at the request of Mr. Odell, Mrs. Smith, deceased's daughter, removed him from the Odell house to the county hospital. This was done on account of the enfeebled condition of his mind and body, which rendered him almost helpless and in need of constant care and attention. On account of the crowded condition of the county hospital, he was placed in its psychopathic ward, and a few days later, at the suggestion of the hospital authorities, Mrs. Smith swore to a complaint in insanity against him, and a hearing was had on this complaint on March 28, 1921. This hearing resulted in him being sent to the Glendale Sanitarium, under the immediate care of Jean G. McCracken, the psychopathic parole officer of said county. No judgment or order was made by the court upon the question of his sanity, but the proceedings were simply continued indefinitely and after his death they were dismissed. One of the reasons, and, as we gather from the record, probably the main reason, why he was sent to the Glendale Sanitarium and was not committed to a public institution, was the fact, which developed at the hearing, that he was possessed of property sufficient at least to provide him with the care and attention his condition required, at some private hospital or sanitarium. It does not clearly appear just what property he was shown to possess at that hearing, but the evidence there produced showed that he was the owner at least of a house and lot situated in said city which had been his home on some previous occasion. As far as we are able to gather from the record, it was not shown at that time that he was the owner of any other property. It afterwards developed that he was then and for some time had been the owner of fifteen shares of the capital stock of the Union Oil Company, five thousand shares of the capital stock of the United Oil Company, and two mortgages, one for $5,500 and the other for $2,000, besides the real property above mentioned and other real and personal property. The whole property was of the value of about $30,000. The fact that he possessed this property was not theretofore known by his daughter Florence, or her husband, the defendants herein, or any other member of his family, and by but few, if any, of his near friends.

He was taken to the sanitarium at Glendale on the 28th day of March, 1921. His daughter Mrs. Smith visited him at the hospital, probably the next day after he was taken there, and thereafter on practically every day until the day of his death. No other member of his family visited him while he was at the hospital. On the 31st of this same month, according to the testimony of Mrs. Smith, he stated to her that he realized that he was a very sick man and asked her to stop at his office on her way back to her home and get his mail, also his private papers. He gave her directions where these papers might be found and asked her to bring them out with her the next day she came to see him. On the following day Mrs. Smith brought him the papers, and after he had received them he executed and delivered to her assignments of the fifteen shares of stock of the Union Oil Company and the five thousand shares of stock of the United Oil Company, and gave her a check for the amount of his bank account, which was something over $700. On the night of April 9, 1921, he executed, acknowledged, and delivered to her an assignment of the $5,500 mortgage, and on the 14th of the same month he executed and on the 16th he acknowledged an assignment of the $2,000 mortgage. Two days thereafter he died at the hospital.

This action was instituted by plaintiff as the special administrator of the estate of Henry S. Rollins, deceased, against Florence Rollins Smith and her husband, Austin Smith, to set aside the assignments of said certificates of stock and said mortgages, upon the ground that the said Henry S. Rollins was of unsound mind at the date of said assignments, and upon the further ground that said assignments were procured from said deceased by the exercise of undue influence over said deceased by the defendants at the time of the execution of said assignments. The court found in favor of the plaintiff upon both of these grounds and rendered judgment setting aside said assignments and directing the defendants to deliver to plaintiff the certificates of stock and said two mortgages. The defendants have appealed from this judgment, and as a ground of appeal contend that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the findings of the court that the said Rollins was mentally incompetent to make said assignments, or that defendants exercised undue influence over the said Henry S. Rollins, and as a result of said undue influence said Henry S. Rollins executed said assignments.

The evidence on behalf of respondent in support of the findings of the court that deceased was of unsound mind at the time he executed the various assignments in favor of the defendant Florence Rollins Smith is substantially as follows: Deceased was at the time of his death between 61 and 62 years of age. About a year and a half to two years prior thereto, he became careless about his personal appearance and condition of his person and clothing; he became weak in body and walked with tottering steps, and later on, and up to the time of his death, he walked with his body in a stooped position, shuffling his feet along and dragging one foot after the other. About a year before his death, he lost to some extent control of his bowels and urine. He was unable at times to feed himself and had to be assisted by others at his meals. He became irritable and swore at his food and at his fork when he was unable to properly handle it. He was unable to control his saliva, and the same ran from his mouth down upon the table so that he was forced to eat his meals alone. He either was not able or had not the inclination to undress himself on going to bed at night, and if no one volunteered to assist him he retired with his clothes on, and the next morning his clothes and person would be found in a filthy condition as a result of his inability to control his bowels and urine. He was unable to cleanse himself and had to be bathed by others. His condition was progressive, and about one month before his death the Odells, with whom he was living, were forced to request the defendant Florence Rollins Smith to remove him from the Odell home to some place where he could receive the care and attention his enfeebled condition required. Some months before his death his speech became affected and he articulated with difficulty, so that it was hard to understand him in conversation. This defect in his speech appeared to be caused by the thickening and hardening of his tongue. After being taken to the Glendale Sanitarium, he often was unable to recognize his old friends. On the other hand, he quite frequently recognized them and engaged in conversation with them and those in charge of the hospital. Mr. Odell called to see him on four different occasions. On the first two he failed to recognize Mr. Odell, but on the other two he knew him.

Mrs. Anderson, the proprietor of the Glendale Sanitarium, a witness in behalf of respondent, testified that she cared for him the first few days he was in her hospital, and that—

"He always knew me when I would go in, he would always say, 'Good morning, Mrs.

Anderson,' and call my name, and he told me two mornings what he wanted, things to eat, for the next meal. I fed him his breakfast the first two mornings he was in the hospital. The third morning he ate himself. After the second morning he fed himself as long as he remained in the ward."

He was removed from the ward to a room on April 8th. This witness also related a conversation had with deceased, when he talked with her about her little girl and about the flowers the latter had with her. She also detailed a conversation, had with him after he came to her hospital, regarding some chocolate that she had made for him, in which he expressed himself as liking the chocolate very much and wishing that she might give the recipe for making it to his daughter Mrs. Smith.

At times, while at the Glendale Sanitarium, he appeared to be holding court and was greatly angered at any noise which interrupted the proceedings. Up to a month before his death he went to his law office regularly in the city of Los Angeles, and found his way unassisted through the crowded streets. He had not, however, been able to transact any legal business for a year or more before his death. He was not able even to fill out notary papers on one occasion when a former client called for that purpose. He spent much of his time at his office lying down on an old couch in a rear room.

Mr. Emery, a witness for respondent, who took the acknowledgment of the deceased to the assignment of the Hahn mortgage on April 9th, testified in behalf of plaintiff that—

"The first thing, as near as I can recollect, that Mr. Rollins said was to request all persons except Mr. Smith and myself to leave the room. * * * He remarked to me that his signature was pretty bad. As near as I can remember the conversation that he had, he remarked that his name was not written very well and he was anxious that it be on the line. * * * He looked the paper over, he had it in his hand, and before he signed it he looked it over, and I don't remember the exact remark, but something, that he wanted to be sure it was correctly drawn; and then Mr. Smith told me that Mr. Rollins was careful because he had been an attorney. * * * I did not know any one connected with the transaction prior to that time."

This witness also stated that he observed nothing out of the way or unusual in Mr. Rollins more than that there seemed to be a slight impediment in his speech, but that he had no real difficulty in understanding him.

Two physicians testified at the trial. One of these physicians had examined him at the time of the hearing upon the insanity charge. Each of these physicians gave as his opinion that the deceased, for months prior to his death, had been suffering from senile dementia.

This evidence brings this case squarely within the rule laid down in the cases of In re Redfield, 116 Cal. 637, 48 P. 794; Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 113 P. 130; Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 P. 932; Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 663, 164 P. 1110; Estate of Perkins (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 45. This rule is fairly and correctly stated as follows:

"In considering the evidence it is important, preliminarily, to observe that it is not every form of insanity, not every mental departure from the normal, which destroys an otherwise valid testamentary act. The rule of law is not that no person who is insane may make a valid will, but that the will of no person who, by reason of insanity, is incapable of making valid testamentary disposition shall be upheld. Thus, the wills of aged and infirm people, of people sick in mind as well as in body, are always upheld, if, notwithstanding their enfeeblement, testamentary capacity is shown. So again, it may be well and perhaps soundly reasoned that all persons who commit crime and that all persons who commit suicide are aberrant, abnormal, and therefore insane. But such is not the insanity which the law has in mind. It must be an insanity of one of two forms, either insanity of such broad character as to establish mental incompetency generally, or some specific and narrower form of insanity, under which the testator is the victim of some hallucination or delusion. And, even in the latter class of cases, it would not be sufficient merely to establish that a testator was the victim of some hallucination or delusion to avoid the will. The evidence must go further and establish that the will itself was the creature or product of such hallucination or delusion, or, in other words, that the hallucination or delusion bore directly upon and influenced the creation and terms of the testamentary instrument. It would thus not be sufficient, to avoid a will, to show that the testator believed that the moon was made of green cheese, but if it should be established, in addition thereto, that because of this belief he devised or bequeathed his property in a way which, saving for the belief, he would not have done, a case is presented where the abnormality of mind has a direct influence upon the testamentary act." Estate of Chevallier, supra, page 168, 113 P. 133.

In a very recent case of Estate of Perkins, supra, the same rule is stated in the following language:

"Mental derangement sufficient to invalidate a will must be insanity in one of two forms: (1) Insanity of such broad character as to establish mental incompetency generally, or (2) some specific and narrower form of insanity under which the testator is the victim of some hallucination or delusion. Even in the latter class of cases, it is not sufficient merely to establish that a testator was the victim of some hallucination or delusion. The evidence must establish that the will itself was the creature or product of such hallucination or delusion; that the hallucination or delusion bore directly upon and influenced the creation and terms of the testamentary instrument. The evidence must establish, in addition to the fact of the existence of the hallucinations or delusions, the fact that by reason of these hallucinations or delusions the testatrix devised or bequeathed her property in a way which, except for the existence of such delusions, she would not have done. In short, the abnormality of mind must have had a direct influence upon the testamentary act."

[1, 2] Measuring the above facts set forth in this case by the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in these decisions, they come far short of establishing in a legal sense the unsoundness of the mind of the said Rollins at any of the several dates when the assignments were executed. The only delusion or hallucination under which the deceased was laboring, as shown by this evidence, was that at times he appeared to act as if he were holding court; but this delusion had absolutely no reference to or connection with the disposition of his property, or to his daughter Mrs. Smith, to whom his property was conveyed, or to any of his other children who were excluded from this property. There is no ground for contending that the assignments of stock and mortgages were the creatures of this delusion, or that such assignments were the direct result of, or that they were in any manner prompted, suggested, or influenced by said delusions. That being true, proof that the deceased was suffering from such delusions would not be any evidence of his mental incompetency to make said assignments.

[3, 4] While this evidence shows that deceased for some months immediately prior to his death was weak in mind and body, it is wholly insufficient to prove "insanity of such a broad character as to establish mental incompetency generally." Proof that a person old and infirm was at times unable to recognize his friends; that he was unable to transact his regular business; that his habits were filthy; that he was irritable and ill-tempered; and that in other ways, as shown by the above evidence in this case, his mind was weak and failing—does not establish as a fact that his mental incompetency was such that he could not make a will or otherwise dispose of his property. Especially is this true when the evidence further shows that he often did recognize his old friends and new ones also, greeting them and calling them by name, and engaged in intelligent conversations with them; that up to a month prior to his death he went to his office regularly, and found his way without assistance through the streets of a crowded city; and that in executing one of the assignments, which it was sought to have set aside, he examined it critically before executing it, stating that he wanted to be sure it was correct, and that after signing it he expressed regret that he had not signed his name on the line provided for that purpose, and remarked that his name was not written very well.

"The amount of intelligence requisite for a man to know what he wants to do with his property, or to understand satisfactorily the state of his family and his affairs, is not great. Such an amount of knowledge is presumably not inconsistent with the existence of great feebleness of mind, considerable loss of memory, and even with some insane delusions. In old age all these conditions may exist, and yet a man may know enough, in the eyes of the law, to be able to make a will." Wharton and Stille's Medical Jurisprudence, vol. 1, § 991.

"Extreme stinginess, repulsive or filthy personal habits, ill temper, jealousy, a dictatorial and disagreeable disposition, and a propensity to drive hard bargains do not constitute insanity or unsoundness of mind." Estate of Collins, supra, 669, 164 P. 1112.

[5] It is true that the two physcians who testified in favor of the respondent testified that the deceased was suffering from senile dementia for some months prior to his death, and during the period when the assignments were executed, but it is the well-settled law of this state that persons so afflicted are not invariably rendered incapable of executing conveyances of their property and of transacting business.

"The medical profession may describe such a condition as senile dementia and declare such a person mentally unsound, but it does not constitute the sort of incompetency or insanity which, in the estimation of law and of men of ordinary sagacity and prudence, renders a person incapable of executing contracts or making a will." Estate of Purcell, supra, p. 306, 128 P. 935.

It is our conclusion, therefore, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding of unsoundness of mind.

[6, 7] As to the finding that the assignments were the result of undue influence exercised by the appellants over the deceased, the evidence in the case is even less satisfying. While the deceased was, at the date the assignments were executed, weak in mind and body, and therefore much more susceptible to the influence of others than he would have been had he been a strong and vigorous person, yet we find no evidence whatever that the appellants or either of them, or any person in their behalf, ever exercised or attempted to exercise any influence over him to induce him to execute the assignments. He did not convey to Mrs. Smith all of his property by the assignments he executed in her favor, only about one-half. The court found the Union Oil stock to be worth $2,370 and the United Oil stock $4,200. Assuming that the mortgages were worth their face, and that the bank deposit was $700, the amount of property conveyed by the deceased to Mrs. Smith was $14,770. He had frequently said prior to his death that he intended that Mrs. Smith should have a larger portion of his property than his other children for the reason that she was the only one of his children who remained friendly to him. The evidence fails to show that any of his other children had called upon him or manifested any interest in him for at least four years prior to his death. None of his children, with the exception of Mrs. Smith, even attended his funeral, although they were all living in the city of Los Angeles at the time of his death. Under these conditions, it is not strange nor unusual that he should make a preference in favor of Mrs. Smith over his other children in the final disposition of his property. He evidently intended to make a will, as on one occasion while at the Glendale Hospital he stated that Mr. Lewis, an attorney with whom he had been associated in some legal matters, would be out on the following day to draw his will. Mr. Lewis was at the hospital the next day, which was Sunday, April 3d, and Mr. Rollins said to him:

"I wanted you to attend to making my will, but I don't want to make it up now; there are too many people around here."

It does not appear that any further reference was ever made by him to the making of his will. He died intestate, and the property belonging to his estate, the value of which was in the neighborhood of $15,000, exclusive of that conveyed to Mrs. Smith, would go equally to all his children. Respondent has called to our attention the case of Weakley v. Melton, 189 Cal. 44, 207 P. 523, where the court, without any showing that all of the property of the plaintiff was involved, sustained a judgment setting aside a conveyance to her son upon the ground of undue influence, and claims that the present action falls within the rule declared therein. The facts of that case, however, are entirely different from those in the present action. In that case, the son repeatedly urged the mother to make the conveyance in his favor. Upon her refusal to comply with the request, he patted his mother on the shoulder and said:

"It is all right, Mother; it is just to keep Pearl from making any trouble or getting it after you are through with it."

The trial court found that the mother, in an extremely agitated and nervous condition, and through the exercise of undue influence over her by her son, executed the conveyance, and the Supreme Court sustained the judgment. While there was no proof that the property involved in said action was all of the property of the mother, there was positive and convincing testimony that the son had exercised undue influence over his mother, and that the conveyance made by her was the result of such undue influence. This case was decided, not upon the theory that undue influence would be presumed from the confidential relations existing between the mother and her son, but upon direct evidence that such undue influence had been exercised by the son over the mother, and that she was thereby induced to execute the conveyance. In the present case we have no such direct evidence. In fact, we have no evidence whatever that defendants unduly persuaded Rollins to transfer the stock and mortgages to Mrs. Smith. The only evidence in the case that either of the defendants ever requested Rollins to execute any of the assignments is that given by Mrs. Burger, the nurse, who testified that Mr. Smith said to Mr. Rollins on the occasion when Mr. Smith brought to Mr. Rollins for his signature an assignment of mortgage, probably the Berg mortgage, "Now, Grandpa, I want you to sign this." In attempting to sign the instrument, however, Mr. Rollins apparently failed to properly sign his name, and Mr. Smith said: "Oh, you have spoiled it. I will have to make another copy." The attempt to obtain his signature was thereupon abandoned for the time. This was on April 11th or 12th. The assignment of the Berg mortgage was signed on April 14th. Mrs. Burger was not present when this assignment was executed. She was present two days later when Rollins' acknowledgment was taken to this assignment by the notary Bryant. But even conceding that Rollins signed any of the instruments only after Smith had stated to him that he wanted him to sign it, yet there is no evidence that Smith did any more than make this request or that he accompanied his request with any efforts of compulsion. We think there was an utter lack of proof of any pressure brought to bear upon Rollins by the defendants, or either of them, which overpowered the mind of the latter and overcame his will at the time he executed the assignments or any of them. Unless the proof amounts to this, it is absolutely insufficient to show undue influence. Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 462, 117 P. 532; Estate of Perkins, supra, p. 374.

"The presumption of undue influence is not raised by proof of interest and opportunity alone. In order to set aside a will for undue influence, there must be substantial proof of a pressure which overpowered the volition of the testator at the time the will was made. * * * In order to establish that a will has been executed under undue influence, it is necessary to show, not only that such undue influence has been exercised, but also that it has produced an effect upon the mind of the testator by which the will which he executes is not the expression of his own desires." Estate of Nelson, 132 Cal. 182, 194, 64 P. 294, 299.

The evidence being insufficient to justify the findings of the court, either that Rollins was incompetent at the time of his execution of the four assignments in favor of Mrs. Smith, or that said assignments were executed by reason of undue influence, the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

73 Cal. App. 44

SHELLEY v. BYERS, Sheriff. (Civ. 4887.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 29, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹110—Order denying new trial not appealable.

Order denying motion for new trial is not appealable.

2. Chattel mortgages ⟹129—Pledges ⟹21—Mortgagees and pledgees of personal property do not obtain legal title.

Under Civ. Code, § 2888, neither mortgagee nor pledgee in possession of personal property, being practically the same under sections 2924 and 2987, obtain legal title, but merely right to possession for purpose of security.

3. Sales ⟹6—Whether transaction is sale or pledge determined by circumstances of each case.

Where property is delivered with right reserved by grantor to repurchase at stipulated price within given time, whether transaction constitutes sale or pledge must be determined by the peculiar circumstances of each case.

4. Evidence ⟹452—Parol evidence admissible to explain latent ambiguity in written instrument or real intention of parties if in doubt.

Where written instrument contains latent ambiguity or admits of more than one interpretation, or intention of parties is in doubt, parol evidence of circumstances and situation of parties may be considered to ascertain true intention.

5. Sales ⟹53(1)—Whether unambiguous written agreement is a sale or pledge is for court.

Where written contract is free from ambiguity or uncertainty, whether it constitutes a pledge or sale with right of repurchase reserved to vendor is a question of law for court.

6. Usury ⟹31—Contract providing for transfer of property with option of repurchase at larger figure held to provide for "bonus" rather than usurious interest.

Where agreement provided for transfer of property for $140,000 with an option to repurchase within four months for $150,000, the difference would be interpreted as a bonus for services, where such interpretation was possible, rather than as usurious interest, which would make the parties subject to punishment under Gen. Laws, Act 3757; "bonus" meaning good, or a sum paid for services in excess of what ordinarily would be given.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bonus.]

7. Payment ⟹1(2)—Agreement to "advance" money purports loan.

Agreement to "advance" money for personal property implies a loan with property as pledge, rather than payment of purchase money in sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Advance—Advances.]

8. Evidence ⟹397(2)—Written document apparently complete presumed to contain entire agreement.

Written document appearing upon its face to be complete expression of whole agreement is presumed to include every material item and term of agreement.

9. Sales ⟹6—Agreement to transfer property with option of repurchase held pledge rather than sale.

Written agreement for transfer of bankrupt's property in consideration of advances up to $140,000 for composition of creditors, including option of repurchase within four months after transferee had taken possession by payment of $150,000 to transferee, held a pledge rather than sale with option of repurchase, notwithstanding there was no personal liability on transferors for sum advanced, in view of Civ. Code, § 2890.

10. Fraudulent conveyances ⟹47—Transfer by pledgor of interest in stock of goods without compliance with Bulk Sales Law held void.

Where partners had pledged stock of goods to secure advances for composition of creditors and pledgee had taken possession, transfer by partners of their interest without compliance with Civ. Code, § 3440, held fraudulent and void as to their creditors, notwithstanding they had no possession of property at time of transfer of interest.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by George Shelley against J. C. Byers, individually and as Sheriff of San Diego County, to recover seized personal property. Judgment for plaintiff, a new trial was denied, and defendant appeals. Appeal from order denying new trial dismissed. Judgment reversed.

Joseph Kirk, of San Francisco, and Treadwell, Tompkins & Clark, of San Diego (Joseph A. Pritchard, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Gordon Gray, of San Diego, and Walter Ames (C. C. Carleton, of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [1] This is an action to recover personal property seized by defendant, the sheriff of San Diego county, under a writ of attachment issued in an action against plaintiff's assignors. The complaint alleges that plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the property. The answer denies this allegation. Whether plaintiff is the owner is the prime question in the case. The court found for plaintiff and entered judgment for him accordingly. Defendant appeals from the judgment and likewise from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The latter order is not appealable, and the appeal therefrom must be dismissed.

The facts necessary to an understanding of the case are substantially these: On and prior to February 4, 1922, plaintiff's three sons, Louis Shelley, Benjamin Shelley, and Abe Shelley (hereafter referred to as the "Shelley boys"), were copartners doing business in San Diego at a place known as the Army Department Store, where they were engaged in selling merchandise consisting of groceries, tobacco, shoes, sport goods, men's furnishings, toys, and dry goods. On the date last mentioned, the Shelley boys instituted a voluntary proceeding in bankruptcy in the United States court, and thereafter were adjudged to be voluntary bankrupts. On March 22, 1922, Julius Gollober and I. Rosenberg, residents of San Francisco, and the three Shelley boys, the former as the parties of the first part and the latter as the parties of the second part, executed a written instrument upon the face of which there was what purported to be a "sale" by the Shelley boys to Gollober and Rosenberg of certain property, including all of the stock in trade in the Army Department Store, with a right to repurchase reserved to the Shelley boys. The goods seized by defendant, 1,813 pairs of shoes, were a part of the stock in trade referred to in that instrument. The pivotal point in the case involves the construction of this contract, appellant claiming that it was a pledge to Gollober and Rosenberg of the personal property mentioned therein, and respondent claiming that it was a sale to Gollober and Rosenberg with an optional right to repurchase reserved to the Shelley boys. It will be necessary, therefore, to state the provisions of the contract with some detail.

The instrument in question commences by reciting that the Shelley boys, the parties of the second part, had been adjudicated bankrupts, that they had offered to their creditors a certain composition, and that the parties of the first part, Gollober and Rosenberg, had agreed to advance a sum of money, up to $140,000, to effect such composition. The essential features following such recitals are these: The parties of the first part agree that they "will advance, as soon as required by the referee in bankruptcy to effect said composition, a sufficient amount of money, up to the sum of one hundred forty thousand ($140,000) dollars, as will be necessary to effect said composition. Should any further sum be required for the purpose of making said composition the parties of the second part agree to pay said sum." The parties of the second part "hereby sell, transfer, assign, grant and set over unto the parties of the first part all of the following described property, to wit:" [Then follows a description of the stock in trade in the Army Department Store, certain other personal property, including certain choses in action, and certain real property.] The parties of the second part agree to "execute any and all agreements, papers, deeds or bills of sale that may be necessary to transfer any of said property to the parties of the first part." The parties of the first part "do hereby agree to sell the parties of the second part all of the said property * * * for the consideration of one hundred and fifty thousand ($150,000) dollars, which is to be paid by the parties of the second part to the parties of the first part in the following manner: * * * Immediately upon the confirmation of the composition * * * between the parties of the second part and their creditors, the parties of the first part will at once enter into and take possession of all of the said partnership property," or so much thereof as may be delivered to them by the receiver in bankruptcy upon the confirmation of said composition, and they "will sell to the best advantage all of the said property hereinbefore referred to and transferred to them, excepting all of the merchandise, fixtures and lease of the said store in the Arcade Building known as the Army Department Store, and will apply the receipts from such sales upon the purchase price of $150,000 hereinbefore referred to." The parties of the first part "will, as soon as practicable, reopen said Army Department Store, and conduct a sale therein of the merchandise therein situated, together with such other merchandise as may be placed therein pursuant to the terms of this agreement and operate said store," and they "will advance a further sum of money up to $15,000 for the purpose of replenishing and filling in the stock of merchandise in said store, which said sum shall be paid to said parties of the first part in addition to the said sum of $150,000 before the parties of the second part shall be entitled to delivery of said store, fixtures, merchandise, etc. The parties of the first part shall have the sole control and custody of said business and the exclusive management thereof free from any interference" by the parties of the second part. From the proceeds of the business there shall be deducted: (1) The expenses of operating the business; (2) so much of the balance of said proceeds, not exceeding 25 per cent., as may be necessary to replenish the stock of merchandise; and (3) the balance of such proceeds "shall be retained by the parties of the first part to apply on the purchase price of said store, fixtures and lease [i. e., to apply on the $150,000, upon the receipt of which by the parties of the first part they undertook to resell the property on hand to the parties of the second part]." The parties of the first part "will keep a correct account of the sales, expenses and disbursements of said business, and the parties of the second part shall have full access to all books and records of said business at all reasonable times, and shall receive weekly statements of the business done in said store." Upon the payment to the parties of the first part "of the said purchase price of one hundred and fifty thousand ($150,000) dollars, in the manner hereinbefore provided, from the sale of said property, or from the operation of said business or otherwise and the payment of all moneys advanced by said parties of the first part for the replenishment of stock of merchandise for said Army Department Store, the parties of the first part immediately will sell, assign, transfer and set over unto the parties of the second part all of the said property hereinbefore described then remaining in the hands of said parties of the first part, together with all additional merchandise or property that may have been purchased by said parties of the first part for the replenishment of said stock of merchandise in said store, * * * and will execute any and all notices, papers, agreements, bills of sale and documents that may be necessary to effect said transfer." The parties of the second part "shall have four months from the date said parties of the first part receive possession of said property within which to complete the payments of said purchase price." If at the termination of the four months the parties of the second part shall have failed to pay the above-mentioned purchase price, or if the parties of the first part shall have failed to receive the same from the net proceeds of sales, then and in that event the parties of the first part shall be under no obligation to sell or transfer the merchandise and fixtures or other property to the said parties of the second part, and the agreement shall ipso facto terminate and be annulled, "and said parties of the first part shall retain all moneys taken and received from the sales of said merchandise, stock in trade, fixtures, etc., and said parties of the second part shall have no claims of any kind or character against said parties of the first part for any transfer or sale of said merchandise and fixtures and property or any part thereof." Time is made "of the essence of this agreement."

Though the document states that the Shelley boys "hereby sell, transfer, assign, grant and set over" unto Gollober and Rosenberg the merchandise and other property described therein, the transfer, whatever be its character, was not a transfer in præsenti. Its consummation as a present transfer was dependent upon the receiver's confirmation of the proposed composition with the Shelley boys' creditors. Without doubt, the receiver, at some time, did confirm the composition with the creditors; but it does not appear from the record when it was that the confirmation was made. Until the proposed composition was confirmed by the receiver, there was no consummated sale or consummated pledge or consummated transfer of any character from the Shelley boys to Gollober and Rosenberg, and until such confirmation the latter had no right of possession whatever. The evidence upon the subject of delivery to Gollober and Rosenberg is not very clear. Their manager seems to have taken possession for them on April 14, 1922. At any rate, the parties seem to have treated that date as the commencement of the four months' period mentioned in their written contract. On April 6, 1922, they caused to be recorded in the county recorder's office a notice that on April 14, 1922, the Shelley boys intended to sell to Gollober and Rosenberg the merchandise referred to in the above-mentioned contract. This notice was given pursuant to the Bulk Sales Law, found in section 3440 of the Civil Code. It is probable that the date mentioned in the notice was the approximate date of the receiver's confirmation of the composition with the creditors, and that it therefore was the date when the transfer to Gollober and Rosenberg, whatever be its character, was consummated. Be that as it may, without undertaking to fix the date when the composition with the creditors was confirmed, we shall assume, for the purpose of this decision, that the transfer to Gollober and Rosenberg, when consummated by the receiver's confirmation, was accompanied by an immediate delivery and was followed by an actual and continued change of possession.

Upon several occasions during the four months mentioned in the contract, plaintiff advanced for his three sons certain sums of money to enable them to repay some of the amount which had been advanced for them by Gollober and Rosenberg to pay the claims of creditors. The sums so advanced by plaintiff aggregated about $30,000. On August 14, 1922, the last day of the four months' period, there remained of the $150,000 a balance of about $30,000 uncollected by and unpaid to Gollober and Rosenberg. On that date plaintiff, his three sons, and Gollober met in the store at San Diego. Gollober, on behalf of himself and Rosenberg, in consideration of the sum of $1,000 paid to him by plaintiff, agreed to extend for about six weeks the four months' period within which the Shelley boys might exercise their right to repurchase the property. Thereupon plaintiff orally agreed with his three sons that if he paid to Gollober and Rosenberg the $30,000 necessary to entitle his sons to repurchase, he would own the store and its contents and they would assign it to him. The next day the Shelley boys signed and caused to be mailed to Gollober and Rosenberg a letter as follows:

"San Diego, Cal., Aug. 15, 1922.

"Messrs. Rosenberg & Gollober, San Francisco, California—Gentlemen: When we have complied with our contract with you, concerning the repayment to you for our account in the reorganization of our business enterprise at San Diego, California, known as Army Department Store, you are directed and hereby authorized to make and deliver bill of sale for all goods, wares and merchandise in and belonging to said store and business to George Shelley at Sacramento, California. This letter shall be our full and complete authority for making bill of sale as above directed and vesting title to such personal property in the said Geo. Shelley. Very truly yours, Louis Shelley, Benj. Shelley, Abe Shelley."

Plaintiff never received any bill of sale or other written memorial, either from Gollober and Rosenberg or from his three sons. However, on or about September 25, 1922, he paid Gollober and Rosenberg the balance of the $150,000, and on that date took possession of the store and of the merchandise therein pursuant to the oral agreement which he had made with his sons on August 14, 1922.

On September 26, 1922, plaintiff caused a notice to be recorded in the office of the recorder of San Diego county to the effect that he intended to purchase from Gollober and Rosenberg, and that the latter intended to sell to him, at the Army Department Store, on October 3, 1922, the stock of goods in the store and the accounts, notes, and bills receivable of the business; and on October 2, 1922, Gollober and Rosenberg caused a similar notice to be recorded, stating that they intended to sell to plaintiff, on October 10, 1922, all the stock of goods, merchandise, fixtures, and furnishings of the Army Department Store. It was on October 2, 1922, that defendant, as sheriff, levied upon the shoes under the writ of attachment in the action brought against the Shelly boys by one of their creditors. The plaintiff in that action was a creditor of the Shelley boys at the time when the latter entered into their contract with Gollober and Rosenberg on March 22, 1922.

No notice of the oral assignment which the Shelley boys made to their father on August 14, 1922, was ever recorded in the county recorder's office. Appellant claims that this assignment is within the purview of the Bulk Sales Law, and that since no notice thereof was recorded, respondent acquired no title to the property as against the attaching creditor—that as to such creditor the transfer to respondent is conclusively presumed to be fraudulent and void.

The Bulk Sales Law, found in section 3440 of the Civil Code, provides that the sale, transfer, or assignment of a stock in trade, in bulk or in any manner otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade and in the regular and usual practice and method of business of the vendor, transferor or assignor, will be conclusively presumed to be fraudulent and void as against the existing creditors of the vendor, transferor, or assignor, unless at least seven days before the consummation of the sale, transfer, or assignment the vendor, transferor, or assignor, or the intended vendee, transferee, or assignee, shall record in the office of the county recorder in the county or counties in which the stock in trade is situated a notice of the intended sale, transfer, or assignment, stating the name and address of the intended vendor, transferor, or assignor and the name and address of the intended vendee, transferee, or assignee, together with a general statement of the character of the merchandise or property intended to be sold, transferred, or assigned, and the date when and the place where the purchase price or consideration, if any there be, is to be paid.

Appellant's theory of the case is this: In entering into their written agreement of March 22, 1922, it was the intention of the Shelley boys and of their transferees, Gollober and Rosenberg, that the stock in trade, as well as the other property mentioned in their contract, should be taken by Gollober and Rosenberg as security to insure the repayment to them of the amounts which they agreed to "advance" to pay the Shelley boys' creditors; also, that it was intended that the property should be security to insure the payment to the transferees of an additional sum, $10,000, as a bonus to compensate them for their services in reorganizing the business. Adopting this theory of the transaction, appellant contends that it was a pledge, and that, therefore, the legal title to the merchandise remained in the Shelley boys as pledgors. Hence it is claimed that the Shelley boys' assignment to their father on August 14, 1922, was the "sale" of stock in trade in bulk, within the meaning of the Bulk Sales Law, and was therefore void as to the attaching creditor; no recorded notice of such intended sale having been given. It is contended by respondent, on the other hand, that by the terms of their written contract with Gollober and Rosenberg the Shelley boys incurred no personal obligation to repay any of the moneys which might be advanced by their transferees to pay their creditors; that, therefore, there was no subsisting indebtedness due or to become due from the Shelley boys to their transferees to be secured by a transfer of the property; and that hence the transfer was not a pledge—that it was a sale with an optional right reserved to the vendors to repurchase, if they chose to do so within the stipulated time. Wherefore respondent claims that his three sons transferred to him no more than a mere optional right to purchase the property from Gollober and Rosenberg, and that the transfer of a right of that character is not within the purview of the Bulk Sales Law. The prime question in the case, then, is this: Was the stock in trade, of which the seized shoes formed a part, pledged to Gollober and Rosenberg, or was it sold to them?

[2] Under our statute a mortgagee of personal property in possession and a pledgee are practically, if not identically, the same. Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2987. No legal title passes in either case, but merely the right of possession for the purposes of security. Civ. Code, § 2888.

[3] It often is difficult to determine whether a particular transaction constitutes a pledge or a sale in which the right is reserved to the vendor to repurchase the property at a stipulated price within a given time. Whether it be one or the other must be determined by a consideration of the peculiar circumstances of each case. "A glance at the numerous adjudications in controversies of this kind," says the court in Cornell v. Hall, 22 Mich. 383, "will suffice to show that each case must be decided in view of the peculiar circumstances which belong to it and mark its character, and that the only safe criterion is the intention of the parties, to be ascertained by considering their situation and the surrounding facts, as well as the written memorials of the transaction."

[4, 5] Though the agreement of the parties be reduced to writing, if there be a latent ambiguity therein, or if the language of the writing will admit of more than one interpretation, or if the intention of the parties is left in doubt from a reading of the document, parol evidence of the circumstances and of the situation of the parties may be considered in order to ascertain their true intention; and in this manner an issue of fact may be presented to the trial court for its determination. But where the language of the written contract is free from ambiguity or uncertainty, the determination of the intent of the parties, and hence a determination of the true character of the transaction, i. e., whether it is a pledge or a sale with the right of repurchase reserved to the vendor, presents a question of law for the court and not a question of fact. Palmer v. Gurnsey, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 248. The Supreme Court of Vermont, in a case involving the question whether a deed and a bond given contemporaneously therewith by the grantees to the grantor created the relation of mortgagor and mortgagees, expresses itself thus:

"To ascertain the intent of the parties in entering into a contract or agreement, in a case where that intent upon the face of the instrument is doubtful, or the language used by them will admit of more than one interpretation, the court will look at the situation and motives of the parties making the contract or agreement, its subject-matter, and the object to be attained by it, and will allow these circumstances to be shown by parol evidence notwithstanding the contract itself is in writing. [Citing authorities.] But we discover no ambiguity in the terms of this bond, and no necessity to resort to parol evidence of extraneous facts for a proper understanding of its provisions; and, in such cases instruments of this character should always be construed according to the intentions of the parties, to be derived from the instrument itself." Wing v. Cooper, 37 Vt. 169, 178–179.

[6] With but one exception, presently to be noted, we can discern no ambiguity or uncertainty in the terms of the written contract between Gollober and Rosenberg and the Shelley boys. Therefore, save as to that one exception there can be no necessity to resort to parol evidence of extraneous facts for a proper understanding of the intention of the parties. The exception to which we refer relates to the difference in amount between the maximum sum which Gollober and Rosenberg agreed to advance for the Shelley boys in order to effect the composition with creditors, viz., $140,000, and the sum which was to be collected by or to be paid to Gollober and Rosenberg to entitle the Shelley boys to a reconveyance, viz., $150,000. The difference between these two sums is $10,000. There are four different possible purposes any one of which this $10,000 may have been intended to accomplish. That is to say, it is possible, for aught that appears upon the face of the instrument, that it was the intention of the parties that the $10,000 should represent: (1) An advance in the price over and above that paid by Gollober and Rosenberg, thus making a total purchase price of $150,000 to be received by the latter to entitle their vendors to repurchase; (2) interest on the sums which Gollober and Rosenberg obligated themselves to advance for the benefit of their tranferors in settling the claims of creditors; (3) a bonus to compensate Gollober and Rosenberg for their efforts in reorganizing the business; or (4) a bonus to cover both legal interest and compensation for reorganizing the business. The uncontradicted evidence in the case is sufficient to exclude the first of these possible purposes. A witness for respondent, a bookkeeper who made the first entries in the books opened by Gollober and Rosenberg when the latter took possession of the store, testified that when "setting up" the books under Rosenberg's direction he was told that the amount which Gollober and Rosenberg were "to get back" included "an item of bonus of $10,000." That the $10,000 was regarded as a "bonus" seems to be undisputed. In its strict sense, "bonus" means good. In its popular sense is has several meanings. One of them is that a bonus is a sum paid for services, in addition to or in excess of what ordinarily would be given—an advantage or benefit given in return for a benefit received. Another meaning is that it is a premium paid for a loan. 9 C. J. pp. 135, 136. Whatever meaning be given the word as used by the witness in this case, the expression "bonus" seems clearly to exclude the idea that the $10,000 was intended to represent an advance over and above any purchase price paid by Gollober and Rosenberg for the property. It seems equally clear that it was not the intention of the parties that the $10,000 should represent a premium to be paid by the Shelley boys by way of interest on the sums to be advanced by their transferees to pay their creditors. If that were the purpose of the arrangement concerning the $10,000, it would violate the usury law of this state and would subject Gollober and Rosenberg to punishment for a misdemeanor. Gen. Laws of Calif., Act 3757, p. 1384. An interpretation which would make the lawbreakers of the parties to the transaction should be rejected if there be another possible and reasonable interpretation, as there unquestionably is. Either the third or the fourth of the above-mentioned possible purposes for the arrangement will reasonably explain why it was that the parties added the sum of $10,000 to the $140,000 so as to make $150,000 the amount to be collected by or paid to Gollober and Rosenberg as a condition precedent to a retransfer by them. As between the third and fourth possible purposes for this difference of $10,000, we think the latter is the one which probably represents the real intent of the parties. That is to say, from the testimony of respondent's own witness, the bookkeeper, as well as from the circumstances disclosed by the writing itself, we are of the opinion that the $10,000 was intended as a bonus to cover both compensation to Gollober and Rosenberg for their business sagacity and trouble in reorganizing the business and interest at the legal rate on the sums which they agreed to advance for the benefit of their transferors.

[7, 8] Gollober and Rosenberg agreed to "advance" a sufficient amount of money, up to $140,000, to effect the composition with the Shelley boys' creditors. This word "advance," when used in relation to advances of money by one person for the benefit of another, usually implies a loan. 2 C. J. 32. "The import of the word 'advance' " says the court in Morrow v. Turney, 35 Ala. 131, 137, "is such as rather to indicate that there was a loan, than a payment of purchase money." Since the money paid to the creditors by Gollober and Rosenberg was money advanced by them for the benefit of the Shelley boys, a promise on the part of the latter to repay the sums so advanced, with legal interest thereon, as well as a promise to pay Gollober and Rosenberg for the services performed by them in operating the store and in reorganizing the business, would be implied in fact as well as in law, and they would be personally liable therefor (Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 686, 691, 96 P. 357; Todd v. Todd, 164 Cal. 255, 258, 128 P. 413), provided such personal liability is not excluded by the terms of their written contract.

The writing executed by the Shelley boys and Gollober and Rosenberg is silent with respect to the assumption by the former of any personal obligation to repay the advances made on their behalf by the latter. The instrument also is silent as to any compensation, eo nomine, to be paid to Gollober and Rosenberg for their services in operating the store and in reorganizing the business. The document appears upon its face to be a complete expression of the whole agreement between the parties. This being the case, it is to be presumed that the parties introduced into their writing every material item and term of their contract. Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 330, 26 P. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469. We shall assume, therefore, for the purpose of this decision, that no personal obligation rested upon the Shelley boys to repay any part of the $150,000 upon the receipt of which by Gollober and Rosenberg the latter undertook to reconvey so much of the property as then remained on hand.

[9] The fact that the Shelley boys incurred no personal obligation to pay the $150,000, or any part thereof, is the main prop to respondent's argument that the transaction was a sale and not a pledge. Without doubt, the absence of such personal liability is a circumstance of no inconsiderable importance in settling that question, but it is by no means a determinative circumstance. It is of course true, as respondent claims, that if there be no debt there can be no pledge or mortgage. At all events, it is well settled that the existence of a pledge or of a mortgage implies an obligation to be secured thereby; but what the remedies may be for enforcing it is quite another question. There may be a debt quoad the security, but not in respect to any personal remedy for its enforcement. That is to say, while the essential feature necessary to create a pledge or a mortgage is that the property pledged or mortgaged should be intended as security, personal liability on the part of the pledgor or mortgagor for the debt or other obligation secured by the pledge or mortgage is not an indispensable requisite. Wing v. Cooper, supra; Pioneer Gold Min. Co. v. Baker (C. C.) 10 Sawy. 539, 23 F. 258; Mobile Building & L. Ass'n v. Robertson, 65 Ala. 382, 389; Kraemer v. Adelsberger, 122 N. Y. 467, 25 N. E. 859; Matthews v. Sheehan, 69 N. Y. 585; Brown v. Dewey, 1 Sandf. Ch. R. 56, reversed in 2 Barb. 28, not upon the law but upon the facts, as is stated in Matthews v. Sheehan, supra; Mills v. Darling, 43 Me. 565; Fisk v. Stewart, 24 Minn. 97; Rice v. Rice, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 349; Campbell v. Dearborn, 109 Mass. 130, 12 Am. Rep. 671; Cook v. Johnson, 165 Mass. 245, 43 N. E. 96; note on pp. 390 et seq. L. R. A. 1916B; note to Wells v. Flynn, 17 A. L. R. 718. It is expressly declared in this state by statutory enactment that—

"The creation of a lien does not of itself imply that any person is bound to perform the act for which the lien is a security." Civ. Code, § 2890.

The rule is expressed in Wing v. Cooper, supra, as follows:

"It is said, on the part of the defendants, that there was no debt existing from Briggs to them; but there was a debt which was capable of being enforced against the property which Briggs conveyed to them, and the absence of any personal liability on the part of Briggs to pay the money advanced or to be advanced by them in satisfaction of the levies is not a conclusive test whether the conveyance was intended to be absolute, or a security merely. It was not necessary that there should be a liability on the part of Briggs to pay, as well as on the part of his grantees to release or reconvey on being paid, to constitute the transaction a mortgage; yet the want of this mutuality is proper to be considered in determining whether the transaction was a mortgage or not, though it is not of itself decisive. If a debt capable of being enforced in any way against either the person or the property [italics ours] of Briggs was purposely kept on foot, and if the conveyance by him was intended to secure the payment of that debt, the transaction was in fact a mortgage, and the estate was defeasible and redeemable, although there was no covenant or other personal obligation on his part to pay the money."

In Pioneer Gold Min. Co. v. Baker, supra, Judge Sabin, speaking of a situation somewhat analogous to that presented here, said:

"* * * A mortgage may be created as well without as with an accompanying personal obligation of the mortgagor to pay the debt secured, or attempted to be secured, thereby. In the one case the property alone is charged with the lien—is looked to solely by the mortgagee out of which to make his lien; in the other, he has the additional security of the personal obligation of the mortgagor. A debt chargeable only against certain property is, in effect, simply a debt with limited means of satisfaction or enforcement; the value of the property charged with the indebtedness is the measure of the security afforded. And this is exactly the security taken by Baker in 1874, when he sold this mine for the balance of the purchase money, $125,000."

The law on this subject is well stated by Judge Parker in Kraemer v. Adelsberger, supra. He says:

"In determining whether a contract is to be treated as a mortgage, or a conditional sale, or a conveyance in fee, courts have commented upon the presence or absence of a various particulars which commonly accompany mortgages, but the essential feature necessary to create a mortgage is that it should be a conveyance intended as a security. Such evidently was the purpose of the contract before us, but the plaintiff calls attention to the absence of a covenant to pay the amount of the indebtedness. It was agreed that interest should be paid on the full amount; that after sales should be made, the proceeds should be applied in reduction of the amount of the then existing obligation, and that the firm would pay the difference if any should remain. So that, while there was not an agreement in terms to pay the entire indebtedness, such may be said to have been the purpose and effect of the agreement; but in any event the absence of such a covenant is not conclusive, but is a circumstance to be considered in construing the contract." (Italics ours.)

The same learned jurist, in Hughes v. Harlam, 166 N. Y. 427, 60 N. E. 22, employed this language:

"That the agreement expresses an intent to transfer the property absolutely to Harlam upon Hughes' death without paying the loan is unquestionably true, but that fact, considered with the other provisions of the agreement, does not necessarily give to the entire agreement the character of a conditional sale, for a sale by the one party and a purchase by the other was not the leading object of the transaction. Indeed, the agreement clearly indicates that the one did not intend to buy, nor the other to sell, unless it should turn out that the borrower should not be able to pay the loan before his death. * * * It seems to us that the main purpose of the parties to the agreement, as manifested by its terms, was on the one part to procure a loan of money and on the other to assure its repayment, and it has been a long established rule in equity that the 'court looks beyond the terms of the instrument to the real transaction, and when that is shown to be one of security, and not of sale, it will give effect to the actual contract of the parties.' * * * So while it is true, as counsel for the appellant so ably argues, that this agreement contains elements of both mortgage and conditional sale, still, as the leading purpose of the instrument [italics ours] is that of security, it must be governed by those principles which courts of equity have long applied to agreements for security."

The cases cited by respondent present no conflict with these views. Take, for example, Henley v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 22—a case upon which respondent places much reliance. That was a case where the evidence clearly and conclusively disclosed a deliberate intention on the part of both parties to the transaction that it should be a sale and not a mortgage. No such situation exists here.

If, now, the writing which was executed by Gollober and Rosenberg and the three Shelley boys on March 22, 1922, be examined in the light of the foregoing, it will, we think, clearly appear that the parties intended that the arrangement should operate as a pledge of the personal property. It doubtless is true that the document contains elements of both a pledge and a sale. But a careful consideration of all its terms leads the mind irresistibly to the conclusion that the leading purpose of the paries, as manifested by their writing, was, on the part of the Shelley boys, to enjoy the benefit of certain sums of money to be advanced for them in satisfying the demands of their creditors, and, on the part of Gollober and Rosenberg, to assure the repayment to them of an amount which would reimburse them for the sums they were to advance to pay the creditors, and at the same time to compensate them for their services in operating the store and in reorganizing the business.

That the parties intended the property to be held by Gollober and Rosenberg as security is unmistakably disclosed by certain strongly marked features shown on the face of the writing itself. In the first place, the transaction had its inception in a negotiation for a loan, or for what is the equivalent of a loan, to the Shelley boys, even if the latter did not become personally liable therefor. This is one of the principal indicia of a pledge. "As a general rule," says the court in Holmes v. Grant, 8 Paige (N. Y.) 258, "where the contract and conveyance are made upon an application for the loan of money, this court for the purpose of preventing usury and extortion will construe it to be a mortgage, whenever the person to whom the application for the loan is made agrees to receive back the money advanced, with legal interest, or a larger amount [italics ours], and to reconvey the property within a specified time thereafter, whatever may be the form of the written contract; if it is apparent that the real transaction was a loan of money." In Turner v. Wilkinson, 72 Ala. 361 (cited with approval in Douglass v. Moody, 80 Ala. 61, and Daniels v. Lowery, 92 Ala. 519, 8 So. 352), the court in considering the tests to determine the true character of such contracts, says:

"Although it is difficult to establish fixed rules, by which to determine whether a particular transaction is a mortgage or a conditional sale, there are some facts which are regarded as of controlling importance in determining the question. Did the relation of debtor and creditor exist, before and at the the time of the transaction? or, if not, did the transaction commence in a negotiation for a loan of money? Was there great disparity between the value of the property, and the consideration passing for it? Is there a debt continuing, for the payment of which the vendor is liable? If any one of these facts is found to exist, in a doubtful case, it will go far to show a mortgage was intended." (Italics ours.)

Another circumstance which lends much strength to the view that the property was transferred to Gollober and Rosenberg to be held by them as "security" is the fact that the transfer to them lacks the leading and characteristic element of the usual sale, i. e., a definite amount agreed upon by the parties as a price to be paid by Gollober and Rosenberg. Those gentlemen did not bind themselves to advance $140,000 in any event. Their agreement was to advance to the creditors of the Shelley boys a sufficient amount to effect the composition "up to the sum of $140,000." That is to say, while they were not obliged to advance more than a maximum of $140,000, their obligation would be fulfilled upon their paying to the creditors an amount sufficient to effect the composition, though it should turn out to be less than $140,000. Indeed, the bookkeeper's testimony tends to show that, all told, Gollober and Rosenberg advanced to the creditors but $68,000.

Another circumstance which very materially strengthens the view that the transaction was a pledge is the fact that Gollober and Rosenberg obligated themselves to apply the proceeds of the business to the payment of the expenses incurred in its operation. If the transaction were a sale, the proceeds of the business would belong to Gollober and Rosenberg, to do with as they pleased. Another circumstance is this: Under the terms of the contract Gollober and Rosenberg were to retain all moneys received by them from the sales of merchandise only in the event that they did not collect, or were not paid, the stipulated amount, $150,000, within the agreed time. As a corollary to this provision, it necessarily follows that if Gollober and Rosenberg did succeed in collecting, or were in fact paid, the full amount within the agreed time, then the other parties to the contract, the Shelley boys, were to receive the avails then on hand of all property and merchandise previously sold by Gollober and Rosenberg. This circumstance shows that it was not the intention of the Shelley boys to part with any more of their interest in the property than might be sufficient to satisfy the amount due Gollober and Rosenberg for the advances made by them in liquidating the claims of creditors, plus the "bonus" of $10,000. Palmer v. Gurnsey, supra. There are other circumstances disclosed by the written contract which point unerringly to a pledge and not a sale, but we do not find it necessary further to advert to them.

Thus far we have confined ourselves to a consideration of the terms of the written instrument itself, aided only by such oral evidence as tends to explain why it was that Gollober and Rosenberg, though agreeing to make advances up to $140,000, were to receive $150,000. But if we were to consider all of the oral testimony bearing upon the question of intention—and that testimony is very meager—we still would be compelled to arrive at the conclusion that it was the intention of the parties that the property transferred to Gollober and Rosenberg should be held by them for the purpose of security, and that as to the personal property the transaction was a pledge. Respondent testified that on August 14, 1922, when a balance of about $30,000 remained uncollected by and unpaid to Gollober and Rosenberg, his three sons told him that "the store was small security for that $30,000 which they owed Gollober." Asked if on August 14, 1922, he considered that his three sons owned the store subject to a "lien" of Gollober and Rosenberg for the $30,000, together with such amount as his sons owed him, respondent answered, "I believe yes, they would be." True, respondent and his three sons seem to have thought that if the $150,000 were not collected by or paid to Gollober and Rosenberg before the expiration of the stipulated time the latter would own the property. But on the other hand, respondent and his three sons seem to have thought that immediately upon the $150,000 being collected by or paid to Gollober and Rosenberg, within the agreed time, respondent, as the transferee of his sons, was entitled to take possession and claim the property without any action whatever on the part of Gollober and Rosenberg, such as the execution to him of a bill of sale by the latter. However, we do not think that much significance should be attached to any of these circumstances. It is the intention of the parties at the inception of the transaction which is to determine its character, and that intention is to be ascertained from the language of their instrument, aided, if need be, by the then existing circumstances. "The intention of the parties," says the court in Mobile Building & L. Ass'n v. Robertson, supra, "at the inception and consummation of the transaction—the relation it was contemplated they should bear to each other—is the criterion by which the character of the contract must be determined. There is much evidence introduced, having a tendency to show that the transaction was regarded in the one light by the association, and in the other by the appellee. To this evidence, but little, if any importance, can be attached. It is not the intention of the one party, dissociated from the intention of the other, which is to be ascertained. It is their concurring intention, when the transaction ripened into the contract, which must be ascertained, and which must prevail." And in Williams v. Chadwick, 74 Conn. 252, 50 A. 720, the court says:

"Whether or not the parties intended a particular transfer of property to be a mortgage is to be determined by the character and language of the instruments intentionally executed by them, and by the surrounding facts, rather than by the belief of the parties as to the effect of their acts."

[10] Concluding, as we do, that it must be held as a matter of law, from the face of the instrument itself, that the transaction was a pledge and not a sale, and that as a consequence the legal title remained all the while in the Shelley boys, we come now to another point presented to us for consideration. It is claimed by respondent that even if the ownership did remain in his three sons, their transfer to him is not within the purview of the Bulk Sales Law because the property was not at that time in their possession or under their control. We are unable to agree with this contention. Section 3440, which declares what transfers are deemed to be constructively fraudulent, deals with two major classes of conveyances. The first class includes those transfers of personal property which are conclusively presumed to be fraudulent because not "accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by actual and continued change of possession." As to such transfers the statute expressly declares that the presumption of fraud attaches "if" the transfer is "made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property." This language implies, as a necessary corollary, the proposition that the transfers dealt with in the first part of the section are not presumptively fraudulent or void if made by persons not having at the time the possession or control of the property. The second major class of transfers which the section declares to be constructively fraudulent are sales and transfers of "a stock in trade in bulk." It is this latter class of transfers which is covered by what is commonly known as the Bulk Sales Law, adopted in 1903 when the Legislature amended section 3440 by adding the provisions relative to the sale of "stock in trade in bulk." Unlike the restrictions found in the first part of the section, those added in 1903 do not exempt from their operation bulk sales of stock in trade of which the vendor has not the possession or control. That is to say, the language of the Bulk Sales Law is broad enough to include every sale, transfer, or assignment of stock in trade in bulk, regardless of whether the vendor has or has not the possession or control of the property. An interpretation which would read into this part of the section a provision that every sale in bulk made without the requisite statutory notice is nevertheless valid as against existing creditors if the vendor, transferor, or assignor has not at the time the actual possession or control of the stock in trade, regardless of what the other circumstances might be, not only would overturn the Bulk Sales Law as it is written, but would leave creditors helpless; for in the main such creditors could not protect themselves against an arrangement which although secret was lawful. No one could safely give credit on the faith of the debtor's title to his property, however valuable that title might be; as, for example, where the value of a pledgor's merchandise exceeds the amount of the debt secured by the pledge. A door to fraud would be opened and many would enter, to the injury of credit and the confusion of business.

No case directly in point has been called to our attention. The only one which we have been able to discover that even remotely approaches the point is Krower v. Martin (Tex. Civ. App.) 184 S. W. 511. In that case, however, not only was possession delivered to the mortgagees, but the articles were completely segregated from the mortgagor's "stock of merchandise." The articles remained with the mortgagees until the mortgagor sold them to the appellee. Never after they were mortgaged did they become a part of the stock of goods from which they were taken, and never thereafter were they exposed to sale. As a consequence, they were no part of a merchant's stock in trade or stock of merchandise at the date of the sale to the appellee, and hence that sale was not within the terms of the Bulk Sales Law. No such situation exists in the case now before us. It has been said that the scope and purpose of these laws is to regulate the sale in bulk of such articles as constitute the "stock in trade" or "stock of merchandise" which is kept by a merchant for sale in the ordinary course of business. Here the articles to which respondent acquired the pledgors' title continued to be the "stock in trade" of the pledgors as well after as before their transfer to the pledgees. There was no segregation of the stock in trade when it was pledged to Gollober and Rosenberg. It remained in the Army Department Store, and the Shelley boys continued to be the owners thereof, subject only to he lien and the right of possession held by Gollober and Rosenberg as pledgees. The store and its contents were delivered into the possession of Gollober and Rosenberg not only to protect their rights as pledgees, but also to enable them to reorganize the business for the benefit of the pledgors in case the property should be redeemed from the pledge. This is indicated by many circumstances in the case, among which is the significant language of the pledgors in their letter of August 15, 1922, to the pledgees, in which they say:

"When we have complied with our contract with you concerning the repayment to you for our account in the reorganization of our business at San Diego," etc.

Save that the store was managed by the pledgees under the personal direction of their own manager, sent by them from San Francisco to take possession of the store and to operate it, the business continued as before without any radical outward sign of change.

In view of the circumstances above narrated, the purpose of the Bulk Sales Law to protect existing creditors would be entirely frustrated if it should receive an interpretation that would uphold the Shelley boys' transfer to their father of their title to this stock in trade, in the absence of any recorded notice thereof. That this is so will be seen from a consideration of the following: The attaching creditor is conclusively presumed to have had notice of his debtors' transfer of the property to Gollober and Rosenberg as pledgees; for notice of that intended transfer was given in the manner required by the Bulk Sales Law. Though charged with notice of that transfer—in reality a pledge—the creditor took no steps to attach the property before the consummation of the transfer to Gollober and Rosenberg. It is quite possible that his failure to do so at that time was due to a belief on his part that the transferees would successfully reorganize the business, realize from their sales of the real property and from their conduct of the business the $150,000 upon the receipt of which they were to reconvey the property on hand to the Shelley boys, that the latter would thus become reinvested with an unincumbered title at the end of the four months, and that, as a consequence, his position, as a creditor of the Shelley boys, would be as good as, if not better than, it was before the transfer to Gollober and Rosenberg and the reorganization of the business by them. Having refrained from attaching the property prior to the consummation of that transfer, the attaching creditor would now be the victim of a grave injustice if he should lose his right to question the validity of the transfer to respondent merely because his debtors, instead of retaking the manual possession and the personal control of the stock in trade, saw fit to divert that possession and control from a channel leading toward themselves to one which led to their father, the respondent here.

It follows from what we have said that the attempted transfer of the personal property to respondent is conclusively presumed to be fraudulent, and therefore void as against nonconsenting creditors. There was therefore nothing in the transaction which militated against the right of appellant as sheriff to seize the property under the writ of attachment which had been placed in his hands.

The appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is dismissed. The judgment is reversed.

In re JOLLY'S ESTATE.

CAVANAUGH et al. v. REA et al.

(L. A. 8290.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1925. Rehearing Denied Aug. 27, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸989—To determine whether wife's estate was community property, consideration must be given to well-established presumptions of law in weighing evidence.

In weighing evidence on appeal from order directing distribution of wife's estate as community property, consideration must be given to all presumptions of law affecting acquisition or possession of property by spouse during coverture, and increase thereof, as well as property found in possession of survivor, in the light of attendant circumstances.

2. Husband and wife ⟸262(1)—Presumption that property acquired after marriage is community property, unless controverted, is binding upon the court or jury.

The presumption raised by Civ. Code, § 164, that property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, or both, is community property, is a form of evidence under Code Civ. Proc. § 1957, and may be controverted by other evidence, direct or indirect; but, unless so controverted, the court or jury is bound to find according to the presumption.

3. Husband and wife ⟸262(1)—Presumption of community interest in property overcome only by clear and satisfactory proof to contrary.

The presumption that property acquired after marriage is community property can be overcome only by the production of clear and satisfactory proof that the property in question was separate property of one spouse.

4. Husband and wife ⟸264—Evidence held to warrant inference of fact that wife's estate accumulated during coverture.

Evidence held to support inference of fact that deceased wife's estate was accumulated during coverture.

5. Husband and wife ⟸264—Finding that wife's estate was not community property held unwarranted.

Property in possession of one of the spouses must be presumed to be community, unless a better right can be established by the one claiming it to be his or her separate property, and therefore, in an appeal from an order distributing deceased wife's estate, evidence held not to warrant a finding that deceased wife's estate was not community property, for failure to prove affirmatively that same was acquired as her separate estate.

6. Husband and wife ⟸254—Real property acquired after husband's death held community property, where purchased with community funds.

Where the evidence showed that the wife possessed no separate property before or at the time of marriage or acquired any after marriage, held, that certain real property purchased by wife after husband's death was so purchased with community funds, and was therefore community property.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Margaret Jolly, deceased, contested by Catherine Cavanaugh and others against Sarah Rea and others. From an order directing distribution in favor of the contestees, contestants appeal. Reversed.

F. L. Richardson, of San Diego, for appellants.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, Hamilton & Lindley, and Richard M. Kew, all of San Diego, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. This is a contest between the heirs at law of John Jolly and Margaret Jolly, husband and wife, both deceased, as to whether the property, real and personal, ordered distributed, was the separate property of Margaret Jolly or was the community property of John Jolly and his said wife, Margaret. No children were born as the issue of the marriage. The judge of the probate court found that John Jolly died on or about the 11th day of February, 1912, leaving no estate whatever, and that Margaret Jolly died intestate on April 4, 1922, leaving as her separate estate, the property in controversy, consisting of real property of the value of $9,000 and money in bank and other personal property of the value of about $19,418.90, and accordingly ordered that distribution of the whole of said estate be made to the heirs at law of said Margaret Jolly to the exclusion of the heirs of said predeceased husband, John Jolly. The appeal is taken from that order. It is the claim of appellants that the estate is the community property of said marriage, and one half thereof should be distributed to the heirs at law of John Jolly, and the other half to the heirs of Margaret Jolly, as provided by section 1386, subd. 8, Civil Code.

The evidence in the case as to many of the material facts ordinarily provable in this class of cases was not as fully developed as might be desired, and therefore the determination of the issue must rest largely upon legal presumptions and inferences arising from the uncontradicted facts of the case. No evidence was offered by respondents tending to impeach the claim of the heirs at law of John Jolly, except two deeds of real property conveying certain lots in the city of San Diego to Margaret Jolly, executed in the years 1918 and 1922, respectively. These conveyances were made a number of years after the death of the husband, John Jolly, and within 4 and 2 years, respectively, prior to the death of Margaret.

The depositions of Peter Jolly and Mary Duffy, brother and sister, respectively, of John Jolly, deceased, were received in evidence. These depositions furnish some assistance in determining the question as to the period in which the property inventoried as the separate property of the estate of Margaret Jolly was acquired. A determination of the issue is also aided by the law of presumptions as defined by sections 163, 164, Civil Code. The history of the marriage of John Jolly and his wife (formerly Margaret Downey) and the situation of said parties at the time of and subsequent to said marriage, as detailed by the two witnesses at the hearing, is necessary for the application of the rules of law which we think must control the decision.

The evidence shows that the parents of both spouses were near neighbors, residing at Cleator Moor, England, where John Jolly and Margaret Downey spent their earlier years. Margaret's father died in her early girlhood, leaving the mother, apparently, as the breadwinner. Some mention is made of a sister and a brother, but the evidence indicates that the two last referred to were not permanently residing with Margaret and the mother. The mother conducted a jerry which received the patronage of the miners working in the nearby districts. The patronage was small. A jerry is described as a beer or ale inn. The evidence would indicate that the family was not in prosperous circumstances. Neither the mother nor daughter owned any real property or possessed any money or personal property aside from household effects of humble character. John Jolly, then a young man, resided with his parents. His father's family consisted of a number of children, male and female, in addition to the heads of the family. John was a young miner, doing contract work in conjunction with his father and a brother, in the mines of the neighborhood, and was earning a comfortable wage. He was also interested with his sister in conducting a hostelry. The evidence would not support an inference that either he or the family owned property of great value. John and other members of the family visited Margaret and her mother at the jerry where, it would seem, occasional social dances were given. A long story may be shortened by the statement that the tryst made at Cleator Moor, England, was consummated by marriage in America. At the time Margaret and her mother departed from Cleator Moor, the former was of the age of about 24 years. She and her mother located at or near Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. A check-up of events would fix their arrival in America on a day within the year 1870. John Jolly followed her to this country about one year thereafter. They were joined in wedlock at Philadelphia shortly following his arrival.

The only evidence to be found in the record on the subject tends to show that John was a man of unusual earning ability, and that he was sturdy and frugal in his habits, industrious, a good and dependable workman, and had saved quite a sum of money before he left England for this country. The couple resided for a time at or near Johnstown, Pa. John was engaged in working in the mining districts of Pennsylvania. Afterwards they went to Illinois, then to Virginia City, Nev. He arrived at Virginia City in the early '70's. At that time the gold-mining industry was at its height. He worked as foreman and miner in the Comstock gold mines of Nevada for a period of about 20 years. He commanded good wages, receiving as much as $9 per day. Peter Jolly, whose deposition was read at the hearing, was a brother of John and his junior by 13 years. He came to this country 9 years after John's arrival, and visited the brother's wife, Mrs. Margaret Jolly, at Virginia City, in 1882. He, too, was a miner. John was at this time mining near Hawthorne, about 100 miles from Virginia City. The wife told him that John sent her his pay check each month. She also stated that all she had was his earnings; that John was working steady, and they were getting along, as he was making "big money" as a miner. Peter did not see his brother John, as the wife advised him not to go to Hawthorne, as her husband was then working but one man in the mine, and it would be unwise for him to make the trip. The inference is that she did not wish to have the brothers meet. She gave him $80 when he departed, after sojourning at Virginia City for about 6 weeks.

John and Peter met for the last time in 1911, at which time Peter visited him at San Diego, California. John was residing there with his wife. They owned their home and were comfortably situated. Peter did not make any inquiries into their financial affairs, but testified that his brother was then retired and was living comfortably and had the appearance of being in easy circumstances. He and his wife discussed in his presence the advisability of making a loan on certain real property. The amount of the mortgage was not named in the conversation. John Jolly died the following year, February 11, 1912. The record is silent as to what property he owned at the time of his death, or what disposition was made of his estate at the time of or prior to his demise. The widow died 10 years thereafter, April 4, 1922, leaving in her own name the estate in controversy, all of which was personal property, except a few parcels of realty, situated in San Diego, acquired by her August 8, 1918, and January 11, 1922, respectively, aggregating $9,000. The entire estate was appraised at $28,418.95.

Counsel in the case stipulated as follows:

"* * * At the time of his [John Jolly's] death, he and Margaret Jolly were husband and wife, and after his death Margaret Jolly did not engage in any occupation, and was in a poor condition of health from the date of the death of John Jolly until her own death, and not able to work."

The record contains affirmative evidence to the effect that Margaret Jolly had at no time, before or after marriage, ever engaged in any business or occupation or performed any duties, except household or domestic duties in her mother's family and in her marital relation. It does not appear that she ever owned or possessed a separate estate or an independent income from any source whatsoever, or that she had acquired any property by gift, devise, bequest, or descent.

After John Jolly's arrival in this country, he seldom communicated with his parents, who later followed the children to this country, or with his brothers and sisters. But a few letters passed between him and the other members of his father's family. Peter and Mrs. Duffy account for this dearth of correspondence on the theory that letters mailed to John were intercepted by the wife and did not reach him. According to their testimony she was not inclined to establish intimate relations with other members of the family.

[1] The probate court found from the facts herein narrated that it was not true, as claimed by the heirs of John Jolly, that the property ordered distributed was accumulated subsequent to the marriage of the said parties, or that it was community property, but, on the contrary, found that the said John Jolly left no estate whatever at the time of his death, and that there was no community property belonging to either spouse at the time of his death, and that all of the property owned by the said Margaret Jolly or found in her possession at the time of her death was her separate property and estate. The question, therefore, is whether the evidence sustains the conclusion reached by the probate court, to wit, that all of said property was the separate estate of Margaret Jolly. In weighing the evidence, consideration must be given to all of the well-established presumptions of law affecting the acquisition or the possession of real and personal property by the spouse during coverture, and the increase thereof, as well as property found in the possession of the survivor, in the light of the circumstances appearing in each particular case. That portion of section 164, Civil Code, which prescribes the rules of presumptions in community property cases, provides as follows:

"All other property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, or both, * * * is community property."

[2] "The disputable presumption raised by section 164, Civil Code, is a form of evidence under section 1957, Code Civ. Proc. It may be controverted by other evidence, direct or indirect; but, unless so controverted, the court or jury is bound to find according to the presumption." Stafford v. Martinoni, 192 Cal. 724, 221 P. 919. "The community [property] generically embraces all property belonging to the spouses, except such as the statute specifically removes from its operation. Community property is the rule, separate property the exception thereto. Hence the presumption * * * follows. * * * Ballinger on Community Property, p. 213.

[3] "No evidence of sufficient strength was adduced at the trial to overcome the presumption created by section 164 of the Civil Code. * * * The presumption of the wife's community interest in property acquired after marriage can be overcome only by the production of clear and satisfactory proof that the property in question was the separate property of the husband." Estate of Rolls, 193 Cal. 594, 226 P. 608; Dimmick v. Dimmick, 95 Cal. 326, 30 P. 547; Rowe v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., 134 Cal. 403, 66 P. 569; Freese v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., 139 Cal. 392, 73 P. 172; 5 Cal. Jur. 311, 312, 313.

[4, 5] It will be remembered that every possible method or means by which the property in question could have been acquired by the wife since the husband's death has been stipulated out of the case, except the bare possibility of gift, devise, bequest, or descent. There is no evidence tending to show or presumption of law tending to support a claim that she acquired any property in the four ways or means last above mentioned, and from the situation of the parties before marriage an inference of fact arises that the wife did not possess or own any property whatever before or at the time of marriage, and that the estate was therefore accumulated during coverture. Any other inference would be untenable under the uncontradicted evidence in the case. John Jolly and his wife, Margaret, enjoyed a matrimonial companionship for a period of about 40 years. They had no children, and the husband was an industrious, capable miner of economical habits, and as before stated it nowhere appears that the wife possessed or owned any separate estate before or after marriage. The fact would seem to be that she and the mother were in poor circumstances. Valuable property was found in her possession at the close of a span of life of about 75 years in duration, 40 years of which was passed in the marital state, and the last 10 years in widowhood, broken in health. Admittedly she engaged in no occupation during the latter period of her life.

Under the affirmative evidence of the case, aided by the usual presumptions of law, and with no evidence offered to overcome said presumptions, we must conclude that the estate ordered distributed to the heirs of Margaret Jolly as her separate property was the community property of said Margaret Jolly and her predeceased husband. The rule dominating the situation before us is well stated by the text in 31 C. J. 47, as follows:

"Since the very basic conception of the community property system is that it is a species of partnership between a husband and wife, whereby they are to share equally in the benefit and enjoyment of the results of their joint or separate industry, labor, and earning capacity, and accordingly 'separate property' is defined in terms necessarily making it an exception to the usual estate held by the members of the community, every inquiry as to whether particular property belongs to the community, or to the separate estate of one or the other members thereof, begins with a prima facie presumption that it belongs to the former, especially where the matrimonial union has continued for a considerable length of time. * * * The burden of overcoming the general presumption in favor of the community is upon the party asserting separate ownership. * * *"

Respondents insist that there is no evidence showing that the property was acquired during coverture. Admitting that there is no direct evidence on the question, but indirect or circumstantial only, this does not strengthen the weakness of respondent's position, as there is neither evidence of any kind or presumptions or inferences to support the conclusion that the property was acquired as separate property. The property in the possession of one of the spouses at the close of a long marital relation must be presumed to be community, unless a better right can be established by the spouse claiming it to be his or her separate property.

Respondents take the position that, in order for the presumption of section 164, Civil Code, to apply, it must be shown by direct evidence that the property was acquired during coverture; that is to say, it is not sufficient, in the absence of any evidence whatever as to the character of the property, to show merely that it was in the possession of the spouse during marriage, unless the circumstances of its possession are such as to definitely indicate the character of the property upon the death of the other. Our attention has been called to no case in this state where this precise question has been passed upon. "Acquired" and "possessed" are used rather interchangeably in many of the decisions of this court. It must be admitted, however, that in all the cases of this state in which the word "possession" was used as synonymous with "acquired" the facts were that the property actually came to either spouse during coverture. Estate of Bollinger, 170 Cal. 381, 149 P. 995, presents such an example. See, also, 5 Cal. Jur. 311, 312.

While the law strongly favors the indulgence of the presumption of community interest under ordinary circumstances of coverture, we do not think it necessary to extend the presumption prescribed by section 164, Civil Code, beyond the language of the section for the reason that the conclusion compelled in the instant case by the process of elimination and by the force of indirect evidence, forecloses any other conclusion but the sole one that the estate is not shown to be the separate estate of either spouse, and must for the reasons herein assigned be regarded as community property. The respondents failed to meet the burden of proof which the law casts upon them.

[6] Respondents place emphasis on the fact that certain real property was purchased by the wife in 1918 and 1922. The grantee in those conveyances was the wife, the husband having been dead some years prior to the execution of said conveyances. This is not such a transaction as is dealt with in Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 P. 308, or other cases in which one of the spouses deeded to the other, or where one is made the grantee by a third party during coverture. Here there was but one surviving spouse; therefore the rule announced in those cases cannot be applied to the facts of the present case. From what we have said as to the character of the property, it must follow that the realty purchased by the wife since the death of the husband must have been purchased with community funds. The fact that community property is sold and other property bought with the proceeds, or that such property is exchanged for other property, does not change the original character of the property; its character is determined by reference to the nature of the funds with which it is purchased, and so long as its source can be traced it retains the character of that source. 5 Cal. Jur. 294. The funds or property that purchased the realty in question can only be traced to a community source.

The order distributing the whole of the estate to the heirs of Margaret Jolly is hereby reversed.

PROTHERO v. SUPERIOR COURT OF ORANGE COUNTY et al. (L. A. 8502.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 16, 1925.)

1. Judgment ⊜397—Entry in minutes that judgment entered on certain day is judgment of court, where no judgment had, in fact, been entered on such day, held not to constitute judgment.

Entry, by court, in minutes, that "judgment is entered by the court on 15th day of October, 1924, is a judgment in this action," where no judgment had, in fact, been entered on such date, held not entry of new judgment, within requirements of Code Civ. Proc. § 663.

2. Judgment ⊜22—Order for judgment does not constitute a judgment.

Order for judgment does not constitute a judgment.

3. Judgment ⊜256(1)—Written findings of fact and conclusions of law constitute decision of court, and judgment must be entered in accordance therewith.

Written findings of fact, when not waived, and conclusions of law, constitute decision of court, and judgment must be entered in accordance therewith.

4. Judgment ⊜527—Minute orders of judge preceding judgment are merged in, and controlled by, judgment.

Minute orders of judge preceding judgment are merged in, and controlled by, judgment.

5. Trial ⊜393(1)—Judgment constitutes conclusions of law, upon which mandate of judgment may depend.

Though conclusions of law are not appended to findings of fact, judgment in legal effect constitutes conclusions of law, upon which mandate of judgment may properly depend.

6. Mandamus ⊜176—Plaintiff held not entitled to judgment of Supreme Court annulling proceeding of lower court.

Where, in action to quiet title to certain real property, judgment had been entered for plaintiff, and void order had been entered setting aside judgment, held, plaintiff was not entitled to judgment of Supreme Court annulling proceedings of lower court to such extent that plaintiff's judgment would then stand unaffected by proceedings of defendant, under Code Civ. Proc. § 663, to annul this judgment and enter new one, since motion to vacate plaintiff's judgment and enter new one for defendant was still undisposed of by court.

7. Judgment ⊜276—Defendant held to have waived written notice or entry of judgment by filing motion to vacate such judgment.

In action to quiet title to real property, defendant held to have waived written notice of entry of judgment by filing notice of motion to vacate and set aside such judgment.

8. New trial ⊜½—New trial proceedings are statutory, and provisions of statute must be strictly followed.

New trial proceedings are statutory, and provisions of statute must be strictly followed.

9. New trial ⊜153—Notice of motion for new trial held to have been filed too late.

Notice of motion for new trial, in action to quiet title, filed 8 days after expiration of 10-day period allowed for filing such notice, under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, held filed too late.

In Bank.

Action by E. L. Prothero against John F. Boose and others. Application by plaintiff for writ of mandate to be directed to Superior Court of Orange County to compel entry of new judgment. Granted.

Otto Sanaker, of Santa Ana, for petitioner.

Arthur E. Koepsel, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

SHENK, J. The petitioner commenced an action in the respondent court against John F. Boose and others to quiet his title to certain real property and for injunctive relief. The defendants filed an answer wherein affirmative relief was sought. At the conclusion of the trial on October 15, 1924, the court made an order from the bench denying relief to both parties and caused an entry thereof to be made in the minutes as follows:

"Argument opened and closed. Judgment of the court that both sides take nothing."

No findings of fact, conclusions of law, or judgment were made or entered pursuant to said order and findings were not waived. Thereafter, following an informal conference at which counsel for the respective parties were present, the court requested counsel for petitioner to prepare findings in favor of the plaintiff in said action. Findings so prepared were signed and filed by the judge on November 6, 1924, and judgment thereon in favor of the plaintiff was entered the following day. On November 17, 1924, the defendants in said action served and filed a notice of motion to set aside and vacate the judgment, and to enter a new and different judgment on numerous grounds, including those mentioned in paragraph 1 of section 663, Code of Civil Procedure. On November 21st the court granted said motion. As a memorial of its action in that behalf, the minutes of the court were caused to state:

"Motion to vacate judgment granted."

On December 5th the defendants served and filed a notice of motion for a new trial, designating therein December 12th as the date on which the motion would be made. On the day thus noticed the court filed a written order granting the motion of the defendants to set aside and vacate the said judgment and enter a new and different judgment, and included in said written order the following:

"It is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said judgment so entered on the 7th day of November, 1924, was inadvertently entered, and was not the judgment of this court, and the same is hereby annulled and set aside, and the judgment as entered by the court on the 15th day of October, 1924, is the judgment in this action."

The court continued the hearing of the motion for new trial to December 19th, on which date the said motion was granted, and the cause was set down for retrial on January 2, 1925. No new and different or other judgment was made or entered by the court following its order granting the motion to set aside the judgment entered November 7th.

[1] Pursuant to the prayer of the petition for the issuance of a writ or writs appropriate to the foregoing facts, an alternative writ of mandate was issued, requiring the respondent court to enter a new and different judgment in said action or show cause why it had not done so. A writ of review was also issued, requiring the respondent court to certify its record in the matter of the new trial ordered by the court, and further new trial proceedings were stayed pending the determination hereof. These writs were served as required by law and notice of time and place of hearing thereon was duly served and filed. No return has been made to the alternative writ of mandate, but there is on file a return to the writ of review, setting forth the record, and showing the facts as above outlined. From a consideration of those facts, it is clear that the respondent court, to properly grant said motion, should have made and entered another and different judgment pursuant to the requirements of section 663, Code of Civil Procedure. Its failure to enter such a judgment rendered its action on said motion, not merely erroneous, but void. Dolan v. Superior Court, 47 Cal. App. 235, 190 P. 469.

[2] There is nothing in the record to warrant the conclusion that the judgment entered November 7th was inadvertently entered, or that said judgment was not the judgment of the court. The order of the court filed December 12, 1924, providing that "the judgment as entered by the court on the 15th day of October, 1924, is the judgment in this action," although perhaps so intended, did not constitute the entry of another and different judgment. Assuming that the court could effectively render a judgment by reference to another judgment, a question which is not now decided, still the only order of the court made or entered on October 15th with reference to a judgment was a minute order that both sides take nothing. Such order was no more than an order for judgment and an order for judgment is not a judgment. Canadian, etc., Co. v. Clarita, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 672, 74 P. 301; Cuneo v. Cuneo, 40 Cal. App. 564, 181 P. 229; United Taxpayers' Co. v. San Francisco, 55 Cal. App. 239, 203 P. 120.

[3-5] Unless findings are waived, and they were not waived in the present case, the written findings of fact and conclusions of law constitute the decision of the court, and judgment must be entered in accordance therewith. Sections 632, 633, Code Civ. Proc.; Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 703, 109 P. 91; Hoover v. Lester, 16 Cal. App. 151, 116 P. 382. Opinions of the judge or minute orders preceding such decision and judgment were merged in or controlled by the judgment. Montecito Valley Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 77 P. 1113; Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 627, 87 P. 93; De Cou v. Howell, 190 Cal. 741, 214 P. 444; McClellan v. Lewis, 35 Cal. App. 133, 169 P. 438. Although conclusions of law were not appended to the findings of fact in said action, the language of the judgment, which was signed and filed in legal effect, constituted conclusions of law upon which the mandate of the judgment could properly depend. Takekawa v. Hole, 170 Cal. 323, 149 P. 593.

[6] The petitioner insists that, since the order of the court setting aside said judgment and leaving the case undetermined was a void order (Dolan v. Superior Court, supra), he is now entitled to the judgment of this court annulling the proceedings of the respondent court to such an extent that the judgment entered November 7th would then stand as a judgment in his favor unaffected by the proceedings instituted by the defendants under said section 663. We cannot so conclude. Under the facts shown by the record, the motion to set aside and vacate the judgment and enter another and different judgment is still pending and undetermined. Until that motion is properly disposed of, the action of the court thereon as contemplated by the statute has not taken place.

[7-9] Petitioner also contends that the proceedings for a new trial were and are beyond the power of the court to entertain, for the reason that they were not initiated within the statutory time. The judgment was entered November 7th. No notice of the entry of judgment appears to have been served on the defendants. However, on November 17th, the defendants served and filed their notice of motion to vacate and set aside said judgment, particularly referring in that document to the judgment entered November 7th. By filing this notice of motion in the records and files of said action, the defendants revealed the fact that they had actual knowledge of the entry of said judgment. Under such circumstances the written notice of the entry thereof was waived. Thorne v. Finn, 69 Cal. 251, 10 P. 414; Timmons v. Coonley, 39 Cal. App. 35, 179 P. 429; 20 Cal. Jur. p. 176, and cases cited. On December 5th the defendants served and filed their notice of motion for a new trial. No notice of intention to move for a new trial or other step looking to the initiation of new trial proceedings was taken prior to December 5th. The notice of motion served and filed on that date was therefore served and filed 8 days after the expiration of the 10-day period provided by section 659, Code of Civil Procedure. New trial proceedings are statutory and the provisions of the statute must be strictly followed in order that the rights of the litigant may be preserved and the court have jurisdiction to entertain such proceedings and enter valid orders and judgments thereon. Cal. Imp. Co. v. Baroteau, 116 Cal. 136, 47 P. 1018; Whiting-Mead Com. Co. v. Bayside Land Co., 178 Cal. 93, 172 P. 598; Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Superior Court, 188 Cal. 393, 205 P. 446; Diamond v. Superior Court, 189 Cal. 732, 210 P. 36. It is clear that on the record here presented the respondent court could not, on a retrial of the action initiated pursuant to the belated notice, render a valid judgment for either party.

It is therefore ordered that all proceedings of the respondent court in said action subsequent to the filing therein on November 17, 1924, of defendants' notice of motion to vacate the judgment and enter another and different judgment, be and the same are hereby annulled, and that a peremptory writ of mandate issue, requiring the respondent court, on proper notice, to entertain and determine the said motion as required by law.

In Bank.

Original application by William Wilson for writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the Sheriff of Kings County, to secure petitioner's release from custody. Writ discharged.

William Wilson, in pro. per.

Wm. R. McKay, Dist. Atty., and Sidney J. W. Sharp, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Hanford, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. On habeas corpus. Petitioner was charged by information in the county of Kings with a violation of section 464 of the Penal Code, namely, with the crime of burglary with explosives. On February 21, 1922, he pleaded guilty. For the said offense petitioner was sentenced to confinement in the state prison at San Quentin. About March 1, 1922, he was transferred from said penitentiary to the state prison at Folsom. On or about December 29, 1924, he was ordered returned to the superior court of Kings county for resentence, upon the claim that the original sentence to the state prison was void, as burglary with explosives was construed to be a misdemeanor rather than a felony. Accordingly, he was, on the 31st day of December, 1924, resentenced by the superior court to be confined in the county jail of Kings for 25 years.

The offense, as already indicated, is prescribed by section 464 of the Penal Code, quoted elsewhere, and deals with the opening of a safe or other secure place by the use of explosives with intent to commit crime.

Several grounds are urged in support of the petition which, in effect, may be stated as follows: (1) That the information fails to state a public offense, for it does not follow the language of the statute, and neglects to charge a "breaking" in addition to an "entering." (2) That it fails to state a public offense, in that it does not specify "what crime the defendant intended to commit when he entered the building, and before he dynamited the safe therein." (3) That he "has been once in jeopardy, by reason of his illegal confinement in a state prison for a substantial portion of his term on a void judgment." (4) That his confinement in the county jail constitutes cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of section 6, article 1, of the Constitution.

Respondent's position is thus set forth:

"(1) The information under which respondent was convicted of the offense of burglary with explosives states a public offense.

"(2) Petitioner has not been once in jeopardy by reason of his imprisonment in state's prison prior to his resentence to the county jail.

"(3) Burglary with explosives, by reason of the nature of the action which constitutes said offense, must be denominated a felony per se, and the omission in the statute of the place of confinement as a punishment therefor, or the failure to denominate the same as a felony, is without moment in the present instance.

"(4) The imprisonment of the defendant in the county jail is not cruel and unusual punishment under section 6 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of California."

[1] 1. As to the sufficiency of the information, we quote from 13 Cal. Juris. page. 232, section 14:

"The scope of inquiry upon habeas corpus into the sufficiency of an indictment or information is limited, for, although the petitioner may be discharged if the pleading totally fails to charge an offense known to the law, if there is attempted to be stated an offense of a kind of which the court assuming to proceed has jurisdiction, the question whether the facts charged are sufficient to constitute an offense of that kind will not be examined into."

It was declared in Re Kavanaugh, 180 Cal. 181, 182, 180 P. 533:

"The information in the superior court upon which the judgment against petitioner is based clearly attempted to charge the felony defined by section 476a of the Penal Code. Whether the specific facts alleged as constituting the particular offense failed to sufficiently show the public offense attempted to be charged is a question which cannot be considered on habeas corpus under the well-settled rule of this jurisdiction. Matter of Ruef, 150 Cal. 665 (89 P. 605); * * * Ex parte Greenall, 153 Cal. 770 (96 P. 804)."

In the application of this rule no distinction is drawn between cases where a plea of "not guilty" and cases where a plea of "guilty" is entered. In re Cook, 13 Cal. App. 399, 403, 110 P. 352, 354, declares:

"We do not intend to be understood as saying that, if the only offense sought to be charged against the prisoner was that of an attempt to escape from a prison, the indictment would not have been compelled to yield to the claims of a demurrer; but there was no demurrer, and, therefore, whatever defects might characterize the statement of the offense to which the prisoner pleaded guilty were waived by said plea. His plea, in other words, amounted to an admission that the offense of which he thus confessed his guilt was within the language of the indictment. As is said in In re Myrtle, 2 Cal. App. 383 [84 P. 335], the indictment, taken with the plea of the prisoner, establishes a case of attempt to escape from a prison as completely as if it had in fact been specifically alleged in the indictment that the prisoner had made an attempt to escape." (Italics added.)

The information filed herein comes clearly within this rule, and its sufficiency cannot now be questioned or gone into on habeas corpus. Moreover, it is significant to note that the information incorporated by reference the code section that defines and describes the offense of burglary with explosives.

[2] 2. We perceive no merit in petitioner's second contention, for the information clearly charged, among other things, that petitioner was actuated by an intent to commit larceny. The information reads, in part:

"The said defendant * * * did then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and burglariously enter that certain store building * * * and open a certain safe therein by the use of nitroglycerine or other explosives, with the intent to commit larceny. * * *"

In our view, it is immaterial whether or not "the phrase, 'with the intent to commit larceny' must be read with the previous sentence" of the information, for the charging part of the information expressly alleges that the petitioner, "with the intent to commit larceny," entered the building and opened the safe with an explosive. The allegation with intent to commit larceny would include grand or petit larceny. This allegation, in our opinion, was a sufficient compliance with the provisions of section 464, which require, among other things, an opening or attempt to open a safe by the use of explosives with "intent to commit crime." We do not deem it essential, as contended by petitioner, that the intended or motivating crime should be completely and entirely separate from and unconnected with the opening of the safe; undoubtedly, the Legislature had in mind primarily an intended or motivating crime that would follow the opening of the safe—that is, a looting of the safe subsequent to the opening thereof by the employment of explosives. An examination of the section satisfies us that there is no warrant for petitioner's argument that the phrase, "with intent to commit crime," refers to a crime "separate and disconnected from the opening of the safe" and the stealing of the contents thereof.

Another answer to this contention is the one considered under the preceding point—that if the pleading purports to charge a known crime its sufficiency cannot be gone into on habeas corpus.

[3] 3. The real question in controversy is discussed in the third contention of petitioner, and that question is, Does the failure of section 464 to expressly declare the offense therein defined a felony, or to expressly provide that the punishment for a violation thereof shall be imprisonment, for the prescribed period, in a state prison, bring the offense within that class of crimes commonly designated "misdemeanors," or, in the face of either or both of these omissions, may said offense nevertheless be held to be a felony?

The District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division 2, in the Matter of the Application of Charles Schiaffino for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, 232 P. 719, has passed upon this identical question, and held the offense defined by section 464 to be a misdemeanor. The decision was based upon section 17, Penal Code, which reads, "A felony is a crime which is punishable with death or by imprisonment in the state prison. Every other crime is a misdemeanor; * * *" and Matter of Humphrey, 64 Cal. App. 572, 222 P. 366, and cases therein cited. The District Court of Appeal in the Matter of Schiaffino, supra, however, stated:

"Though it seems an absurdity that one convicted of a crime which is punishable by imprisonment for not less than 25 years should be confined in a county jail rather than in the state prison, the language of the section does not permit any other interpretation."

In view of the express terms of section 17 of the Penal Code, it may be conceded that under a statute omitting to declare the offense therein defined to be a felony, and which does not provide that the punishment to be inflicted shall be incarceration in a state prison, only misdemeanor punishment can be imposed. But, it is clear to us that, reading together the provisions of chapter 2, title 13, part 1, of the Penal Code (sections 459–464), section 464 must be held to prescribe for a violation of its terms punishment by imprisonment in a state prison.

Sections 459, 460, 461, 463, and 464 read as follows:

"459. 'Burglary' Defined. Every person who enters any house, room, apartment, tenement, shop, warehouse, store, mill, barn, stable, outhouse or other building, tent, vessel, railroad car, mine, or any underground portion thereof, with intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony is guilty of burglary.

"460. Burglary Defined. 1. Every burglary of an inhabited dwelling-house or building committed in the nighttime, and every burglary whether in the daytime or nighttime, committed by a person armed with a deadly weapon, or who while in the commission of such burglary arms himself with a deadly weapon, or who while in the commission of such burglary assaults any person, is burglary of the first degree.

"2. All other kinds of burglary are of the second degree.

"3. This section shall not be construed to supersede or affect section four hundred sixty-four of the Penal Code.

"461. Punishment for Burglary. Burglary is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison as follows:

"1. Burglary in the first degree for not less than five years.

"2. Burglary in the second degree for not less than one or more than fifteen years.

"3. Burglary in the third degree for not more than five years."

"463. 'Nighttime' Defined. The phrase 'nighttime,' as used in this chapter, means the period between sunset and sunrise.

"464. Burglary with Explosives. (1) Any person who, with intent to commit crime, breaks and enters, either by day or night, any building, whether inhabited or not, and opens or attempts to open any vault, safe or other secure place by use of nitroglycerine, dynamite, gunpowder or any other explosive, shall be deemed guilty of burglary with explosives.

"2. Penalty. Any person duly convicted of burglary with explosives shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not less than twenty-five nor more than forty years."

Prior to the adoption of section 464 (Stats. 1917, p. 273), section 460 divided burglary into two degrees—burglary of the first and burglary of the second degree. In the introductory sentence of section 461, it is provided that "burglary is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison." Then follows the punishment for burglary of three degrees, first, second, and third, but as to the latter degree we have nowhere found it to be defined as a crime. Section 464 creates a new form of burglary in addition to the forms defined and made punishable by sections 460 and 461, respectively, namely, "burglary with explosives." If, for instance, the measure of punishment prescribed for the latter form of burglary appeared in place of or following subdivision 3 of section 461, there could be no question that the kind of punishment would be the same as that prescribed in the introductory sentence of that section—imprisonment in the state prison. In other words, the kind of punishment for each of the forms of burglary would be found exclusively in the introductory language of section 461. The question then arises whether the fact that burglary by explosives appears in a separate and distinct section, which omits to prescribe the kind of punishment, would preclude the application of the introductory language of section 461 to section 464 in determining the kind of punishment to be imposed under the latter section. In our view, each section of the chapter should be read with the others, and all of them construed as though constituting a single section (People v. Pryal, 25 Cal. App. 779, 147 P. 114, 115). Thus construed the kind of punishment under section 464 would be imprisonment in the state prison.

It is said in Bishop on Statutory Crimes, page 61:

"While plainly, where the division is only made by an editor, it can have no effect on the interpretation, it is believed not to be greatly different where it is the work of the draughtsman, and is retained in the statute as passed. In other connections and from various cases we see that, while our courts sometimes speak of the sections as though the distinction had something to do with the interpretation, at other times nothing is perceptible from which such inference could be drawn. On the whole, little depends on this matter, beyond mere convenience of citation."

Any other construction of the chapter would be opposed to the provisions of section 4 of the Penal Code, which read:

"The rule of the common law, that penal statutes are to be strictly construed, has no application to this code. All its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." Snell v. Bradbury, 139 Cal. 379, 73 P. 150; People v. Soto, 49 Cal. 67, 70.

It is apparent that the criminal act defined in section 464 is more aggravated in character than those enumerated in the preceding sections, for the use of explosives would conceivably be attended with greater risk to life, bodily safety, and property. Moreover, while the Legislature has complete authority within the constitutional limitation (article 1, section 6, Const.) to fix the kind and quantity of punishment, in the absence of a clear and unequivocal expression the court would hesitate to hold that it was intended to prescribe for so grave an offense a misdemeanor punishment having a minimum of 25, and a maximum of 40, years. For to do so would be to impute to the Legislature a purpose entirely novel—the quantum of punishment bearing no natural nor reasonable relation to the kind of punishment contended for. And in our opinion such considerations properly enter into the question of the intention of the Legislature.

The cases relied upon in support of In re Charles Schiaffino for a Writ of Habeas Corpus (Cal. App.) 232 P. 719, are Union Ice Co. v. Rose, 11 Cal. App. 357, 360, 104 P. 1006, and In re Humphrey, 64 Cal. App. 572, 222 P. 366. Union Ice Co. v. Rose, supra, involved a prosecution for a violation of the Cartwright Act. St. 1907, p. 984. The court, after citing section 17, Penal Code, declared:

"The law does not define misdemeanors as those offenses punishable by fine or imprisonment in the county or city jail, but as those for which the penalty imposed, whatsoever it may be, is other than death or imprisonment in the state prison. The conclusion would therefore seem irresistible that, since the offense is clearly a crime for which a penalty is imposed, the punishment for which, however, is not that prescribed for a felony, it must necessarily and logically follow that it is a misdemeanor. As said in Pillsbury v. Brown, 47 Cal. 480: 'A misdemeanor is an act or omission for which a punishment, other than death or imprisonment in the state prison, is denounced by law.'"

In re Humphrey, supra, involved a violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), which adopted by reference certain provisions of the Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.). There also, the court properly held, in effect, that the act, in omitting to declare the offense a felony in terms, or making the punishment imprisonment in the state prison, under section 17 the crime was only punishable as a misdemeanor.

These authorities are clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. The respective acts in those cases stood entirely alone and unrelated to any other provision which in terms prescribed the kind of punishment, and hence resort was necessarily had to the omnibus provisions of section 17; while in the case at bar it is held that the chapter of which section 464 is a part, taken in its entirety, does in terms prescribe the kind of punishment, and therefore section 17 has no application.

Section 464 is, therefore, held to prescribe a felony, punishable by imprisonment in the state penitentiary for not less than 25 nor more than 40 years. It follows that In re Charles Schiaffino for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, supra, must be and is overruled.

[4, 5] With respect to the claim of petitioner that because he was confined for a time in the penitentiary under the judgment of conviction he has been once in jeopardy, this may be said: First, the constitutional guarantee has no application to the service of a sentence, but applies only to twice being put upon trial for the same offense. In re Harron, 191 Cal. 457, 466, 217 P. 728; 7 Cal. Jur. 943. And, second, the effect of this decision is that the incarceration in the state prison was proper. It is true that a misconception of the law has resulted in the execution of the judgment being interrupted, but that is a circumstance which the state board of prison directors may consider.

4. In view of the conclusion that the sentence must be served in the penitentiary, it will not be necessary to discuss petitioner's final contention that his confinement in the county jail constitutes cruel and unusual punishment within the meaning of the constitutional inhibition. We quote section 1493 of the Penal Code as bearing on the judgment to be pronounced on the writ. The section reads:

"In cases where any party is held under illegal restraint or custody, or any other person is entitled to the restraint or custody of such party, the judge or court may order such party to be committed to the restraint or custody of such person as is by law entitled thereto."

Accordingly, the writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the respondent sheriff; and the superior court of the county of Kings is hereby ordered to vacate and set aside the judgment heretofore pronounced and entered to the effect that petitioner be imprisoned in the county jail of said county, and that a new judgment be pronounced and entered against petitioner according to law and the views herein expressed.

PEOPLE v. QUAREZ. (Cr. 2756.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 15, 1925. Rehearing Denied August 13, 1925.)

1. Aliens ⟸17—Essential elements of offense of unlawful possession of revolver stated.

The essential elements of the offense of unlawful possession of a revolver, as denounced by St. 1923, p. 696, § 2, are, first, the ownership or possession or custody or control of the weapon of the prohibited type, and the fact of foreign birth and unnaturalization of accused.

2. Criminal law ⟸517(4)—Corpus delicti must be established by independent evidence before extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confession are admissible.

The extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confession of an accused cannot be used to establish any necessary element of the corpus delicti, and the latter must be established by independent evidence before such extrajudicial statements are admissible, notwithstanding rule that burden of producing evidence should be placed on party best able to sustain it.

3. Criminal law ⟸517(4)—Evidence of accused's extrajudicial statements as to fact of foreign birth, unsupported by evidence independent of such statements, held insufficient to establish corpus delicti of offense of unlawful possession of revolver.

Evidence of accused's extrajudicial statements as to fact of foreign birth, unsupported by evidence independent of such statements, held insufficient to establish corpus delicti of offense of unlawful possession of revolver denounced by St. 1923, p. 696, § 2.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

D. Quarez, who asserts his true name to be D. Juarez, was convicted of the unlawful possession of a revolver, and he appeals. Reversed.

Thomas Ashby, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LAWLOR, J. An information, filed by the district attorney of Sacramento county, charged the defendant herein with having, on the 12th day of July, 1924, in his possession and under his custody and control, in the city of Sacramento, a 32.20 Colt's revolver, less than 12 inches in length, and capable of being concealed on his person, and being, at the time, a foreign-born person, and not a naturalized citizen of the United States. He was tried and convicted of the offense charged, the verdict reading:

"We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant D. Quarez, true name D. Juarez guilty of the crime of carrying a concealed weapon, and being at the time an unnaturalized foreigner, as charged in the information."

In due course a motion for a new trial was interposed by the defendant and denied. The defendant appeals from the order denying his said motion for a new trial and from the judgment of conviction.

Section 2 of the act under which appellant was prosecuted (Stats. 1923, c. 339, p. 696) reads as follows:

"Sec. 2. On and after the date upon which this act takes effect, no unnaturalized foreign-born person and no person who has been convicted of a felony against the person or property of another or against the government of the United States or of the state of California or of any political subdivision thereof shall own or have in his possession or under his custody or control any pistol, revolver or other firearm capable of being concealed upon the person. The terms 'pistol,' 'revolver,' and 'firearms capable of being concealed upon the person' as used in this act shall be construed to apply to and include all firearms having a barrel less than twelve inches in length. Any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punishable by imprisonment in a state prison for not less than one year nor more than five years."

There is no dispute that, on the evening of July 12, 1924, the arresting officers, while cruising about the city of Sacramento in their automobile, saw the appellant and another person in an alley situated in the vicinity of Seventh and O streets; that upon the officers flashing their light on the two persons the latter fled, the officers following in pursuit; that the appellant was located in an old shed close by; that before his discovery in the shed he had thrown off his mackinaw; that the mackinaw lay at his feet, and under and covered by it was the weapon above described. It is not contended that this evidence is insufficient to establish that appellant had "in his possession or under his custody or control" a weapon capable of being concealed upon the person. The only testimony other than that going to such possession was his extrajudicial statement to the arresting officers and the statement made at the preliminary examination in the police court, through an interpreter, to the effect that he was born in Mexico.

The principal contention on appeal is that this latter evidence was inadmissible, and therefore the element of foreign birth and nonnaturalization were not proved. We quote from appellant's brief:

"The principal question involved in this case centers on the admissibility of these very statements of the police officers relied upon by the prosecution as establishing the fact of foreign birth, namely, that appellant had admitted to them he was born in Mexico. To assume that these statements proved this fact is of course to assume the fact in issue. * * *

"In the case at bar there is absolutely no evidence except appellant's extrajudicial statements which in any way tends to show foreign birth."

[1] It is insisted by appellant that foreign birth is an essential part of the corpus delicti of the offense defined by the statute, and therefore the extrajudicial statements of the appellant are not admissible as proof of such element of the crime. In other words "that the fact of his being a foreign-born citizen, if established, is a fact which must co-exist with the act of possession of a weapon before any unlawful act is shown to have been committed, and that it therefore constitutes a part of the corpus delicti; that therefore the declarations of the appellant alone were not sufficient to establish the fact of foreign birth; and, there being no other testimony on that subject, the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict."

In support of this contention the case of People v. Chadwick, 4 Cal. App. 63, 87 P. 384, 389, among others, is cited, wherein it is declared:

"The rule is clearly established in this state that the extrajudicial statements or admissions of a defendant, in the absence of other evidence of the commission of the crime charged against him, are insufficient to establish his guilt (People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 565; People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345 [40 P. 440]); and they are equally insufficient to establish the existence of any substantive or essential element of a crime charged against the defendant. * * *"

Elsewhere it is contended that—

"It follows that it is as necessary to the proof of a violation of the statute that the defendant be shown to belong to the proscribed class as it is that he committed the forbidden act. This fact being one essential element of the crime, it constitutes a part of the corpus delicti and must be proved as such. The corpus delicti consists of the elements of the crime. People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 647 [63 P. 1001]; People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 346 [40 P. 440]; People v. Vertrees, 169 Cal. 404 [146 P. 890]."

The people cite many authorities to the effect that a slight amount of proof is only necessary to satisfy the law when proving a negative, in a case where a fact is peculiarly within the knowledge of the other party; and other authorities to the effect that, having proven by competent evidence the foreign birth of the appellant, the allegation of the information that he had never been naturalized must be taken as true in the absence of proof to the contrary.

It is readily apparent that section 2, quoted above, prohibits and makes punishable the carrying of concealed weapons under circumstances described therein. A reading of section 2 of the act indicates, so far as it is applicable to the instant case, that the Legislature prescribed two elements for conviction thereunder, namely: (1) The possession of a concealed weapon of the type described therein; (2) by a foreign-born and unnaturalized person. That is, if the proof of the prosecution under this section were to stop with a showing that the person charged had carried, possessed, or had under his custody or control a weapon of the prohibited type, no offense would be proven. In addition to this proof the prosecution has the burden of establishing that the offender was an alien, and, having proven this element of the offense, it is indicated by the authorities that "this status continues until the contrary is shown." Or, stated differently, "it was therefore unnecessary for the prosecution, after showing that the defendant was foreign-born, to further show that he had never been naturalized." People v. Velasquez (Cal. App.) 233 P. 359.

[2] The corpus delicti of the offense defined in section 2 consists, as we have shown, of two elements—the second being the foreign nativity and nonnaturalization of the appellant. The rule is well settled, and the authorities numerous in this state, that the extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confession of a defendant cannot be used to establish any necessary element of the corpus delicti of the crime charged. The corpus delicti must be established by independent evidence before the extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confession of a defendant are admissible. People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 565; People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345, 40 P. 440; People v. Johnson (Cal. App.) 238 P. 814. We are not to be understood as holding that, if the evidence of the statements, admissions, or confession of a defendant had been received in advance of a full measure of proof of the corpus delicti, which was later supplied, the mere inversion of the order of proof would be prejudicial to the defendant. People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 363, 368, 97 P. 871.

Nor are we unmindful of the rule stated by respondent, and commonly known as the "rule of convenience." It is thus stated in 22 Corpus Juris, at page 81, section 24:

"In the administration of justice it is often wise to place the burden of producing evidence on the party best able to sustain it, and ambiguity, concealment, or evasion react with peculiar force on a pleader who asserts a fact and fails to produce the evidence, which if his assertion were true, would be in his possession. Hence it is very generally held that, where the party who has not the general burden of proof possesses positive and complete knowledge concerning the existence of facts which the party having that burden is called upon to negative, or where for any reason the evidence to prove a fact is chiefly, if not entirely, within his control, the burden rests on him to produce the evidence, although he is obliged to go no further than necessity requires. * * *"

Again in 16 Corpus Juris, p. 530, § 998, it is said:

"Where the subject-matter of a negative averment in the indictment, or a fact relied upon by defendant as a justification or excuse, relates to him personally or otherwise lies peculiarly within his knowledge, the general rule is that the burden of proof as to such averment or fact is on him."

The case of People v. Boo Doo Hong, 122 Cal. 606, 55 P. 402, is cited in each of these sections, and also by respondent in support of its contention. An examination of that case discloses that the defendant therein was charged by information with the crime of willfully and unlawfully practicing medicine without having first procured a certificate to so practice, as required by law. The trial court in its instructions, in effect, told the jury that the burden was on the defendant to prove that he had a certificate to practice, and that in the absence of such proof it must be taken as true he had not procured one. The court declared:

"It is contended for appellant that the said instruction was erroneous and misleading, and that the verdict was not justified by the evidence, because in a criminal action the defendant is presumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and this presumption continues through the entire trial, and the burden is upon the people to establish his guilt by proving every material allegation of the information; and that as the information charged that defendant had practiced medicine without having a certificate to do so, it devolved upon the people to prove that fact, and having entirely failed to offer any such proof he ought not to have been convicted, and his motion for new trial should have been granted.

"The general rule is undoubtedly as above stated, but there is a well recognized exception to the rule, where there is a negative averment of a fact which is peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant.

"Mr. Greenleaf, in his work on Evidence, volume 1, section 79, under the heading 'Negative Allegations,' says: 'But when the subject-matter of a negative averment lies peculiarly within the knowledge of the other party, the averment is taken as true unless disproved by that party. Such is the case in civil or criminal prosecutions for a penalty for doing an act which the statutes do not permit to be done by any persons, except those who are duly licensed therefor; as, for selling liquors, exercising a trade or profession, and the like. Here the party, if licensed, can immediately show it without the least inconvenience; whereas, if proof of the negative were required, the inconvenience would be very great,' citing a large number of cases. See, also, 3 Rice on Evidence, § 260, where the same rule is declared.

"In 1 Jones' Law of Evidence, section 179, under the heading 'Burden as to particular facts lying peculiarly within knowledge of a party,' it is said: 'This is often illustrated in prosecutions for selling liquors or doing other acts without the license required by law. By a few authorities the rule is prescribed that in such cases the prosecution must offer some slight proof of the fact that no license has been granted, for example, by producing the book in which licenses are recorded; and, if the book fails to show that a license has been granted, the burden is shifted upon the defendant to prove the fact claimed by him; but the greater number of authorities hold that where a license would be a complete defense the burden is upon the defendant to prove the fact so clearly within his own knowledge,' citing cases.

"We think the rule upon this subject generally recognized and followed the correct one, and therefore conclude that the court did not err in giving the instruction complained of, and that the verdict was justified by the evidence."

There is no doubt that the above case enunciates the correct principle, and that it has been consistently followed in this state in those cases involving the unlawful practice of medicine without a license. People v. Fortch, 13 Cal. App. 770, 775, 110 P. 823; People v. Wong Lee Wing, 47 Cal. App. 327, 331, 190 P. 643; People v. Goscinsky, 52 Cal. App. 62, 64, 198 P. 40; People v. Saunders, 61 Cal. App. 341, 345, 215 P. 120. It has also been extended to the case where the defendant was charged by information with the offense of carrying a concealed weapon upon his person in violation of section 3 of the act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 221). This section, which is really the counterpart of section 5 of the act of 1923, made it a misdemeanor for any one without a license to carry such a weapon concealed upon his person. It was declared in People v. Ross, 60 Cal. App. 163, 166, 167, 212 P. 627, 628:

"It was not incumbent upon the prosecution to show that no license had been issued to appellant. The clause of the statute which exempts from its penal provisions those persons who have been licensed to carry firearms is so incorporated into and made such a substantial part of the definition of the offense that it doubtless was necessary to allege in the information that appellant was without a license to carry the pistol. There is such an allegation in the information, but it presents a negative which the prosecution was not called upon to prove, for the truth or falsity of the averment lay more immediately within the knowledge of the defendant himself. It is a well settled rule of law that where the negative of an issue does not permit of direct proof, or where the facts come more immediately within the knowledge of the defendant, the onus probandi rests upon him. This doctrine is illustrated in cases of practicing medicine without a license or of selling spirituous liquors without a license."

But this exception to the general rule has, in this state, been confined to that particular line of cases where it becomes necessary, in order to constitute the offense charged, for the prosecution to prove the nonexistence of a license required by law. The burden of the issue is put on the defendant in such cases because it is easy for him to meet it. But the rule should not be applied so as to make less imperative, in the enforcement of the law, the duty of the prosecution to establish the charge. In other words, any deviation from the general rule should be strictly confined to the principle of 'ab inconvenienti." That this exception to the general rule is not of universal application in this state to criminal cases is recognized in People v. Frey, 165 Cal. 140, 145, 131 P. 127. In that case the defendant was charged with a violation of section 476a of the Penal Code in drawing and issuing a draft upon a bank without having sufficient funds therein to meet it; the only evidence of the insufficiency of the funds was the extrajudicial confession of the defendant. In holding that the corpus delicti was not established, the court declared:

"We are fully mindful of the importance of the argument ab inconvenienti, but since the Legislature has seen fit to make proof of a negative proposition—namely, the nonexistence of funds or credit, an essential element of a crime, we cannot see our way to a conclusion authorizing hearsay evidence to establish that constituent part of the offense. If practical difficulties are involved, that is a matter for legislative adjustment. 'The rule is well established that a conviction cannot be had upon the extrajudicial confession of the defendant, unless corroborated by proof aliunde of the corpus delicti.' People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 68 [55 P. 698]. We are aware of the fact that many cases properly hold very slight proof of the corpus delicti to be sufficient basis for the admission of defendant's confession, but we know of none which sustains proof of the corpus delicti upon purely hearsay testimony. * * *

"Nor does this case come within the rule that negative allegations regarding matters peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant need not be proven. That is a special rule applicable to such prosecutions as those for practicing some profession or following some calling without the license provided therefor by law." Italics added.

In People v. Whiteman, 114 Cal. 338, 344, 46 P. 99, 101, which involved an alleged forgery, the court declared:

"Suppose that he had admitted that he drew the Dixon check, and claimed that he had authority from Dixon to draw it, would this admission have put the burden upon him to show such authority?

"It would be a new departure in criminal law. It arises from a difficulty which is inherent in our system. We have inherited the idea, which we carefully place in all our constitutions, that an accused person must be confronted by his witnesses in court. State process cannot cross state borders, and hence justice is sometimes defeated. The courts have not created the difficulty, and cannot provide a remedy by depriving a defendant of the presumption of innocence and putting the burden upon him."

[3] Epitomized, the legal situation is this: Appellant was convicted under section 2 of the act of 1923. That section, so far as is applicable to this case, contains two essential elements necessary to be proved before the corpus delicti of the offense is established, namely: (1) The fact that appellant owned or had in his possession or under his custody or control a weapon of the prohibited type; and (2) the fact that appellant was a foreign-born and unnaturalized person. If the fact of alienage had been proved by competent evidence, under the authorities, as we have shown, this status would be presumed to have continued, unless the contrary was proved by the accused. And the foreign nativity, being an essential element of the corpus delicti, should have been established by evidence independent of the extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confession of the accused, which the prosecution did not furnish; and, this fact of foreign birth not coming within the rule of "ab inconvenienti," it follows that the evidence adduced is insufficient to establish the corpus delicti of the offense defined in section 2 of the act. The judgment and order are reversed and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. M. GARCIA, Defendant and Appellant.

(Cr. 2777.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 15, 1925. Rehearing Denied August 13, 1925.)

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Price & Price, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LAWLOR, J. The defendant, following his arrest with one D. Juarez, was charged by information, filed by the district attorney of Sacramento county, with having, on the 12th day of July, 1924, "in his possession, under his custody and control," a .38 Colt's revolver, less than 12 inches in length, and capable of being concealed upon the person, and being a foreign-born person and not a naturalized citizen of the United States. He was tried and convicted of the charge—the alleged offense constituting a violation of the act of 1923 (Stats. 1923, c. 339, p. 695)—a motion for a new trial was interposed and denied, whereupon defendant was sentenced to the penitentiary. He has appealed from the order denying his motion for a new trial and from the judgment of conviction.

The same points are urged for a reversal of the judgment and order as in the case of People v. Quarez, this day decided by this court, 238 P. 363. A weapon of the prohibited type was also found in the possession of appellant herein. What we have said touching the questions presented in the Juarez Case is hereby adopted and made a part hereof. For the reasons therein stated the judgment and order appealed from are hereby reversed and a new trial ordered.

We concur: MYERS, C. J., LENNON, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.; WASTE, J.; SEAWELL, J.

In re DILLINGHAM'S ESTATE.

RILEY, State Controller, v. PLATZ et al.

(L. A. 8224.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1925.)

1. Taxation ⟸895(3)—Evidence held not to support finding that certificates of stock held in trust were not received by executor.

On hearing on objections to report of inheritance tax appraiser, evidence held not to support finding that executors did not, subsequent to decedent's death, take possession of shares of stock held in trust during decedent's lifetime, or the certificates representing them.

2. Taxation ⟸864 — "Possessed" in Inheritance Tax Act held to refer to character of ownership falling short of seizin.

"Possessed," as used in the St. 1921, p. 1500, § 2, stating what transfers shall be subject to inheritance tax, held to refer to a character of ownership falling short of seizin and not to mere corporal having.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Possess.]

3. Taxation ⟸866—Property, held temporarily in trust for exclusive use and benefit of deceased, is not exempt from inheritance tax.

Property of deceased, held temporarily in trust by another for exclusive use and benefit of deceased, is not exempt from inheritance tax.

4. Taxation ⟸856—Theory upon which inheritance tax is imposed, stated.

Theory upon which inheritance tax is imposed is that state which confers privilege of succeeding to property may attach thereto condition that a portion of the property shall be contributed to that state.

5. Taxation ⟸866—Undistributed trust fund held subject to inheritance tax.

Where resident testatrix created trust subject to her revocation, whereby nonresident trustee was to pay income to testatrix during her life, and after her death convey undistributed trust fund to her executor or administrator, and the property held in trust was bequeathed in her will, such property was subject to inheritance tax under St. 1921, p. 1500, § 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Proceeding to fix inheritance tax on estate of Caroline Frances Dillingham, deceased, in which Wilhelmina Platz and others filed objections. From the decree, Ray L. Riley, as State Controller, appeals. Reversed.

Ralph W. Smith, State Inheritance Tax Atty., of Sacramento, and Adrian C. Stanton, Erwin P. Werner, and George S. Dennison, Asst. Inheritance Tax Attys., all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. W. Morin, of Pasadena, and James S. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. Caroline Frances Dillingham died testate on January 30, 1922, a resident of Los Angeles county, state of California. On or about the 21st day of February, 1921, and while she was residing in said county she created a trust, the corpus of which consisted of 900 shares of the preferred capital stock and 2 shares of the common capital stock of the Dillingham Manufacturing Company, a Wisconsin company. The certificates of stock were turned over to the First Wisconsin Trust Company, a Wisconsin corporation, as trustee, and held by it subject to the terms and conditions of the trust instrument duly executed by her.

The provisions of the trust instrument pertinent to the point presented in support of the appeal are as follows:

"The trustee shall at convenient intervals remit to the donor the net income of said trust over and above its charges and expenses, so long as she shall live.

* * * * * * *

"Donor reserves the right to revoke this trust and to secure an accounting from the trustees and a reconveyance to her of the corpus and undistributed income of the trust after deduction of trustee's credits, by notice in writing of said revocation. The trustee shall have a reasonable time to prepare and render its account to the donor and to reconvey the assets of the trust, including the corpus and undistributed income over and above its credits, to the donor. In the meantime during the lifetime of the donor and while this trust is unrevoked, the only right, title or interest of the donor in the property, the subject matter of this trust, is the right to receive such net income as shall be derived therefrom and a right to an accounting from time to time from the trustee.

* * * * * * *

"Upon the death of the donor the trust hereby created and defined shall terminate and be closed. The trustee shall distribute and convey the trust fund and any undistributed income thereof after its deductions, to the executor or administrator of the said donor, appointed and duly qualified."
